

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. Master and Servant—Covenant not to "displace" from Employment—Implied Covenant.

S, the agent of an insurance company, being indebted to the company, and being pressed for payment, it was arranged that the plaintiff should pay the money to the company, and that the company should appoint him and S. as joint agents, with the same rates of payment and remuneration as before. A deed was executed, containing a covenant that in case the company should at any time hereafter "displace" S. from his appointment as agent, then that they should and would forthwith repay to the plaintiff the money so paid by him. Subsequently, the company transferred the whole of their business and liabilities to another company, and refused to pay the plaintiff the money so advanced by him:—Held, in an action to recover the amount, that there was an implied covenant on the part of the company that they would not do anything of their own voluntary act, by which it should be impossible for them to keep S. in their employ any longer, and therefore that they were liable in the action by the plaintiff.

The declaration was in covenant to recover 1,449*l.* 10*s.* 9*d.*; and at the trial, before Cockburn, C.J., at the Sittings in London after Trinity Term, 1863, a verdict was entered for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the Court upon a case, which was substantially as follows:

The United Kingdom Life Assurance Company were established under a deed of settlement, and were registered under section 58. of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110.

In 1842 the company, of whom the defendants were trustees, appointed A. B. Seton to be their sole agent at Glasgow. His business was to procure persons to effect policies with the company, and otherwise to bring business to the office; by way of remuneration he was to receive, and did receive, 10*l.* per cent. upon the first premium, and 5*l.* per cent. on the succeeding premiums in respect of all policies effected with the said company through his introduction, and 5*l.* per cent. on all premiums which, by direction of the company, he might collect from them, and also an allowance of 130*l.* for office rent; in addition to which, the company paid the rates and taxes and other incidental expenses connected with the office.

In the year 1848 they advanced to him, on loan, 2,000*l.*, on the security of the joint and several promissory note of himself, his son and the plaintiff. In December 1852 he became further indebted to them in the sum of 1,449*l.* 10*s.* 9*d.*, and for this debt the company had no security whatever. They pressed him for payment of both amounts; and an arrangement was made that the plaintiff should pay off both sums upon the terms and conditions of a deed hereinafter referred to. The plaintiff did accordingly pay to the company the said two sums, and they appointed him their agent at Glasgow jointly with Seton.

A deed was entered into, on the 17th of December 1852, between the defendants and two other persons, as trustees of the company, of the first part, the said A. B. Seton of the second part, and the plaintiff of the third part, which, after reciting that the plaintiff had agreed to pay off the 2,000*l.* upon having the securities first transferred to him, and to pay off the 1,449*l.* 10*s.* 9*d.* on the company appointing him co-agent with Seton, the trustees, in consideration of these payments, assigned to the plaintiff the securities for the 2,000*l.*, and covenanted with him that "in case the said company shall at any time hereafter displace the said A. B. Seton from his appointment as agent of the said company at Glasgow, then the said company shall and will forthwith thereafter repay unto the said William Stirling, his executors, administrators and assigns, the said sum of 1,449*l.* 10*s.* 9*d.*, or so much thereof as shall not have been previously repaid to the said W. Stirling, or otherwise recovered or received by him." Then followed a provision, that in the event of the joint agency at Glasgow being determined by the company by the displacement of Seton, the company reserved the right of appointing the plaintiff as their agent at Glasgow or discontinuing his services; and, if they should appoint him, of compensating him in such manner as they might think proper.

After the deed had been executed, the business at Glasgow was carried on by Seton, in the name of Seton & Stirling, but in the same manner as it had previously been, and the same remuneration and allowances continued to be paid. The plaintiff himself took no active part in the said agency, though he occasionally called at the office, and conversed with Seton upon the business of the company. On the 29th of July 1862 certain heads of agreement were entered into between the company and the North British and Mercantile Assurance Company for the sale and transfer of the business, goodwill and property of the company to the North British Company. No notice was given to the plaintiff of this intended transfer till the 15th of July 1862; and on the 8th of September a letter was written to the plaintiff and Seton by one of the defendants, informing them that the agreement had been entered into, and containing the following passage: "In returning you the cordial thanks of the board of directors of this company for your influential introduction and valuable services, I am desired to express their earnest hope that you will continue to extend your influence and service to the North British and Mercantile Assurance Company, who will carry on business at this office as a branch, and who will, I feel assured, give prompt and particular attention to all matters affecting the interest of the agents and the constituents. I have the pleasure to inclose you a prospectus of the British and Mercantile Assurance Company, shewing the terms upon which they grant new insurances, and at the same time to inform you that Mr. David Smith, the general manager, will communicate with you in a few days."

The transfer to the North British Company was effected on the 1st of October, and no part of the sum of 1,449*l.* 10*s.* 9*d.* was paid by the company. The partnership between the plaintiff and Seton was dissolved in January 1863, and the present action was then brought.

M. Smith (Murray with him), for the plaintiff.—The defendants are liable in this action, for they have displaced Seton from the agency. They have bound themselves to pay the money in a certain event, and that event having happened they can have no defence to the action, especially as it has happened through their own voluntary act by putting an end to their business and transferring it to the North British Company. If a man covenants not to displace another from his chair, it would make no difference whether he pushed him off the chair or pulled the chair from under him.

(1) 5 East, 266.

It cannot be contended that the defendants were bound to carry on their business under all circumstances, but it is submitted, that beyond all doubt, if they choose of their own act to put an end to it, they are bound to pay the plaintiff.—He referred to Tasker v. Shepherd (2) and M'Intyre v. Belcher (3).

Coleridge (H. Lloyd with him), for the defendants.—The parties, in entering into this covenant, only contemplated the agent being displaced while the business of the company was continued. It was supposed that the company was in a prosperous condition, and that the arrangement would be an advantage to both parties. If the plaintiff's contention be the right one, the company would be liable if they had carried on the business for twenty years, although he had been receiving commissions during the whole of that time. The duties and remuneration of Seton came to an end only by the company ceasing to carry on business, winding up their affairs and dissolving. Under such circumstances, they are not liable upon their covenant.

M. Smith, in reply.—Suppose the manager of a theatre covenanted that he would pay money if he dismissed an actor, and then gave up the occupation of the theatre, he would surely be liable. That is just the same as the present case.

[SHEK, J.—Is not the letter of the 8th of September a displacement of itself?]

Yes it is.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that our judgment ought to be for the plaintiff. When we come to look at the terms of the deed, and the recitals in it, the nature of the arrangement and the intention of the parties become plain. Seton being the agent of the United Kingdom Life Assurance Company became indebted to them in the sum of 1,449*l.* 10*s.* 9*d.* The plaintiff, finding that the company were pressing their agent, was minded to pay off the debt due from him, and then the question arose, how was the repayment of the money to be secured to the plaintiff; and the deed was entered into, according to the covenants of which he was to be a co-agent with Seton, the object being to give him a control over the money received by Seton, and then inasmuch as the whole object of the arrangement would have been defeated if Seton had been displaced, the covenant in question was inserted. After a time the company found that their affairs were not prosperous, and an arrangement was entered into with the North British and Mercantile Assurance Company that their business should be transferred to them. Of course, when this took place, and the transfer was effected, there was a dissolution of the defendant's company, and there being no further business of the company, there would be no further agency, and the whole thing would fall to the ground. I think this comes within the terms of the covenant, and that the meaning of the company in entering into the covenant was this: "We, being the United Kingdom Company, and Seton being our agent, we, in order to secure to you the repayment by Seton of the sum which you have paid for him, will engage that we will continue him in that employment which he has hitherto held," and adopting Mr. Coleridge's construction, "so long as we continue to be a company." Then I think that a covenant is implied that they would do nothing of their own accord to put an end to the existence of the company, or the employment of Seton as their agent. I think that effect can only be given to the covenant by the continuance of a given state of things, and there is an implied covenant that the covenantors would do nothing of their own act which would put an end to the continuance of that, without which the object of the arrangement could not be attained. While, therefore, I agree with Mr. Coleridge, that if the company should come to an end by reason of any external cause, which could not be considered an act of their own, it would not have the effect of displacing the agent, I also think that where it is done by their own voluntary act, there is a breach of covenant for which the plaintiff is entitled to bring his action against them. By their own act the company have put an end to that state of things which alone could enable them to continue him in their employment. I quite feel that the effect of our decision may, morally speaking, be that an injustice will be done; but that is not the question which we have to determine, and it may possibly be that the company may obtain relief by a proceeding in equity. We have only to consider whether there has been such a displacement of Seton from his employment as will amount to a breach of the covenant, and entitle the plaintiff to maintain this action.

CROMPTON, J.—I am of the same opinion. The plaintiff declares against the defendants, who are the trustees of the company, upon the covenant to pay money which may become due upon the contingency of their displacing Seton, who was their agent, from his situation. The defendants plead that he was not so displaced, which raises the simple question which we have to decide, whether what has been done brings them within the meaning of the covenant, which is not that they will not turn him away, which is what I understand by "displace"; but that if they do displace him, they will pay the money; and I think that when they did an act which necessarily had the effect of displacing him, they became liable to an action. I referred during the argument to Charnley v. Winstanley (1), where a woman had before her marriage covenanted to leave certain matters in difference between herself and the plaintiff to arbitration, and to abide the award; the arbitrator made the award after the marriage, in favour of the plaintiff, and an action having been brought against the husband and wife, it was held that inasmuch as by the marriage she had by her own act put it out of her power to perform the award, the covenant to abide the award was broken. The step which she took was a very natural one, but as it was an act done of her own accord, the action was maintainable. In the present case no technical words are used; and I construe the meaning of the parties to be, that Seton was not to be put out of his place; and then if the company by their own voluntary act cease to exist, he cannot any longer remain in the place. The plain meaning seems to be this: the plaintiff says, "I will pay the money which Seton owes, but I must have the security of your keeping him in his situation, and you must give me a pledge that you will not by your own voluntary act displace him; I take the chance of his dying, or of his becoming paralyzed, or of his being guilty of such misconduct as would lead to his dismissal, but you must not dismiss him of your own heads." It seems to come within the rule that an indirect act is the same as a direct one, if the necessary consequence is that he is displaced. Perhaps this is a direct act of the company. The argument that they have a right to dissolve the company, would apply equally to the case of an agreement of this sort with a common firm or partnership, which would displace the people employed by them if they put an end to their trade and business. I think the company did displace the plaintiff within the meaning of their covenant, and that the plaintiff is entitled to recover.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. Mr. Coleridge has contended that the company could not "displace" Seton by anything which they did, except while they were carrying on the business in which he was employed by them; but upon looking at the whole of the circumstances and the deed, it seems to me to be far more reasonable to construe them to mean that they should not do anything which would have the effect of displacing him. By this arrangement the plaintiff, the agent, and also the company, were to gain some advantage, and the latter bind themselves not to displace Seton, because the plaintiff wanted the security which his remaining in his employment afforded him. The company had no right to put an end to the employment by the voluntary transfer of the business to the North British Company, by their own purely voluntary act, and at the same time to deny their liability to pay the money to the plaintiff.

SHEE, J.—I had some doubt at first whether the meaning of this covenant was not that the company would not displace Seton while they continued to carry on their business; but I have now come to the same conclusion as the rest of the Court, and I think with my Brother Crompton that Seton was displaced by the dissolution of the business which the company carried on. That this is the meaning appears more certainly from the second covenant, in which they appear to contemplate the event of the employment of the plaintiff, and to reserve to themselves the right of appointment and compensation.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

1864. } ALLDAY v. THE GREAT WESTERN
Nov. 2. } RAILWAY COMPANY.

Carriers by Railway—Cattle—Unreasonable Conditions—Special Contract—"Injury"—Over-carriage—17 & 18 Vict. c. 31. s. 7.

The defendants, a railway company, received certain cattle to be carried for the plaintiff to B. station. They induced him to sign a ticket containing certain "special conditions," among others that the defendants were not to be answerable for "any consequences arising from over-carriage, detention or delay in, or in relation to the conveying or delivering of the said animals, however caused." The cattle were sent to the H. station, which was a more distant station than the B. station, and where they remained for some hours until they were found by the plaintiff. In consequence of the delay, and from want of food and water, the cattle were injured. There was no consideration for the special contract by charging the plaintiff a smaller rate of charge, or anything of the kind:—Held, that the cattle were injured within the meaning of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 31. s. 7, and also that the condition in the ticket was unreasonable within the meaning of that section.

The first count of the declaration alleged that the plaintiff delivered to the defendants certain beasts, to be by the defendants carried from Oxford to Bordesley Station, Birmingham, and there delivered for the plaintiff in a reasonable time then next following, for reward to the defendants; that the defendants received from the plaintiff the said beasts for the purpose aforesaid, and all conditions were fulfilled, and all things happened, and all times elapsed, necessary to entitle the plaintiff to have the said beasts delivered by the defendants at the last-mentioned place, yet the defendants so carelessly and negligently conducted themselves in and about effecting the purpose for which the said beasts were so bailed to them as aforesaid, that by reason of the said negligence and carelessness of the defendants they did not within the said reasonable time deliver the said beasts to the plaintiff at Bordesley Station, Birmingham, as aforesaid, by reason whereof the plaintiff lost the use of the same for a long time, and was put to great trouble and inconvenience, and did and performed work, labour and journeys in and about finding and regaining possession of the said beasts, and was deprived of the opportunity of selling the same, and for a long time was forced to expend food and labour in feeding and taking care of them for that time, and the beasts were not at the time and place when he regained possession of them so valuable as they would have been at the time and place when and where the beasts ought to have been delivered to him as aforesaid. The second count was trover for the beasts.

First plea, not guilty; second, to the first count, that the plaintiff did not deliver to them, nor did they receive from the plaintiff the said beasts, or any of them, for the purpose and on the terms alleged.

At the trial, which took place at the last Warwick Summer Assizes, before Keating, J., it appeared that in 1861 the plaintiff bought some beasts at Oxford market, and delivered them to the station-master at the Oxford station of the defendants, with directions to send them to Birmingham for the market which was to take place the next day. At the time of delivering, a ticket was given to and signed by the plaintiff, which was in the following form:

"Cattle, Sheep and Pigs (reduced rates).

"To the Great Western Railway, Oxford Station,

"Nov. 13, 1861.

"Received from Allday, of —, the under-mentioned animals on the conditions stated below, and at special reduced charge below the rates authorized by law.

"To be sent to Bordesley Station.

"Special Conditions.

"The loading and unloading is to be performed by the sender, and any assistance voluntarily given by the company's servants to be at the risk of the owner. The company are not to be subject to any risk in the receiving, loading, forwarding, in transit and unloading, nor to be amenable for any damage actual or consequential, arising from suffocation, from being trampled on, bruised or otherwise injured from fire or any other cause whatsoever, nor from any consequences arising from over-carriage, detention or delay in, or in relation to the conveying or delivering of the said animals, however caused."

It was not proved that the rates charged were not the rates usually charged. The company have two stations for the delivery of cattle for the Birmingham market, one, that at Bordesley, for the cattle from Oxford and places south of Birmingham, which is the one mentioned in the ticket; the other, Hockley, north of Birmingham, which would not be the proper one for the plaintiff's cattle to be sent to. The plaintiff made inquiries for them the next morning at the Bordesley station, but inasmuch as they had been carried to the Hockley station, he did not get them till the middle of the day, and when the market was nearly over. The proper time for him to have received them would have been early in the morning, and at the Bordesley station. By reason of the delay which took place he lost the market; and in addition it was proved that the cattle had become injured by having been kept in the trucks without food or water. The defendants refused to make any compensation, and the action was brought at the time, though proceedings were afterwards stayed.

In consequence, however, of the decision of the House of Lords in Peck v. the North Staffordshire Railway Company (1) the plaintiff went on with the action. The defendants insisted that they were protected by the condition in the ticket, and that they were not liable in respect of over-carriage.

The learned Judge, however, was of opinion that the condition was unreasonable, and a verdict was found for the plaintiff for 15*l.*, leave being reserved to the defendants to move to enter the verdict for them.

Field (Manley Smith with him) now moved accordingly.—The plaintiff was not entitled to recover in this action; he has entered into a special contract with the defendants as to the terms upon which they were to carry the cattle. There is nothing unreasonable in the conditions set out in the ticket, nor is there anything in the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 31. s. 7. which can shew that the contract would not be binding upon the plaintiff. The difficulty of making arrangements for the carriage of cattle is very great, and there is always a possibility that they may be carried beyond the particular station to which they were destined.

If that be so, the defendants may be protected on the ground that what has happened only amounted to delay, for if the plaintiff had not accepted the cattle at the Hockley station, they would have been sent back to Bordesley and delivered to him there. Next, there was "no loss of or any injury done to" the cattle within the meaning of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 31. s. 7, and therefore the defendants have a right to limit their liability as they would be able to do at common law. Admitting that the condition of the cattle had fallen off in consequence of the want of food and water, that would not amount to "injury" within section 7. of the above act.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that there ought not to be any rule in this case. It is admitted that there had been loss of condition to the cattle, and it is clear that that amounts to "injury" within the meaning of the 7th section. I am also of opinion that the condition expressed in the ticket is unreasonable. The defendants claim complete immunity from liability in respect of all delay, over-carriage, &c. They talk of reduced rates, but there is no proof that they charged the plaintiff anything less than the ordinary rates of charge. It might perhaps be reasonable if they had given the plaintiff the choice of two classes of rates, and had made a special contract limiting their liability in consideration of the lesser rate being charged. But no such thing has been done here.

CROMPTON, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is clear that the cattle sustained injury by reason of the conduct of the defendants. It is also clear that the condition was an unreasonable one; it was compulsory upon the plaintiff, no option being given to him, and the defendants cannot in such a manner protect themselves from liability.

MELLOR, J. and SHEE, J. concurred.

Nov. 4. } Ex parte A. S. DE JIVAS.

Arbitration—Attorney—Articled Clerk—Illness—Discharge from Articles.

Where an articled clerk had served for nineteen months under his articles, and had then been compelled from illness and other causes to be absent for more than sixteen months, this Court permitted him to be discharged from the old articles and to serve the same master under new ones, for such a period as with the time during which he had already served would make up the full period of five years.

This was an application to the Court for an order that A. S. De Jivas might be discharged from articles of clerkship then current, and that he might be allowed to enter into fresh articles for the remainder of the time necessary to complete the five years.

It appeared from an affidavit made by the clerk that articles of clerkship, dated the 18th of November 1861, had been entered into for the period of five years, and that he had served the attorney with whom the articles were made for a period of nineteen months and twelve days from their date; that on the 1st of July 1863 he was compelled from ill-health and other causes to leave his occupation, and from that time to the present, a period of more than sixteen months, he had been absent; that he was now desirous of continuing his service with the same master.

Peter Williams, in support of the application.—The clerk wishes to be allowed to enter into fresh articles, and that the time of actual service under the old articles may be allowed to count as good service.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—He does not ask that the time he was absent should count?] No.

[CROMPTON, J.—Why cannot he continue to serve under the old articles till they have expired?]

Even if he did, he would be obliged to come to this Court at the expiration of his articles—Ex parte Smith (1). It is perhaps more prudent that he should get rid of the difficulty at once by making the present application.

Per Curiam (2).—He may have leave to enter into fresh articles to serve for such time as will be necessary to make up the five years with the time actually served under the old articles; he being discharged from the old articles.

Order accordingly.

Award—Arbitrator—Enlargement of Time—Jurisdiction.

Where there was cause to believe that an arbitrator had failed to enlarge the time for making his award within the time provided by the order of reference, and he had refused to give any information as to whether the enlargement had been duly made or not, this Court, upon the application of one of the parties who wished to make the order of reference a rule of Court, ordered the arbitrator to attend before the Master to be examined upon the matter, in order that the order of reference might be made a rule of Court.

Rule calling upon the defendant to shew cause why a rule obtained to make an order of reference a rule of Court should not be discharged on the ground that the affidavits did not verify the time at which the enlargements of time were made.

It appeared that, by an order of Blackburn, J., all matters in difference in a cause of Roberts v. Evans were referred to an arbitrator, who, on the 5th of February 1864, made and published his award in writing. The proper time for making the award, supposing there had been no enlargement, was on or before the 11th of January. The award on the face of it shewed an enlargement to the 1st of February, and another to the 1st of March. It was sworn that the latter enlargement was not made till the 5th of February, when the award and order of reference were delivered. The arbitrator refused to make an affidavit or to state whether the enlargements were made in due time.

Mellish shewed cause against the rule, and contended that the arbitrator had no right to refuse to give the party the information which he asked for.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—What ground can he have for refusing?]

Some strange notion of the dignity of his office.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—Surely this Court has power, under either section 46. or section 48. of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, to order him to appear and be examined?]

Yes; he may be ordered to appear in Court for the purpose, or he may be ordered to attend before a Judge or a Master, and be examined on oath. The party has a clear right to get the information he requires.

Per Curiam (1). — Let a peremptory order issue that he shall attend before the Master to be examined on oath, and let the rule be enlarged until next term.

Order accordingly.

Arbitration — Objecting to Arbitrator's Authority — Attending before Arbitrator under Protest.

If a party to a reference objects that the arbitrators are entering upon the consideration of a matter not referred to them, and protests against it, and the arbitrators nevertheless go into the question and receive evidence on it, and the party, still under protest, continues to attend before the arbitrators and cross-examines the witnesses on the point objected to, he does not thereby waive his objection, nor is he estopped from saying that the arbitrators have exceeded their authority by awarding on the matter.

This was an appeal, by the plaintiff, against the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench in favour of the defendant.

The action was on an award for 2,000*l*.

The declaration alleged that, in pursuance of the terms of a lease between the plaintiff and the defendant, by which it was agreed that in case of differences respecting the construction of the lease or anything therein contained, or respecting any other matter or thing connected with or relating to one or more of the subjects thereof, such differences should be referred to the arbitration of three indifferent persons,—one to be chosen by each of the parties and the third by such two persons; and it averred that, differences and disputes having arisen, the plaintiff appointed A. and the defendant appointed B. as the two arbitrators, and that A. and B. not agreeing in appointing a third arbitrator, C. was appointed third arbitrator by a Judge under the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, and that the award was made by A. and C.

The defendant, by his seventh plea, pleaded that he did not choose B. to be such second arbitrator to whom the said differences and doubts should be referred, as alleged in the declaration.

The appointment of B. by the defendant in fact was not to determine all the matters in difference alleged in the declaration, but conferred only a limited authority to decide on the construction of the lease.

On the reference, the defendant objected to the arbitrators going into any question of the amount of damages or anything beyond the construction of the lease; but he did, under protest, attend meetings of the arbitrators, when the question of damages was gone into, and cross-examined some of the witnesses.

The Court below thought by thus appearing under protest to contest the question of the damages, the defendant did not waive the substantial objection that he had taken to their authority, and gave judgment in his favour.

H. Lloyd, for the plaintiff, the appellant. —The arbitrators clearly had power over the construction of the lease, and therefore the award is good as to that part.

But the power to decide on the lease incidentally gives a power to award damages. The defendant's protest and objection was practically a nullity, as he continued his attendance before the arbitrators and cross-examined the witnesses on the question of damages. This conduct on his part was a waiver of all objection to the arbitrators' authority over damages.

[WILLIAMS, J.—If the parties attend and so give the arbitrators power, is it not a new submission?]

No; a waiver acts only by way of estoppel. The defendant cannot be held to say that the arbitrators had not originally authority to decide on the question of damages after he has discussed the question before them. Ringland v. Lowndes (1) is a clear authority that if a party protests and yet attends before an arbitrator his protest comes to nothing, and his objection fails.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—I cannot distinguish, in my own mind, between a man being a Judge and a man being a Judge quoad hoc. I do not see why—if an arbitrator deals with a matter beyond his jurisdiction, and the party protests, doubting the arbitrator's authority, and yet goes on to take care of his own interests as he best can, saying, I am not sure that you are right—he is to be bound by the award. Why is he disentitled to protect himself from the consequences of his own view as to the arbitrator's authority being wrong? I think it a much more difficult question whether the defendant could have availed himself of a decision in his favour.]

Lush (J. Brown with him), for the defendant, was not called upon.

POLLOCK, C.B.—We are of opinion that the plea is proved, and that the judgment of the Court below ought to be affirmed.

The other JUDGES concurred.

1864. } THE QUEEN v. COLLINGRIDGE.

Merchant Shipping Act—Local Marine Board—Duty of summoning Witnesses for the Defence—Stat. 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104. ss. 15, 241.

A local marine board, appointed under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, to inquire into a charge of alleged misconduct against the master or mate of a vessel, has a discretionary power as to granting summonses for witnesses for the defence.

It is a proper course for such Court before granting the summonses, to inquire who the witnesses are, and what they are expected to prove; and to refuse the summons in respect of any witness who can only speak to matters clearly irrelevant.

The witnesses summoned for the defence are witnesses of the Court, and their expense is borne not by the defendant but by the public.

This was a motion for a certiorari to the local marine board of London, to bring up a conviction or finding of the local marine board, on a summons for an inquiry into the conduct of the defendant.

By the Merchant Shipping Act, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104. ss. 241, 242, the local marine board have power of inquiring into any charges of misconduct of any master or mate on board of merchant vessels, and of suspending or cancelling any master's or mate's certificates. The defendant, a duly certificated master, was prosecuted before the local marine board for alleged misconduct, under section 241. According to the affidavits in support of the motion, the defendant, two days before the hearing, required the secretary of the board to cause certain witnesses for him to be summoned, giving the secretary a list of them. The secretary told the defendant the board could not summon witnesses for the defence. It was stated also in the same affidavit that, on the day appointed, the defendant appeared with his solicitor to answer the charge, but that an officer of the court refused to allow the attorney to enter the board-room, and that the case was heard without him, and the defendant was convicted of misconduct in the absence of his solicitor, and had his certificate suspended for three months.

By the affidavits in answer, it appeared that the defendant on entering the room was asked whether he had an attorney, and that in answer he said that he could conduct the case himself; that at the commencement of proceedings the board offered to adjourn the hearing, and give the defendant an opportunity to insure the attendance of his witnesses; that the defendant answered that he wished the inquiry then to proceed; that the inquiry then proceeded and witnesses were heard for the prosecution, and the defendant made a statement; that he was then asked to furnish a list of witnesses whom he required, and to inform the board what they were likely to prove, that the Court might exercise a discretion whether they should be called, and that an adjournment should be granted for the further hearing; that the defendant, in reply, stated that he would have the case decided then, and that it was decided accordingly.

H. Giffard shewed cause.—These proceedings are under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1864, stat. 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, and are perfectly regular. By section 242. the local marine board has power to suspend or cancel a master's certificate. The objections proposed to be urged fail in point of law, and are not grounded on fact. First, the board was not bound to summon the defendant's witnesses. Section 241. gives the board all the powers of inspectors, and section 15. gives the inspector power to summon all such witnesses as he may think fit. The board has the same discretionary powers as to what witnesses it will require to attend, and may decline to summon any when it is not satisfied that their evidence will be of importance. Further, the defendant never put the board into a position to decide on the propriety of summoning the witnesses. With regard to the objection respecting the exclusion of the attorney, the affidavits in answer shew clearly that the defendant did not complain of his attorney being excluded, but said that he would conduct his case himself.

Joyce and Gibbons, in support of the rule.—The defendant had a right to have his witnesses summoned for him. The legislature never intended that the defendant should be bound to disclose to the other side and to the Court the nature of the evidence which he supposed that they would give.

[CROMPTON, J.—It may be that the rule is framed by analogy to the practice of parliamentary committees, to require the party to state what the witnesses will prove. They need not disclose the evidence in a way to do any damage.]

The legislature says, section 241, that the board is to afford the defendant full opportunity of defence. The board, therefore, has no such discretionary power as the inspectors have. The powers conferred sub modo on the inspectors are conferred absolutely on the board. The inspector could inquire only into certain specified matters under section 15, but section 241. gives larger powers to the board. Further, the statute says that the defendant is to have full opportunity of making his defence by himself or otherwise. That means that he may do it either in person or by means of his legal advisers. The defendant had therefore an absolute legal right to have his attorney present, and the attorney swears positively that he was excluded. These proceedings of the Court amount to a denial of justice. A certiorari is the only remedy.

CROMPTON, J.—The certiorari can only be granted if it is shewn that the local marine board have acted beyond their jurisdiction. They were the judges whether the defendant had been guilty of misconduct. If they have decided without hearing the case, I think I ought to grant the certiorari. The question, to my mind, is, whether the defendant has been heard. It is hardly necessary to say anything on the points of law, as I think that the substantial matter of complaint is answered by the affidavits. Proceedings of this kind, which are penal, if not criminal, should be as public as possible. Those who conduct such an inquiry should give the party charged every opportunity of having his attorney and counsel and witnesses present. It can hardly be contended that there was no evidence of misconduct under the act of parliament. But the applicant relies on section 241, which provides that the accused shall have full opportunity of making his defence, by himself or otherwise; and the word "otherwise" there seems to mean by his counsel or attorney. The only clause under which any power of summoning witnesses is given is by the proviso in section 241, that the board shall have all the powers of inspectors appointed by the Board of Trade; and by section 15. an inspector may, by summons under his hand, require the attendance of all such persons as he may think fit to examine. Witnesses, therefore, are to be summoned under the power given by section 15; and I think the local marine board takes the power of summoning witnesses with the same discretionary qualification as an inspector had. Those witnesses which are summoned are, I think, to be paid for by the Court which summons them. The statute seems to me to give a discretion to bodies such as the local marine board, where all the expense of the witnesses is to be thrown upon the public. It would be right for the board to prevent a witness being vexatiously summoned by a party. I think there was nothing wrong in the Court saying to the defendant "give us a list of the witnesses you wish summoned, and tell us what they are expected to prove." Here the defendant was asked twice whether he wished the case adjourned for the purpose of having the attendance of the witnesses, and was told that it was, to some extent, discretionary with the Court to grant the summonses. The Court, indeed, would act very ill if they did not allow a defendant to have a summons for any one that, in the widest sense, could be considered a necessary witness. But the defendant does not even allege that it would be inconvenient for him to give a list of the witnesses. It is suggested that he wanted witnesses to prove that in some other cases the local marine board had not considered the course of conduct charged on him to be misconduct. That was an irrelevant matter which he should not have been allowed to prove. But the defendant, in answer to the inquiry by the Court, says, in effect, that he does not want any witnesses. The same reply may be given to the objection respecting the exclusion of the solicitor. No complaint is made by the defendant of the absence of his solicitor. He is asked, in effect, whether he wants his solicitor, and he says I am going to conduct my case myself. If a solicitor be prevented getting in while a trial is going on, it is very difficult to say that the Court has on that account no jurisdiction. On the whole, I think it cannot be said that in this case there was no hearing. If the board has not heard the case, they are liable to a mandamus to hear it. I therefore put my decision upon this ground, that the defendant said that he would go on without witnesses, and would conduct his case himself, and that he wished the case to go on then and there. At the same time I own that I think that there was some obstruction to the admission of the solicitor.

Rule discharged.

{ THE MERCANTILE MARINE
INSURANCE COMPANY v.
TITHERINGTON.

Marine Insurance—Policy—Computation of Time.

By a policy of insurance a ship was insured from Liverpool to any port in the Pacific Ocean, "and during thirty days' stay in her last port of discharge." In another part of the policy there was the usual printed clause, by which she was to be insured "until she hath moored at anchor twenty-four hours in good safety." She arrived at M, her port of discharge, at 7 p.m. on the 25th of May, and anchored there, and at 3.45 a.m. on the 24th of June she was driven ashore and lost:—Held, that the loss was covered by the policy, as the thirty days had not expired when she was so lost.

This was a SPECIAL CASE stated for the opinion of this Court under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, in an action for the recovery of money alleged to be due from the defendant by way of contribution towards the sum of 3,000*l.*, paid by the plaintiffs upon the total loss of the Albemarle, on the 24th of June 1863.

CASE.

1. On the 26th of November 1862, Messrs. A. Baruchson & Co., the owners of the ship Albemarle, effected a policy of insurance on such ship for the sum of 2,000*l.*, a copy of which is hereunto annexed.

2. This policy was underwritten by the defendant for the sum of 100*l.*

3. On the 26th of December 1862, B. &

Co. effected another policy on the said ship for 1,000*l*.

4. On the 4th of December 1862, they effected another policy for 2,000*l*.

5. The said ship sailed from Liverpool on the 23rd of December 1862, and arrived at Mazatlan, being a port in the Pacific Ocean, and her last port of discharge, on the 25th of May 1863, at 7 P.M., and then anchored there.

6. The vessel remained anchored at Mazatlan in safety until the 24th of June 1863, and on that day, at 3.45 A.M., she was driven on shore in a gale of wind and was wholly lost.

7. The said B. & Co. immediately on hearing of the arrival of the said ship at Mazatlan, proceeded to effect an insurance on the said ship, on her future voyage; and before any intimation of her loss, they, on the 8th of July 1863, effected a policy with the plaintiffs, a copy of which is hereunto annexed.

8. B. & Co. in like manner covered by insurance the sum of 2,000*l*., being the residue of the sum at which the ship was valued.

9. On hearing of the loss, B. & Co. applied to the plaintiffs and the underwriters on the last-mentioned policy, to pay them the amount of the loss, and the plaintiffs and such underwriters thereupon paid to the owners of the said ship the several sums insured by them respectively.

10. In this action the plaintiff seeks to recover the sum of 47*l*. 15*s*. 3*d*., being the sum which the plaintiff contends the defendant is liable to contribute in respect of the sum of 100*l*., for which the said policy was underwritten by him as aforesaid, upon the ground that such policy was in force at the time of the loss of the said vessel.

The question for the opinion of the Court is, whether the policy of insurance so underwritten by the defendant as aforesaid, was in force at the time of the loss of the said vessel.

By the policy which was underwritten by the defendant, B. & Co. caused themselves "to be insured, lost or not lost, at and from Liverpool to any port or ports in the South and North Pacific Oceans, in any order backwards and forwards, and during thirty days stay in her last port of discharge, with leave to cruise off any port or ports in the Pacific, for a period of thirty days, upon any kind of goods and merchandise, and also upon the body, &c. of the good ship or vessel called the Albemarle, . . . beginning the adventure upon the said goods and merchandises from the loading thereof aboard the said ship as above upon the said ship, &c., including collision clause, and shall so continue and endure during her abode there, upon the said ship, &c., and further until the said ship with all her ordnance, tackle, apparel, &c., and goods and merchandises whatsoever, shall be arrived at as above upon the said ship, &c., until she hath moored at anchor twenty-four hours in good safety, and upon the goods and merchandises until the same be there discharged and safely landed," &c. (The clause as to the thirty days was in writing, that as to the twenty-four hours in print.)

Sir G. Honyman (Mellish with him), for the plaintiffs.—The policy underwritten by the defendant was in force when the ship was lost. The thirty days ought to be reckoned from midnight on the 25th of May, according to the general rule which is laid down in Webb v. Fairman (1) and Young v. Higgon (2). Or if the time be reckoned from the actual time of her arrival, the time of the accident would also be covered, for the thirty days would not expire till 7 o'clock on the 24th of June. It will be said that on the construction first suggested, the ship would be uncovered from the time of her arrival till midnight. That, however, would not be the case, for the policy in another part covers her until she has moored at anchor twenty-four hours in good safety.

Lush (Cohen with him), for the defendant.—The policy was not in force at 3.45 A.M. on the 24th of June. In calculating the thirty days stay at Mazatlan, the 25th of May is to be included, for any other mode of calculation would render the ship uninsured for a portion of her first day's stay. It is a mistake to say that she would still be insured under the other clause in the policy, which is in printed words, for that part is not intended to have force when the parties have inserted in writing their own terms as to the thirty days. The proper mode of construing this policy is that the thirty days should run from midnight preceding the time at which the ship arrived.

(2) 6 Ibid. 49; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 29.

[CROMPTON, J.—We must construe the policy so as to make all the parts of it available, and I cannot see why we should not read it as meaning that the thirty days should run from the expiration of the twenty-four hours after the ship had moored at anchor. COCKBURN, C.J.—I think that is the right view.]

Per Curiam (3).—There must be judgment for the plaintiffs.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

{ THE QUEEN v. THE LOCAL BOARD OF HEALTH OF THE BOROUGH OF GOD-
MANCHESTER.

Sewer — Drain — Watercourse — Public Health Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63).—Local Board of Health.

A natural stream, supplied by natural and artificial drainage of cultivated soil belonging to private individuals, was cleared out and partially widened and deepened by Commissioners acting under a private inclosure act, powers being given to them to do so at the expense of the proprietors. In its passage to the river into which it ultimately flowed, it passed through a town and received the drainage of two or three inhabited houses. Semble—That this stream was not a sewer within the meaning of the Public Health Act, 1848.

But even if it were so,—Held, that it came within the exceptions in section 43, and that it was not vested in the local board of health, and that they were not liable to cleanse and repair it.

Mandamus to the local board of health of the borough of Godmanchester, commanding them to cleanse a sewer or watercourse, pursuant to the Public Health Act, 1848.

The defendants made a return, traversing the allegations in the writ, and alleging that the watercourse was not a sewer which it was their duty to cleanse, and also that it had been made under a local act, and that it ought to be cleansed at the expense of the proprietors of the lands through which it flowed. The prosecutor pleaded, first, that the watercourse was a sewer vested in the local board and that it was their duty to cleanse it. Secondly, that it was not made or used under the said local act, nor ought it to be cleansed at the expense of the proprietors, &c.

Issues were joined upon these pleas.

At the trial, which took place at the Summer Assizes for Huntingdon, 1863, the cause was referred to an arbitrator to settle and determine the question as to the origin, nature, and extent of the Stonehill Brook; what was done by the Inclosure Commissioners; what alterations, if any, what repairs, if any, were from time to time done, and by whom. The facts to be stated in a special case, and the Court to draw conclusions from the facts. The writ and return and pleading to form part of the case.

CASE.

In the year 1802 the Godmanchester Inclosure Act was passed, entitled an act for dividing and inclosing certain open and common fields, meadows, lands, commons and commonable places within the parish of Gumcester, otherwise Godmanchester, in the county of Huntingdon. This act may be referred to as part of this case. The Commissioners appointed under the above act made their award under the same on the 23rd of June 1809, and by such award they did set out and appoint, order and direct among, other things, "one other public drain or watercourse, four feet wide, beginning at the London turnpike road into and over an allotment to the Dean and Chapter (meaning the Dean and Chapter of Westminster) and their lessee, along Shooter's Hill, and thence through and over the allotments to Samuel Bleckley's, Lady Olivia Sparrow's and John Martin's, to and across Gravelly Way, and thence over an allotment to George Maule, into an ancient watercourse leading into the town of Godmanchester, along part of the said town and thence into the river Ouse." And the said Commissioners did by their award direct (inter alia), "That all such drains and bridges shall be made and forever maintained, supported, scoured and kept in repair by and under the direction of the surveyor of the highways for the time being of the said parish of Godmanchester, at the expense of all the proprietors of land and grounds divided and inclosed by virtue of the act in equal proportions." The drain or watercourse is the one mentioned in the award of the arbitrator hereinafter set out, and is known by the name of Stonehill Brook, and is the one in question in this mandamus. Stonehill Brook is situate within the corporate borough of Godmanchester, a district within the meaning of the Public Health Acts, exclusively consisting of the whole of the said corporate borough within and for which the defendants are the local board of health under the said acts. The arbitrator made an award in writing, as follows :

"The Stonehill Brook runs in the course which is delineated on the map hereto annexed, commencing at the road called the London Road and passing from thence through land called and known as the Dean and Chapter's land; thence through land called Bleckley's Farm; thence through land called Lady Olivia Sparrow's land; thence through the lands of various proprietors crossing a road called West Street, and terminating in the River Ouse. The whole length of its course between the London Road and the River Ouse is about one and a half mile. The water of Stonehill Brook between the London Road and West Street is solely supplied by the drainage, natural and artificial, of a considerable area of cultivated soil; but at West Street the drains of two or three inhabited houses empty themselves into the brook, and between West Street and the river Ouse the water of the brook stands at the level of that of the Ouse; with the exception of the drains at West Street just mentioned, no drains other than the drains, underground and open, of purely agricultural land discharge themselves in the brook. The channel of the brook is the natural channel of a certain natural stream, except so far as its character is altered by the facts next mentioned. The Inclosure Commissioners acting under a local inclosure act of the 43 Geo. 3, between the years 1802 and 1809, cleared out the channel of the said natural stream, and in various places along its course somewhat widened and deepened it, to render it more efficient as a means for draining a portion of the tract of land which was subject to the provisions of the said act. Afterwards, the owner of Bleckley's Farm, for greater convenience in subdividing his fields, diverted the course of the said natural stream by cutting for it an artificial channel, which commenced at the point where the said natural stream entered Bleckley's Farm from the Dean and Chapter's lands, and which artificial channel, after running a length of about seven chains, re-entered the old channel, the intervening portion of the old channel having been filled up and destroyed. For the same purpose and about the same period the owner of Lady Olivia Sparrow's land also diverted the course of the said natural stream, by making for it an artificial channel, which commenced at the point where the said natural stream passed from Bleckley's Farm to Lady Olivia Sparrow's land, and which artificial channel, after running a length of about 18 chains, re-entered the old channel very nearly at the further boundary of Lady Olivia Sparrow's land, the old channel being partially filled up, but being left and still remaining capable of acting as an escape channel for surplus waters. The natural channel of the said natural stream so altered and affected as just described, constitutes the existing channel of Stonehill Brook. The width of the channel of Stonehill Brook varies from about 14 feet at its upper extremity to about 15 feet at its lower, and its depth from about 3 feet to about 5 feet between the same limits. Before the inclosure under the said Inclosure Act, Stonehill Brook was cleared out and repaired, sometimes at the joint expense of all the owners of the land, subject to the provisions of that act, and sometimes by paupers of the parish of Godmanchester, under the direction of the overseer of the poor of the said parish for the time being, and paid by him out of the general poor-rates of that parish. After the said inclosure, for a short time, Stonehill Brook was cleared out and repaired when necessary by the paupers of the parish of Godmanchester, under the direction of the overseer of the poor of that parish for the time being, and paid by him out of the general poor-rates of the parish; but for the last thirty years or thereabouts it has been cleaned out and repaired by the owners of the lands through which it passes, each doing that portion of it which traverses his own land."

The special case further stated as follows: It is admitted that the said drain, sewer and watercourse, called Stonehill Brook, was and is in a foul, unclean and improper state and condition, so as to be a nuisance and injurious to health, as in the writ of mandamus alleged. It is also admitted that the said drain, sewer and watercourse, for want of being properly scoured, cleansed, emptied and kept, had become and was, before and at the time in that behalf in the writ mentioned, and still is, liable to overflow and damage, and then had overflowed and damaged the land of some of the Queen's subjects adjoining and near to the said drain, sewer and watercourse, and the public way, called the Gravelly Way, as in the writ of mandamus alleged.

The question for the opinion of the Court is, whether the prosecutor or the defendants is or are entitled to the verdict on the first and second pleas to the return to the writ. The verdict on these pleas is to be entered as the Court shall direct, it being agreed that the verdict is to be entered for the prosecutor on the third and fourth pleas to the return.

Keane (Douglas Brown and Markby with him), for the Crown.—The defendants are bound to cleanse and repair the Stonehill Brook. At the time of the Public Health Act, 1848, being applied to the borough, the brook existed as a sewer, and therefore vested in the defendants under the 2nd and 43rd sections of that act. By the first of those sections, "the word 'sewer' shall mean and include sewers and drains of every description, except drains to which the word 'drain' interpreted as aforesaid applies," and by section 43, "all sewers, whether existing at the time when this act is applied, or made at any time thereafter, (except sewers made by any person or persons for his or their own profit, or for the profit of proprietors or shareholders, and except sewers made and used for the purpose of draining, preserving or improving land under any local or private act of parliament, or for the purpose of irrigating land, and sewers under the authority of any Commissioners of Sewers appointed by the Crown,) together with all buildings, . . . shall vest in, belong to, and be entirely under the management and control of the local board of health." This brook is not within any of these exceptions. It may be said that it is within the exception, "sewers made and used for the purpose of draining, preserving or improving land under a local or private act of parliament," but it is not so, inasmuch as it is a natural stream, and was not "made" but only to some extent widened and deepened under the Inclosure Act. There are several sections following the 43rd which give to the local board the requisite powers for purchasing, making and cleansing sewers.

[CROMPTON, J. — It may become a "sewer" by use. MELLOR, J.—May it not come within the interpretation clause (section 2.) under the head of "waterworks," as being a "stream?"]

The Court cannot decide in favour of the defendants unless it holds that the alteration made by the board amounts to its being "made." Nor can a brook passing through fields be a drain. The Local Government Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98), in s. 68, shews that there may be "sewers" of another kind which the local board are not allowed to interfere with. Again, the word "made" in section 43. cannot be applied to this brook, inasmuch as it must mean something which the local act contemplated as to be made, and it was never intended that under the act the Commissioners should have power to do more than set out and appoint roads, drains, and watercourses—see 41 Geo. 3. c. 109. s. 10. which is referred to in the local act; and The Earl of Falmouth v. Richardson (1). Nor has it been used under the local act. There is another reason for saying that this was not a sewer which the local board were entitled to make. It is called one other drain, &c. Further, this brook was not made for the purpose of profit, and section 145. of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, which prohibits the interference by the local board with sewers or other works, only applies to such as had been made or used for the purpose of draining, improving or irrigating lands, or for such purposes of profit. This last section was intended to prevent the interference with such sewers as under section 43. would not vest in the board.

Yes, it comes within the interpretation clause, and not within the exception in section 43; but even if not a sewer it is a drain which is admitted to be offensive and injurious, and if so, under section 58, the local board are bound to cleanse it.

J. Brown, for the defendants.—According to the argument for the Crown, even watercourses would vest in the local board. But clearly that was not intended; the preamble of the act mentions "towns and populous places." This is called a brook, and there is nothing to shew that it was a sewer at all, and even if it were it would fall within the second exception in the 43rd section of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, as being made and used for the purpose of improving land under the Godmanchester Inclosure Act. It is clear also from the interpretation clause, section 2, that by "sewer" is intended something of the same kind as "drain." Again, the provisions in sections 44. and 58. apply to sewers which are used for the purposes of drainage only in the district of the board, not to watercourses which are repairable by the owners and proprietors under 41 Geo. 3. c. 109. s. 10, which is incorporated with the local act. It would be a great hardship on the ratepayers in the town if they were obliged to contribute to the repair and cleaning of such a watercourse which is really used for purposes of agriculture; the benefit which they derive from it is very small, and yet they would under section 88. have to pay a proportion of the rate amounting to three-fourths, while the proprietors, for whose benefit it would really be done, would only pay one-fourth.

Keane, in reply.—The provision in section 88. as to the occupiers being assessed in the proportion of one-fourth is in favour of the contention for the Crown, inasmuch as it shews that the board have power to levy rates in agricultural districts; and the argument as to hardship would apply equally to the rates assessed upon landowners for the benefit of the towns.

Cockburn, C.J.—Our judgment must be for the defendants. I entertain serious doubts whether the enactment in section 43. was ever intended to include sewers which were private property, for we find that by section 44, if the board think fit to take the rights vested in any persons of making sewers, they may purchase them, and it would be very strange if they could interfere with private rights without making any compensation for them. Such a power would be very dangerous, and I cannot think that, because a watercourse which passes through agricultural land is partly used for the purpose of draining houses, it becomes altogether a sewer, and vested in the Board of Health. But it is not necessary to decide this point, because the watercourse in question falls within the second exception in the 43rd section, if it is within that section at all. The case finds that the Commissioners by their award directed that all such drains and bridges should be for ever maintained at the expense of the proprietors of lands and grounds divided and inclosed by virtue of the said act. But then it is said that this is a drain which has been altered by widening and deepening it, as found in the award of the arbitrator; but it appears to me, sitting as a jurymen to decide this case, that this was done by the Commissioners for the profit of the proprietors, and at their expense, as was directed to be done by their own award, and as might legally be done. I am of opinion that it is within the second exception in section 43.

Crompton, J.—It is difficult to come to a clear understanding as to this case, but I have arrived at the same conclusion as my Lord. The question is how a jury ought to have found, and whether by reason of this stream having vested in the board, the duty of repairing and cleansing had been thrown upon them. It is not shewn to my satisfaction that it has so vested in the local board. I cannot think that such a natural stream, flowing through and draining agricultural districts, becomes a sewer simply because a few houses have their drains running into it. I can see nothing to make it a sewer except what was done by the Commissioners, and that would be done under the act, and therefore it would come within the second exception. It would be rather strong to say, that because the Commissioners widened it, it was made under the local act, and I am rather doubtful upon that. I should rather say it was done under the sanction of the proprietors of the lands. I think that if it comes within the 43rd section at all, it also comes within the second exception, and therefore that the local board are not bound to repair it.

Shree, J.—I am of the same opinion; it clearly was not a sewer, throughout the whole of its length, which would vest in the local board under the 43rd section, and even if it was, it would be within the exception.

Judgment for the defendants.

Nov. 25. } PYE v. BUTTERFIELD AND OTHERS.

Interrogatories — Ejectment — Forfeiture of Lease.

In the exercise of the powers conferred by section 51. of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, in allowing a party to deliver interrogatories to the opposite party, this Court will take as a guide the rules and principles acted upon in the courts of equity as to bills of discovery, although it will not consider itself to be fettered by those rules.

In an action of ejectment the Court will not compel the defendant to answer interrogatories where the answer would tend to shew that he had incurred a forfeiture of his lease by reason of his having underlet the premises.

This was a rule calling upon the defendant to shew cause why the plaintiff should not be at liberty to deliver to the defendant, or his attorney, interrogatories in writing, and why the defendant should not answer the questions in writing by affidavit.

It appeared that the plaintiff had brought an action of ejectment against the defendant and others, to recover possession of certain premises held by the defendant.

The following interrogatories were delivered under an order of Shee, J.—

1. Are you the lessee under the plaintiff of the house and premises, No. 18, Clifford Street, and is the house in your possession, or in whose possession is it?

2. Have you at any time assigned or otherwise parted with the said lease to any one, and, if so, to whom, and where and when?

3. Have you underlet or in any way or manner parted with the possession of the said house and premises, or any part thereof? and, if so, state when and to whom, and for how long.

4. Have you underlet the said house and premises to Mr. Grant Heatley Tod Heatley, and, if so, when and under what circumstances and for what purpose?

5. Do you receive any, and, if any, what rent for the said house and premises; and, if so, from whom, and how much?

6. Who is now in possession of the said house and premises, and is the person in possession there by your authority and permission, and did he derive his possession through you?

7. Have the said house and premises been let by you to be used as a club, or used for such purpose with your permission and authority?

The defendant answered these interrogatories as follows:

1. To the first of the said interrogatories, that I am the lessee under the plaintiff of the house and premises, No. 18, Clifford Street, and the lease is in my possession.

2. To the 2nd, 3rd, 4th, 5th, 6th, and 7th interrogatories, that this action in which K. J. P. is the plaintiff, and J. G. and T. B. and others are the defendants, and in which the said interrogatories are administered, is an action of ejectment brought by the plaintiff to recover possession of certain premises, No. 18, Clifford Street, held by me as tenant to the plaintiff under a lease, dated the 24th of March 1857, for twenty-one years, containing a covenant on my part not to assign over or underlet, or in any way or manner part with the possession of the said premises for any time during the term granted, to any person or persons, without the licence and consent in writing of the plaintiff, his executors, &c. for that purpose first had and obtained, and providing that if I should not well and truly observe and keep the said covenant, and all and every the covenants, clauses and agreements contained in the said lease, it should be lawful for the plaintiff at any time or times thereafter into and upon the said premises, or any part thereof in the name of the whole, wholly to re-enter, and the same to have again as in his first and former estate. And the plaintiff seeks to recover possession of the same premises and to enforce a forfeiture by reason of my having underlet the said premises to Grant Heatley Tod Heatley and Alexander Doland. And I object to answer the 2nd, 3rd, 4th, 5th, 6th and 7th interrogatories, on the ground that my answers may subject me to a forfeiture of my interest as tenant and lessee of the premises. And I respectfully submit to the Court that I am not bound to answer the said interrogatories, they having a tendency to shew that I had incurred a forfeiture.

Laxton shewed cause against the rule.— These interrogatories are such that the Court will not compel the defendant to answer them. The point has not been expressly decided, but the Courts have always been unwilling to make a defendant answer matters which would go to shew that he had committed a forfeiture. The point was touched upon in May v. Hawkins (1), where Parke, B. said, "I am sorry that the case should be decided upon the minor point; for it is very much to be desired that the Court should be in a position to decide the principal one. I shall continue to pursue the principle I acted upon in this case at chambers, by refusing to allow interrogatories which are framed with a view to deprive a man of his estate; I believe that this principle is always recognized in the Courts of Chancery, and I shall continue to act upon it until there is a decision to the contrary in the superior Courts." And Martin, B. said, "I take the same view of the matter as my Brother Parke. I think it would be monstrous to allow this enactment to be used for the purpose of fishing out information in a matter of such a penal character as the present." The point also arose in Chester v. Wortley (2); but the only decision was that the objection was taken at the wrong time. There is a provision in 46 Geo. 3. c. 37, that "a witness cannot by law refuse to answer a question relevant to the matter in issue, the answering of which has no tendency to accuse himself or to expose him to any penalty or forfeiture of any nature whatsoever, by reason only, or on the sole ground that the answering of such question may establish, or tend to establish, that he owes a debt, or is otherwise subject to a civil suit."

[COCKBURN, C.J. — I am inclined to think that that statute refers only to forfeiture in a legal sense, and not to a forfeiture arising out of a contract between the parties, and of a civil nature.]

The statute is referred to in 2 Ph. & A. on Evidence, p. 492, where it is also stated that "in courts of equity it is an established principle that a party is not bound to answer so as to subject himself to pains and penalties, or to any kind of punishment, or to any forfeiture of interest." But, further, it is clear from the language of the 51st section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, that reference must be made to the principles established in the courts of equity, for that section only gives power to deliver interrogatories "upon any matter as to which discovery may be sought." The meaning of these words was considered in Bartlett v. Lewis (3), where Erle, C.J. said, "Nor do I read the 51st section as saying, that the practice of the Court of Chancery in respect of bills of discovery is to be imported into the Courts of common law, and that we are not to permit questions to be put in the form of written interrogatories in any case in which a Court of equity would not allow them to be put. I think it means that interrogatories may be put in any case where a bill of discovery might be filed, but I do not think it is intended that the practice of the Court of equity relating to discovery should be introduced." Referring then to the question, whether a Court of equity would allow a bill of discovery to be filed in such a case, we find it stated, in Wigram on Discovery, p. 81, that the plaintiff is not entitled to an answer if the answer would prove the defendant guilty of "a forfeiture of interest strictly so called. But the objection does not apply to the mere determination of an interest by force of a limitation." Now, in the case before the Court, there would be a "forfeiture of interest," for the defendant would lose his estate. In Fane v. Atlee (4) a bill was filed to discover whether the defendant had not assigned over a lease; the defendant pleaded that there was a proviso in the lease that in case he assigned over, the lease should be void; and that this being in the nature of a penalty or forfeiture, he ought not to be compelled in a Court of equity to discover for the plaintiff. It was said that this was not a penalty, but a part of the contract, yet the plea was allowed. The case is cited in Milford on Pleadings, p. 333, where the author says, "It has been also observed, that no person is bound to answer so as to subject himself to any forfeiture, or to anything in the nature of a forfeiture." In Lord

Uxbridge v. Staveland (5), it was held that a demurrer would lie to a bill for discovery of an assignment of a lease with licence, if the bill does not expressly waive the forfeiture. The same doctrine is, in effect, laid down in Best on Evidence, 3rd ed. p. 757; and in Taylor on Evidence, p. 1236, it is written, "It has already been casually observed, that some questions a witness is not compellable to answer. First, this is the case where the answers would have a tendency to expose the witness . . . to a penalty or forfeiture of any nature whatsoever. This rule, which is of great antiquity, and was even recognized by Chief Justice Jefferies where it told against the prisoner, is not confined to Courts of law, but is also administered in Chancery," &c. It is submitted, therefore, that the Courts of equity would not allow this to be done, and that this Court will follow the rule laid down by them.

[CROMPTON, J.—Suppose at Nisi Prius, now that the parties can be examined, the defendant was called as to some other minor matters, it might be hard if he could refuse on cross-examination to answer whether he had not committed some act which would entail upon him the forfeiture of his lease. COCKBURN, C.J.—If he volunteers to give evidence upon some matters, or as to some alleged forfeiture, it may be that he would waive his privilege.]

Needham, in support of the rule.—This is a nice and important question. Neither May v. Hawkins (1) nor Chester v. Wortley (2) decides the question.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—The opinion expressed by Parke, B. in May v. Hawkins (1) is a very strong one. It appears also that the Courts of equity have always exercised a discretion.]

In Hare on Discovery, p. 145, it is stated, "if the bill seek a discovery of facts which would shew that the defendant never had an interest in the property which he wrongfully retains, or that having had an interest, that it has ceased by the taking effect of some limitation over, the defendant will not be allowed to set up the loss of possession which the proof of these facts would occasion, as a ground for withholding discovery"; and in Lucas v. Evans (6), where an estate was given by A. to his wife, but on condition that if she married again she should deliver up half to his brother, and a bill of discovery was filed to find out whether she was married, a demurrer to the bill was overruled.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—Yes, because it was a conditional limitation over of the estate, and was expressly distinguished as not coming within the general rule. But if you could do this, you might be perpetually harassing a man.]

The 51st section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, does not shew that the power of this Court is limited to cases where Courts of equity would allow bills of discovery; the natural meaning of the words is to give power to file such interrogatories where the party desires it and the Court is willing to grant it.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—There is nothing to shew that it was intended by this section of the statute that the common law Courts should acquire larger powers than the Courts of equity have been accustomed to exercise; and assuming that we had such larger powers, ought we to set at naught the principles upon which those Courts have acted for so many years? MELLOR, J.—There is no doubt that we may have power to order inspection of documents in cases where the Courts of equity would not grant a discovery, as, for instance, in actions for personal torts. In Miford on Pleadings, p. 230, reference is made to Glyn v. Hourton (7), where the Master of the Rolls said, "I have looked into the authorities which tend much to confirm my opinion that a bill of discovery cannot be sustained in aid of an action for a mere personal tort." COCKBURN, C.J.—That would not be within the province of a Court of equity at all.]

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think that this rule ought to be discharged. I do not think that the statute, 46 Geo. 3. c. 37, which relates to whether witnesses are to be compelled to answer and to their protection and punishment, is applicable to this case. And I do not think that the word "forfeiture," as there used, means such a forfeiture as in the case now before us, of a person having the possession of property and having committed a breach of covenant. But in the exercise of the powers recently conferred upon this Court, it seems to me that we ought to be governed by the principles which have been recognized in the Courts in which this branch of our jurisprudence was originally planted, nurtured and grown up. This power was given to us in order that the complication of business caused by the necessity of having recourse to other Courts should be prevented, and when the legislature gave us such power it must be taken to have done so with a knowledge of the rules according to which the power had always been administered in those other Courts, and therefore, whether we are free to exercise our own discretion, or whether it was intended that we should act in accordance with the Courts of equity, I think that we ought to abide by the principles and rules of those Courts. According to the authorities which have been cited and the expressions used by the text-writers who have written upon the subject, those rules are perfectly fixed and well established, that no man shall be compelled to give an answer which shall have an effect leading to the forfeiture of his estate, except when granted subject to a conditional limitation. It may be that the distinction is a fine and subtle one, but the right to file a bill of discovery in the case of an estate granted upon a conditional limitation is a well-established exception to the rule, that a party shall not be obliged to answer where the answer may have the effect of bringing about a forfeiture. The matter is too well established to admit of any doubt. It is also said that the Courts of equity have exercised a discretion whether they will allow a party to be forced to answer in any particular case, but I do not think that is so where the rule applies to which I have referred. I am of opinion that we cannot force the defendant to make this answer, which would be clearly in violation of the rule so well established in the Courts of equity.

CROMPTON, J.—I am of the same opinion. This is a rule calling upon the defendant to shew cause why he should not answer a question which would tend to the forfeiture of his lease. I do not myself think that we are bound by the exact procedure in the Courts of equity, for, as has been pointed out by my Brother Mellor, there is a class of cases in which those Courts would not allow a bill of discovery at all, and I do not feel clear that we are bound by their mode of procedure in the exercise of the new powers which have been given to us by the act of parliament; but the rules laid down by them as to bills of discovery ought to be a guide to us. I do not look at this privilege or exemption from the liability to answer, in cases where the answer would lead to a forfeiture, as an invention of those Courts, but rather as a rule adopted by them from the Courts of law. It is a principle of the law of evidence which these Courts have always recognized as applicable to the examination of witnesses, and everything shews that they were averse to extending the power of discovery to cases of forfeiture. From the earliest times the rule has been adopted in the Courts of equity with regard to discovery. It may be that the distinction between forfeitures and conditional limitations, where the estate is said to be given over by the donor upon the condition happening, is a very fine and subtle one. But the kind of forfeiture in question here is the one upon which nearly all the cases in equity have been decided. Dumport's case (8) is an instance of a forfeiture being claimed on the very same ground as in this case. We ought to be guided in this matter in the way suggested by Lord Wensleydale in May v. Hawkins (1); we all know how closely he considered the question, and how he acted, and how he said he should continue to act until one of the superior Courts decided to the contrary. So also was the opinion of my Brother Martin. We cannot disregard a rule so well established, and we ought not, therefore, to allow the questions to be put. As I said during the argument, I cannot help thinking that there may be considerable difficulty, now that the parties on both sides may be examined as witnesses; and I entertain considerable doubt whether or not when a party has been examined as a witness in his own behalf, either as to minor matters or as to some other forfeiture, he could be compelled to answer a question as to whether he had done something else which would lead to a forfeiture of his lease.

(8) 1 Smith's Lead. Cas. 15.

But that is not the question here which we have to decide.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with the distinction pointed out by my Lord and my Brother Crompton, that though we are not fettered by the rules of the Courts of equity, inasmuch as we exercise powers in some cases in which they do not grant discovery, yet that we ought in the exercise of the new powers given to us to take their rules as a guide. As was said by my Brother Crompton, this particular rule has been adopted as a rule of evidence by the Courts of equity, and I think that it is not to be left to the absolute discretion of the Judge or of the Court to decide without reference to what had been the procedure and practice in those Courts. I was at first struck with the subtlety of the distinction between forfeiture and conditional limitations, but, as has been already observed, that distinction, though a nice one, clearly establishes the rule, and in addition we have two cases in Chancery so clearly in point that no distinction between them and the present case can be pointed out by Mr. Needham; and we have besides the dicta of several Judges. We ought not, therefore, to allow these interrogatories to go.

TEFIORE AND OTHERS.

Marine Insurance—Partial Loss—Pleading—Inconsistent Counts—Payment into Court—Procedure—Jurisdiction of Court.

A declaration contained a count upon a policy of insurance upon a ship and cargo, and also the usual money counts. The defendants, as to the first count, pleaded that they had not broken their covenants, and they also paid into court, under the money counts, the amount of the premiums, and the plaintiffs took the money out of court. The cause was referred to arbitrators, to fix the amount of the loss, which they did, irrespective of the amount which had been paid into court:—Held, that the Court had power to prevent injustice being done to the defendants, and that the plaintiffs were only entitled to judgment for the balance which remained after deducting the amount of premiums paid into court.

Rule calling upon the plaintiffs to shew cause why the judgment roll should not be amended by entering the verdict for the sum awarded by the arbitrators, less the amount of premiums paid into court.

It appeared, from the affidavits, that an action had been brought upon a policy of insurance effected upon a ship called the Dos Hermanos and her cargo.

The declaration contained a count on the policy, and also the ordinary counts to recover back the premiums, on the ground that the policy had never attached. The defendants paid money into court upon the common counts; the plaintiffs took it out of court, and went on with the action. Before, however, going to trial an agreement was entered into between the respective attorneys, the material part of which was as follows: "That in case the plaintiffs shall be held to be entitled to recover as for a total or a partial loss in this action, on ship or cargo, or either of them, it shall be referred to Mr. Davidson and Mr. Richards, the average-staters of London, or in case they differ, to a third London average-stater, to be named by them, as umpire between them, to fix the amount of such total or partial loss, as the case may be, and the verdict shall be entered for such amount accordingly, not exceeding the amount of liability under the policy."

When the case came on for trial, it was agreed that a special case should be stated for the opinion of the Court upon the question whether the policy attached or not. The special case was argued in this court, and it was decided that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover. It was agreed, "for the purpose only of completing the judgment to enable the defendants to bring error," that judgment should be signed for 2,500*l.* damages, and costs 1,500*l.*; and upon appeal to the Exchequer Chamber, the judgment of this Court was affirmed. The arbitration was then proceeded with, and by their award the arbitrators fixed the amount of the "loss of both ship and cargo at the sum of 2,038*l.* 11*s.* 7*d.*"

A summons was then taken out by the plaintiffs to shew cause why the verdict should not be entered and final judgment signed for 2,123*l.* 10*s.* 3*d.*, being the amount of the sum awarded together with interest. It was discovered that, in making their award, the arbitrators had only considered the amount of the loss, but that they would have deducted the amount paid into court if they had thought that they were at liberty to do so. The defendants then obtained the rule above mentioned.

A rule to the same effect was also obtained by Cohen, in Carr v. Montefiore, and the two rules were brought on together.

Watkin Williams, in support of the rule.—There was only one true claim in this action; and the plaintiffs cannot be allowed to keep the amount due under the policy, and also the amount of the premiums. In Early v. Bowman (2), where money was paid into court upon an account stated, it was held that the plaintiff could not recover nominal damages under a special count upon a bill of exchange given for precisely the same amount as that about which the account had been stated. So here, the Court will not allow that which would be a perfect scandal, namely, that the plaintiff should be allowed to recover on the policy, and also to keep the premiums. Gould v. Oliver (3) is in point, as shewing that the plaintiff in an action cannot recover upon two counts which are inconsistent with one another. It was an action on a charter-party, and the declaration contained two counts: first, for not loading and taking care of the cargo; and, secondly, for general average. Money was paid into court on the second count, and the jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs on the first count, with general damages; Tindal, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the Court, says, at page 235, "The effect of the pleadings in the present case is this: the plaintiffs claim a total loss upon their goods, in consequence of the misconduct of the defendant; and in case they should fail in establishing such misconduct in the defendant, they claim a partial compensation for the sacrifice of their goods in the shape of general average. The defendant, admitting the second claim, pays it into court, which the plaintiffs take out, having no claim, in this view, beyond the amount paid in. But in so doing, they do not abandon the claim which they have preferred in the first count of the declaration, and upon which issues remain to be tried. They would not, indeed, be permitted to retain the whole amount of loss under the first count, and the amount of general average under the second," &c. And in the course of the argument (p. 221), his Lordship said: "You never could expect to recover upon two inconsistent counts;" and Bosanquet, J. asked "Can you recover on both?" The agreement entered into by the attorneys is really not of any importance as to the question now before the Court, for it only places the average-staters in the position of the jury.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—If the plaintiffs are entitled to have two strings to their bow, so ought the defendants. The plaintiffs are seeking to establish two claims which cannot co-exist.]

Just so. As to the question whether the Court has power to interfere, Cocker v. Temperst (4) is decisive, as shewing that every Court has unlimited power over its own process, and may stay proceedings brought against good faith.

Cohen, in support of the rule in Carr v. Montefiore.—This question is tacitly decided in many cases where the declaration contains a special count, and also common counts upon which the defendant pays money into court. The Judge tells the jury that, in determining the amount of damages, they ought to take into consideration the amount paid into court. So here, the plaintiffs are only entitled to recover what was due at the time of the verdict. In Churchill v. Day (5) Lord Tenterden said, "It would be dangerous to say that if money is paid into court, and in the declaration another count is found more accurately applicable to the plaintiff's cause of action, the effect of the payment should be defeated."

Milward was again heard.—Gould v. Oliver (3) does not decide the point now before the Court. The observations referred to were not necessary for the decision of the case. Upon the pleadings, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover both amounts and to keep them.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court was now delivered by—

CROMPTON, J. — In these cases, the plaintiffs having declared on policies of insurance with a count for money had and received, the defendants paid the amount of the premiums into court on that count, pleading to the count on the policies so as to raise, amongst other defences, that of unseaworthiness. The plaintiffs took the money out of court in satisfaction of the claim under the count for money had and received. At the trial, the defence of unseaworthiness having failed, or having been abandoned, a special case was stated for the opinion of this Court, which was afterwards taken into the Exchequer Chamber, and in both courts it was held that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover as for an average loss. The amount of the average loss was referred to and ascertained by arbitrators, but this not being done before the argument of the case, a nominal judgment for 4,000*l.* was entered up for the purpose of taking the case into error.

The plaintiffs are now to enter up their judgment and take out their execution for the amount to which they are entitled. And they claim to be entitled to enter their judgment and take out their execution for the entire amount of the average loss, without giving credit to the defendants for the amount paid into court and taken out by the plaintiffs. The defendants obtained rules nisi in effect to restrain the plaintiffs from taking judgment and execution for the entire amount of the loss, without giving credit for the sums paid in respect of the premiums.

It is obvious that nothing could be more unjust than that the plaintiffs should recover back the premiums, which they could only be entitled to on the ground that the risk under the policy did not attach, and also the whole amount of the loss to which they could only be entitled if the risk did attach. It is plain that what the plaintiffs were entitled to in the event which happened was the loss after deducting the premiums. It was said, however, on the part of the plaintiffs, that the state of the pleadings allowed them to perpetuate this injustice, and that the money which had been paid into court and taken out in satisfaction, could not in any way be treated as reducing the amount to which the plaintiffs were entitled in respect of their average loss. On the other hand, it was contended that the deduction in question was one which a jury ought, on the trial, to take into account in reduction of the damages. It was said that the jury, having ascertained the amount of the loss, have to inquire what is the damage to

When the case came on for trial, it was agreed that a special case should be stated for the opinion of the Court upon the question whether the policy attached or not. The special case was argued in this court, and it was decided that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover. It was agreed, "for the purpose only of completing the judgment to enable the defendants to bring error," that judgment should be signed for 2,500*l.* damages, and costs 1,500*l.*; and upon appeal to the Exchequer Chamber, the judgment of this Court was affirmed. The arbitration was then proceeded with, and by their award the arbitrators fixed the amount of the "loss of both ship and cargo at the sum of 2,038*l.* 11*s.* 7*d.*"

A summons was then taken out by the plaintiffs to shew cause why the verdict should not be entered and final judgment signed for 2,123*l.* 10*s.* 3*d.*, being the amount of the sum awarded together with interest. It was discovered that, in making their award, the arbitrators had only considered the amount of the loss, but that they would have deducted the amount paid into court if they had thought that they were at liberty to do so. The defendants then obtained the rule above mentioned.

A rule to the same effect was also obtained by Cohen, in Carr v. Montefiore, and the two rules were brought on together.

Watkin Williams, in support of the rule.—There was only one true claim in this action; and the plaintiffs cannot be allowed to keep the amount due under the policy, and also the amount of the premiums. In Early v. Bowman (2), where money was paid into court upon an account stated, it was held that the plaintiff could not recover nominal damages under a special count upon a bill of exchange given for precisely the same amount as that about which the account had been stated. So here, the Court will not allow that which would be a perfect scandal, namely, that the plaintiff should be allowed to recover on the policy, and also to keep the premiums. Gould v. Oliver (3) is in point, as shewing that the plaintiff in an action cannot recover upon two counts which are inconsistent with one another. It was an action on a charter-party, and the declaration contained two counts: first, for not loading and taking care of the cargo; and, secondly, for general average. Money was paid into court on the second count, and the jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs on the first count, with general damages; Tindal, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the Court, says, at page 235, "The effect of the pleadings in the present case is this: the plaintiffs claim a total loss upon their goods, in consequence of the misconduct of the defendant; and in case they should fail in establishing such misconduct in the defendant, they claim a partial compensation for the sacrifice of their goods in the shape of general average. The defendant, admitting the second claim, pays it into court, which the plaintiffs take out, having no claim, in this view, beyond the amount paid in. But in so doing, they do not abandon the claim which they have preferred in the first count of the declaration, and upon which issues remain to be tried. They would not, indeed, be permitted to retain the whole amount of loss under the first count, and the amount of general average under the second," &c. And in the course of the argument (p. 221), his Lordship said: "You never could expect to recover upon two inconsistent counts;" and Bosanquet, J. asked "Can you recover on both?" The agreement entered into by the attorneys is really not of any importance as to the question now before the Court, for it only places the average-staters in the position of the jury.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—If the plaintiffs are entitled to have two strings to their bow, so ought the defendants. The plaintiffs are seeking to establish two claims which cannot co-exist.]

Just so. As to the question whether the Court has power to interfere, Cocker v. Temper (4) is decisive, as shewing that every Court has unlimited power over its own process, and may stay proceedings brought against good faith.

Cohen, in support of the rule in Carr v. Montefiore.—This question is tacitly decided in many cases where the declaration contains a special count, and also common counts upon which the defendant pays money into court. The Judge tells the jury that, in determining the amount of damages, they ought to take into consideration the amount paid into court. So here, the plaintiffs are only entitled to recover what was due at the time of the verdict. In Churchill v. Day (5) Lord Tenterden said, "It would be dangerous to say that if money is paid into court, and in the declaration another count is found more accurately applicable to the plaintiff's cause of action, the effect of the payment should be defeated."

Milward was again heard.—Gould v. Oliver (3) does not decide the point now before the Court. The observations referred to were not necessary for the decision of the case. Upon the pleadings, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover both amounts and to keep them.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court was now delivered by—

The plaintiffs are now to enter up their judgment and take out their execution for the amount to which they are entitled. And they claim to be entitled to enter their judgment and take out their execution for the entire amount of the average loss, without giving credit to the defendants for the amount paid into court and taken out by the plaintiffs. which the plaintiffs were entitled, and that there were many cases in which circumstances occurring after the prima facie damage has occurred are allowed to reduce the damages. Thus part payment after action brought has always been held to reduce the damages. So, in trover, the return of the goods goes in reduction of damages. In the case of an executor de son tort who has interfered with the estate and so converted it, if he has paid debts, he is "recouped," as it is called, in damages.

It is unnecessary to decide this question in the present case, because we think that the Court has the power of preventing the plaintiffs from proceeding to carry out by its process such a piece of injustice as they are here contemplating. In Gould v. Oliver (3), where money was paid into court on a count inconsistent with that on which the plaintiff recovered, it was insisted that, by taking the money out of court, the plaintiff had estopped himself from recovering on the inconsistent count. The Court held, that such estoppel ought not to prevail, but that each count must be dealt with independently of the rest of the record; but Tindal, C.J. remarked, that the plaintiffs would not be permitted to retain the whole amount of the loss under the first count, and the amount of the general average under the second. This remark, though said not to be necessary to or part of the matter decided, was strictly pertinent to the matter under the consideration of the Court, being an answer to an objection that might have arisen that, if there was an estoppel, the plaintiff, having got the money, could not be made to part with what he had taken out of court, and that so the plaintiff could recover it twice over. No, says the Chief Justice, the Court will not allow him to retain it and take the whole loss besides. Now here, the plaintiff would get besides his indemnity from loss on the policy, the amount of the premiums. In other words, he would get back the price he has paid and the thing bargained for as well. We think he cannot be permitted to retain both. The expression of the Chief Justice seems to point to the power inherent in these Courts by stay of proceedings or otherwise to prevent the abuse of their process.

For these reasons, we are of opinion that the defendants are entitled to the relief which they pray for, and that the rule should be made absolute to prevent the plaintiffs from signing judgment or issuing execution for any larger amount, in respect of damages, than the balance of the average loss ascertained by the average-staters after deducting the amount of the premiums paid into court.

Rule accordingly, without costs.

Rule absolute.

Debtor and Creditor—Composition Deed—Release—Covenant not to sue—Sureties—Bankruptcy Act, 1861, s. 192.

To a declaration upon a bill of exchange, the defendant pleaded a composition deed executed by himself and three-fourths in value of his creditors whose debts amounted to 10l. and upwards. By the deed, set out in the plea, the defendant agreed to set apart half his income until a composition of 5s. in the pound should be paid to all the creditors respectively. The creditors who executed the deed agreed thereby to accept "these presents in full discharge and satisfaction of their respective debts, claims and demands" against the defendant; and they, by the deed, released the defendant from all their debts and claims against him, and agreed that the deed might "operate as a defence pleadable in bar to or be otherwise set up as a defence to any action," &c. The deed also contained a proviso that it should not operate to prevent any of the creditors from claiming or realizing any security held by them, or from suing any person, other than the said debtor, liable for payment of such security, nor in any way prejudice or affect the rights or remedies of any such creditors, except as against the said debtor (the defendant). The plea then alleged performance of the several requirements of section 192. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861:—Held, that the plea disclosed a good defence to the action.

Declaration on a bill of exchange drawn by the plaintiff and accepted by the defendant.

Plea—1. As to the first count, that after the accruing of the causes of action and contracting the debts in the declaration mentioned, and after action brought, a composition deed within the true intent and meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, was executed by the defendant, then being a debtor within the said act, and was a deed made and entered into between the defendant, so being such debtor, and his creditors relating to his debts and liabilities, and his release therefrom; which deed was and is in the words and figures and to the effect following, that is to say: "This indenture, made the 18th day of March, 1864, between Edward Elkins of No. 59, Newman Street, Oxford Street, in the county of Middlesex, gentleman (hereinafter called the debtor), of the first part; James Lane, of Greenford, in the said county, Esq. (hereinafter called the trustee), of the second part; and the several persons whose names are subscribed and seals affixed in the schedule hereunder written, or who shall, before or after the execution hereof by the said debtor, in writing, assent to or approve of this deed or instrument—being respectively in their own right, either individually or in co-partnership with others, or being agents or attornies of, creditors of the said debtor, on behalf of themselves and all and every other the creditors of the said debtor (hereinafter called the creditors), of the third part. Whereas the said debtor is and standeth indebted to the parties hereto of the third part, and all those who are or are intended to be bound by these presents, in divers sums of money respectively; and whereas the said debtor being unable immediately to pay his said creditors the amount of their several debts or claims against him in full, hath lately proposed to them, and it hath been mutually agreed between the said parties hereto of the second and third parts respectively, that the said debtor should pay all and every the creditors of him the said debtor, whether executing, assenting to or approving of this deed or not, and that they the said creditors should accept from him the sum or composition of 5s. in the pound on the full amount and in full discharge of all and every the debts of the said debtor due and owing by him at the time of the execution of these presents, in manner and at the times hereinafter mentioned, and that the said debtor should make such provision for the payment of the said sum or composition of 5s. in the pound, and enter into such covenants, provisions and agreements as are hereinafter contained, and that the said creditors should execute the release hereinafter provided: Now this indenture witnesseth that, in pursuance of the said agreement and in consideration of the premises, he the said debtor doth hereby for himself, his heirs, executors and administrators, covenant, promise and agree with the said trustee on behalf of himself and the said creditors respectively, and their respective executors, administrators, partners and partner, that he the said debtor shall and will set apart and appropriate one equal half part or moiety of his future net income or profits to be derived and received by him from his professional fees and emoluments as an attorney and solicitor [here followed provisions for ascertaining the income of the debtor, and paying over the composition of 5s. in the pound]. And this indenture further witnesseth that, in further pursuance of the said agreement and in consideration of the premises and of the said covenant of the said debtor, they the said creditors do hereby severally for themselves, and their respective heirs, executors, administrators, partners, partner and successors, covenant and agree with the said debtor, his executors and administrators, to accept and take, and they do hereby accept and take, these presents in full discharge and satisfaction of their respective debts, claims and demands against or upon him the said debtor, his estate and effects. And they the said creditors, in further pursuance of the said agreement, and for the considerations aforesaid, do, and each and every of them doth, by these presents, for themselves and their respective heirs, executors, administrators, partners, partner and successors, freely, clearly and absolutely remise, release, exonerate, discharge and for ever quit claim unto the said debtor, his heirs, executors and administrators, and his and their future lands, tenements, goods and chattels, estate and effects, all and singular their, and each and every of their said respective debts, claims and demands now due and owing to them respectively, and all and all manner of action and actions, suit and suits, cause and causes of action and suit, bills, bonds, writings obligatory, debts, sums of money, promissory and other notes, IOUs, dues, duties, accounts, reckonings, costs, charges, expenses, agreements, judgments, decrees, decretal or other orders, warrants of attorney, defeazances, extents, executions, quarrels, controversies, trespasses, damages, claims and demands, whether admitted or not, whatsoever, both at law and in equity, or otherwise howsoever, which they the said creditors and their respective heirs, executors and administrators, partners, partner and successors now have, ever had, or shall or may or otherwise could or might hereafter have, claim, challenge, or demand of, from and against him the said debtor, his heirs, executors or administrators, or his or their lands and tenements, goods and chattels, estate and effects, or any of them, for or by reason or on account of the debts, claims or demands of them, or any of them respectively, now due and owing or claimed to be due and owing from the said debtor, and all interest and arrears of interest for or in respect of the same several debts and premises, or any of them, or for or by reason or on account of any other matter, cause or thing whatsoever relating thereto antecedent to and including the day of the date hereof; and these presents shall and may accordingly operate as a defeazance pleadable in bar to or may be otherwise set up as a defence to any action or actions, suit or suits, or other proceedings at law or in equity heretofore or hereafter brought, instituted or taken by or on the behalf of the said creditors, or any of them, their or any of their heirs, executors or administrators, partners, partner or successors, for or in respect of such debts, claims and demands, or any of them. Provided always, and it is hereby agreed and declared by and between the said parties hereto, that the execution, assenting to, or approval of these presents and the acceptance of the said sum or composition of 5s. in the pound, at the times, by the means and in manner hereinbefore mentioned, and the release hereinbefore contained, shall not in anywise prejudice, affect, or extend or be construed to extend to prevent any of the said creditors from claiming or realizing any security now held by them, or any of them, or from suing any person or persons, other than the said debtor, liable to payment thereof, for the recovery thereof less the amount received by them, or any of them, under and by virtue of these presents, nor in any way prejudice or affect the rights or remedies of any such creditors except as against the said debtor, to which, but for agreeing to or signing these presents, they might severally have recourse to for the recovery of their several debts or demands; but, nevertheless, if any such security shall be enforceable against the said debtor or his estate or effects, then and in that case such creditor (unless he shall consent to abandon his said security) shall be entitled to receive payment of his secured debts, under these presents, upon so much only of his said secured debt or debts as may remain after such security shall have been realized, or after credit shall have been given for the full value thereof, such value to be ascertained as in bankruptcy. And, moreover, it is hereby lastly agreed and declared by and between the said parties that these presents are intended to operate, and shall (so far as lawfully may be) operate to all intents and purposes whatsoever as a deed of composition within the provisions of the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, in that behalf, and that so soon as a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the creditors of the said debtor whose debts shall respectively amount to 10% and upwards shall have executed, or in writing assented to or approved of this deed, it is intended that the same shall be registered in the Court of Bankruptcy under the provisions of the said act, and the general orders made thereunder in that behalf, in order that the said debtor may obtain the protection of the said Court granted under the said act, for the purpose of being available to him for all purposes as a protection in bankruptcy, and that all the creditors of the said debtor who would be bound by this deed in case it were a deed of composition or trust-deed for the benefit of creditors within the true intent and meaning of the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and in case all the conditions mentioned in the said act in that behalf had been observed, shall be equally bound by and entitled to the benefit of this deed, and that any provision herein to the contrary shall be void and of none effect. In witness, &c.

And the defendant says that the said deed has become and is as valid, effectual and binding on all the creditors of the defendant as if they had duly executed the same, and that all the conditions in the said act in that behalf mentioned have been observed; and that a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the creditors of the defendant, whose debts amounted respectively to 10% and upwards, have executed, or in writing assented to, or approved of the said deed, and that the execution of the said deed by the defendant was attested by an attorney and solicitor, and that within twenty-eight days from the day of execution of the said deed by the defendant, the same was produced and left, having been first duly stamped at the office of the Chief Registrar in Bankruptcy, for the purpose of being registered; and that together with the said deed there was delivered to the said Chief Registrar such affidavit as by the said act is in that behalf required, and that the said deed has been duly registered and notice thereof duly given, and a certificate of registration obtained according to the said act, and that all other conditions prescribed by the said act were observed and performed, and that all things were done and happened which were necessary to have been done and to happen to give validity to the said deed as a composition deed under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and that the plaintiff became and was and is bound by the said deed, with respect to the debt sued, for as if the plaintiff had been a party thereto and had duly executed the same; and that the defendant was and is released and discharged from the claim in the declaration by the said deed, and by the provisions of the said act and of the said deed having been complied with by him.

Demurrer and joinder in demurrer.

Cleasby, in support of the demurrer to the plea.—The deed is no bar to this action under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, nor would it be any bar at common law. It purports to contain a release to the debtor of all debts, claims and demands, although it afterwards provides that such release shall not prejudice any of the creditors in suing upon any security held by them against any person other than the debtor. This shews that it could not have been intended that it should operate as a release, for a release to one joint debtor will operate as a release to all. It therefore ought to be treated as a covenant not to sue, and not as a release—Price v. Barker (1); and it cannot be pleaded in bar to the action. The only reason why a covenant not to sue is allowed to be pleaded in bar is in order to avoid circuity of action, but that reason would not apply here, inasmuch as the creditor would not be liable to an action. The case of The Ipsstones Park Iron Ore Company v. Pattinson (2) is very nearly the same as the present, and there the Court of Exchequer held, that the deed afforded no answer to the action, but that the remedy was either by application to the Court of Bankruptcy, or, after judgment, to a Court of law to stay execution.

[CROMPTON, J.—It would be against the intention of the deed that this should be a covenant not to sue, and if so it must be a release. This seems to me to be good as an equitable plea, and a Court of equity would grant a perpetual injunction.]

Eyre v. Archer (3) shews that a deed in the form given in Schedule D, assented to and executed by the creditors, cannot be pleaded in bar to an action for a debt in respect to which the creditor has so assented.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—There is no release at all in a deed in that form, which is very distinguishable from a deed under section 192, where there is a release. CROMPTON, J.—I think that Clapham v. Atkinson (4), which has been affirmed in the Exchequer Chamber (5), is decisive of the present question.]

No; the proposition now suggested was not brought before the Court in that case; and in Dell v. King (6), the Court in a considered judgment said, that "the debtor has no right to make his creditor covenant, nor has he any right to subject him to a loss of his debt if he think fit to contest the validity of the deed."

The effect of such a deed as this is, that those only who execute it disable themselves from suing the debtor. The proposition above cited from Dell v. King (6) was slightly modified in Hidson v. Barclay (7), where Bramwell, B. in delivering the judgment of the Court stated, "We said in Dell v. King (6), that the debtor has no right to make his creditor covenant. Without saying that in no case would a covenant imposed on a creditor be valid, we abide by this opinion, that no covenant can be imposed on him beyond what is necessary for the release of the debtor, and these covenants are not. We think therefore they are unreasonable and bad."

Mellish, contra.—It is clear that if the plaintiff had executed this deed, the defendant would have been released, and the plaintiff is now in the same position as if he had done so, inasmuch as by the statute the assent of the required majority binds all the other creditors. The action is by drawer against acceptor, and by the deed the creditors agree to accept the composition offered, and to release the defendant from the debts due to them. It therefore becomes an absolute release. Then, the proviso which has been relied on is inoperative, because it may be that there is no joint debtor or surety, and if so the proviso will not prevent the deed from operating as a release to the debtor from all his debts, and indeed any provision in such a deed which is inconsistent with the general intention and principal object of it may be rejected. Price v. Barker (1) is admitted to be law, but a covenant not to sue is a bar to an action by the party bound by the covenant. The only real question is, whether the deed is productive of inequality between the creditors who have securities and those who have not. There is, no doubt, considerable difficulty in saying how deeds of this kind ought to be framed with regard to the remedies against sureties, but it would be manifestly unjust that a solvent surety should be discharged altogether.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—You may say that there is really no inequality. CROMPTON, J.—It seems to be an engagement on the face of it to take as an accord and satisfaction the agreement by the debtor to go on with his business and keep his accounts, &c. in the way mentioned, and to pay the composition.]

Yes; and the defendant is entitled to put the case as if the plaintiff had executed the deed. No Court of equity would allow him to sue the defendant. The plaintiff is seeking to take advantage of the technical effect at common law of a covenant not to sue.

Cleasby did not reply.

COCKBURN, C.J.—We are all agreed that our judgment ought to be for the defendant. We are not called upon to proceed upon the ground taken by the Court of Exchequer in The Ipstones Park Iron Ore Company v. Pattinson (2). It is not necessary that we should say what would be the effect of the clauses in the Bankruptcy Act in cases of deeds in which there was no release—whether the effect would be to give the debtor a remedy by having recourse to the Court of Bankruptcy, or whether he would be able to plead the deed in bar to the action. In the case before us we have matter which was not present in the case referred to; we have a release by the creditors; and for the purpose of considering Mr. Cleasby's argument, a release which is qualified by the reservation of the right of the creditors in proceeding against the sureties. Now, Mr. Cleasby says that according to legal principles, such a release of the debtor would not operate as a release absolutely, but only as a covenant not to sue; but he seems to admit that the effect of such a release might be pleaded in bar to an action brought by a person who was a party to the deed; though he contends that it could not be so pleaded to an action by a person who is only a party to the deed by reason of the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, in section 192. But I find that those provisions amount to a statutory enactment that, with regard to a creditor who does not execute the deed, the release shall, if the requirements of the section are carried out, be as valid and effectual and binding on him as if he had been a party to and had duly executed the same. The execution by the necessary proportion of the creditors is therefore considered as the execution of all the others, and the creditor who does not execute must be taken as being bound by the deed. But I feel, after what Mr. Melish has said, that we need not decide the case upon that ground; for it seems to me that there is here a good release to the debtor, and not merely a covenant not to sue. Mr. Melish says that it is an absolute release by all the creditors, with the exception of those who have sureties, in which case they reserve to themselves the right to proceed against them. Now, the plaintiff has no person in the position of a co-debtor, and therefore he has absolutely released the debtor; the only way the objection could prevail would be by reason of producing inequality among the creditors; but the statute says that the deed shall be binding unless it contains something unreasonable. Now, to make it unreasonable on the ground of inequality among the creditors, there ought to be some substantial inequality. In substance and essence, whether it be a release or a covenant not to sue, the deed may be set up to prevent an action being brought against the debtor. I cannot see any real effectual inequality, or anything to shew that it is unreasonable; and therefore I hold it a good deed under section 192, and that the plaintiff is bound by it.

CROMPTON, J.—I have come to the same conclusion. I do not see any inequality in the case, as the assenting and non-assenting creditors are in the same position. Looking at it altogether, I think it does not operate as a release to the destruction of all the debt. I think a release would be entirely unfair on the non-assenting creditors if they had sureties against whom their claims could be enforced. This deed is prepared in the usual manner. This case is quite different from The Ipstones Park Iron Ore Company v. Pattinson (2), for in that case there was no agreement not to sue, or that the debtor should be discharged. Then, taking this to be an agreement not to sue, I think the plea is good as shewing an equitable, if not a legal, defence to the action. It is this: "We, the creditors, will take this agreement in accord and satisfaction of the debts due to us from you, and we will not bring any action against you in respect of any of such debts;" that is an agreement entered into by the creditors for a good consideration; and a Court of equity would restrain them from bringing an action upon it, and would say, you shall not sue the debtor. It is almost necessary that a deed of this kind must contain a clause reserving the rights against sureties, and the deed seems to be a fair one in that respect. We must look to see what the effect of the deed is. I do not doubt, and I am confirmed by Clapham v. Atkinson (4), that the creditors take the agreement for the composition in the deed as an accord and satisfaction of their debts. In that case there were the words, we "have agreed to accept such composition as aforesaid," and then the words, "severally undertake and agree to execute a good and sufficient release in the law of our several respective claims and demands upon him," when called upon to do so. In the present case the creditors agree not to sue their debtor, which appears to me to be just the same, and to be a bar to the action by section 192. Clapham v. Atkinson (4) is practically the same as the case now before us; and if we were to decide this case in favour of the plaintiff, we should be going against the decision of the Exchequer Chamber. The plea is good, as shewing an equitable defence to the action, and our judgment must be for the defendant.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. The object of the 192nd section is to allow a large number of creditors and the debtor to make what, in their judgment, appears to be the arrangement most satisfactory for them all; but as they are to have the power of binding the non-assenting creditors, it is necessary to import this: that the deed must be one which three-fourths in value agree to, and that it must be a reasonable deed. That being so, the moment it has been executed by the required majority all are bound by it. If the remedies against sureties be not preserved, I cannot understand how, with any degree of fairness, the majority, who have claims upon the debtor alone, could impose upon the minority, who have also claims against sureties, the result of being bound by the deed. If we were to decide this case in favour of the plaintiff, we should defeat the intention of the legislature. I am clearly of opinion that though this may be a covenant not to sue the debtor, yet that, in truth and in substance, it is a discharge which may be pleaded in bar to the action.

SHEK, J.—I am of the same opinion. We are to endeavour to give effect to the 192nd section, which enacts, that every deed made "between a debtor and his creditors, or any of them, or a trustee on their behalf, relating to the debts and liabilities of the debtor; and his release therefrom ... shall be as valid and effectual and binding on all the creditors of such debtor as if they were parties to and had duly executed the same, provided" the specified conditions be observed. Now, this deed purports to be, and is, a release of the debts due from the debtor; but it has been argued that it cannot be so, because it is of the essence of a release that if the debts due to the principal are released, there can be no remedy against the sureties, and that inasmuch as in this deed the remedy against the sureties is kept up, it cannot be a release; but I think that Mr. Cleasby has attributed to the release rather more efficacy than it of necessity has, for in many releases a remedy against sureties is reserved, and it appears to me that this deed contains just such a reservation. It amounts to a covenant by those of the creditors upon whom the act makes it binding not to sue the debtor. It is said also that there is inequality; but there is only such an inequality as a Court of equity or the Court of Bankruptcy would give effect to, and the deed is not so unequal as to make it invalid.

Judgment for the defendant.

1864. Nov. 11.	{	GLEDSTANES AND OTHERS v. THE CORPORATION OF THE ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSUR- ANCE.
-------------------	---	--

Marine Insurance—Declaration of Risk —Knowledge of Loss.

The plaintiffs were the London agents of an insurance company having an agent also in Calcutta: the defendants were a London insurance company. By a course of dealing between the plaintiffs' company and the defendants, an open policy was from time to time effected by the plaintiffs with the defendants, "lost or not lost, from Calcutta to the United Kingdom, on goods, to cover the excess over 5,000l. which might be taken by the Calcutta agent of the plaintiffs' company in any one ship, on first-class ship or ships as may be declared." As soon as the Calcutta agent had ascertained that there was an excess of 5,000l. in any one ship on a policy granted by the plaintiffs' company, he wrote to the plaintiffs to appropriate such excess to the current open policy effected with the defendants, and the plaintiffs, as soon as the letter reached London, declared to the defendants the name of the ship and the amount of excess, which were indorsed on the back of the policy. On the 15th of February 1860, the Calcutta agent wrote to the plaintiffs notifying an excess in the ship R. G. On the 16th of March 1860, a telegram was made known to the plaintiffs and the defendants—"Calcutta, March 10, Ship R. G. burnt, some cargo will be saved." On the 17th of March the plaintiffs appropriated the whole of the amount remaining on the then current policy of the defendants to other ships. On the 19th of March a policy in the usual terms, which was expressed "to succeed" the last current policy, was effected by the plaintiffs with the defendants. On the 21st of March the plaintiffs in due course received the letter from Calcutta of the 15th of February, and immediately notified to the defendants that the excess of 5,000*l.* on the R. G. would be appropriated to the policy of the 19th of March; and on the 26th of March, on receiving the full particulars from Calcutta, they indorsed the amount of excess on the policy, which the defendants disputed their right to do:—Held, that the plaintiffs could recover the excess in the R. G. on the policy of the 19th of March, as the appropriation and declaration were sufficient; and that the fact of the loss of the R. G. being known to both parties at the time the policy was granted did not affect it, as it was not then known to the plaintiffs or the defendants that the plaintiffs' company had any excess of insurance on board.

Semble, that if this had been then known, the plaintiffs could still have recovered.

CASE stated by consent, without pleadings.

This was an action brought to recover 2,715*l.*, as the amount of a partial loss alleged to have attached, under one or other of certain open policies, effected by the plaintiffs with the defendants, on goods insured in the sum of 7,699*l.* 1*l.* 3*d.*, whereof 4,738*l.* was declared on the policies hereinafter mentioned, by ship or ships, in respect of the cargo of the ship Red Gauntlet, which was totally lost by fire at Calcutta under the circumstances hereinafter set forth.

The plaintiffs are merchants in London and act as the agents there of the Hong-Kong Insurance Company. This company is established at Hong-Kong, and carries on the business of marine insurance there and elsewhere, and they have an agent established at Calcutta with general authority to underwrite policies on their behalf.

The course of business of the company in taking risks at Calcutta, so far as it is material to the question that arises on this case, is as follows: Merchants at Calcutta intending to make consignments of merchandise, for example, to the United Kingdom, and being desirous of securing insurances upon the same with the company, make application to that effect to the agent of the company, some time before the goods are actually shipped, or even the name of the intended ship is known, or the precise quantity or particulars of the merchandise is defined; and if the application is accepted, a slip naming the risk accepted in general terms, but without naming the ship or specifying the particulars of the merchandise, is delivered to the assured, and as soon as the particular ship is determined on a formal policy of insurance, expressed to be upon the whole amount of merchandise which the assured may consign by that particular ship, is drawn up and delivered to the assured. What quantity of merchandise is covered by such policy remains uncertain until the same is actually shipped.

Under these circumstances the company do not know at the time of issuing a policy of insurance, as above mentioned, what may prove ultimately to be the amount of risk taken by them on any particular ship; and, not deeming it expedient to take upon themselves risks to a greater extent than 5,000*l.* upon any one ship, the plaintiffs, as their agents in London, effect, on their behalf, with the defendants and others, open policies of insurance to cover the several amounts, if any, which the company may have taken in excess of 5,000*l.* upon any one ship. The maximum amount of value to be insured in these policies is fixed therein, as will presently appear.

In accordance with the course of business, the plaintiffs effected a policy of insurance with the defendants, dated the 8th of October 1858, numbered 22,122, for 7,000*l.*, the subject of insurance being described and valued as follows: "Lost or not lost at and from Calcutta to a port in the United Kingdom, being on goods. Free of all average; part of 10,000*l.* To cover the excess of 5,000*l.* which may be taken by the Calcutta agent of the Hong-Kong Insurance Company on any one ship. Warranted to be shipped on or before the 31st of March 1859." The ships were described as "first-class ship or ships as may be declared."

As a fact the Calcutta agent of the Hong-Kong Insurance Company had taken risks on goods which exceeded 5,000*l.* on single ships; and from time to time as the plaintiffs received advices from the company to that effect, stating the names of the ships and the particulars of the amounts of excess on each ship, the plaintiffs made declarations of the amounts and names of the ships to the defendants, and indorsements were made of the declarations upon the back of the policy. (The indorsements on the back of the policy were set out, the last being dated the 16th of March 1859.) The particulars of the subjects of risks covered by this policy were thus on the 16th of March 1859 completed, the policy fully appropriated, or, as it is sometimes expressed, "consumed."

On the 12th of February 1859, before the last-mentioned policy was fully appropriated, the plaintiffs proposed to effect a further policy of the same kind for 7,000*l.* This proposition was made by means of a memorandum which was indorsed on the back of the policy of the 8th of October 1858, as follows: "12th February, 7,000*l.* to follow this," and this proposal being accepted another policy, numbered 3686/33 and dated February the 14th, 1859, was effected for 7,000*l.*, being expressed to be "on goods, part of 1,000*l.*, to cover the excess of 5,000*l.* on any one ship free of all average, to follow and succeed policy No. 22,122, 8th of October 1858, warranted to be shipped on or before the 30th of June 1859"—"ships" being inserted where the blank occurred for the name of the ship. This policy was in like manner appropriated by declarations indorsed thereon as before; the last of which, being upon part value of a policy on the ship W. W. Smith, was dated the 7th of November 1859.

A similar policy was also opened by the plaintiffs with the defendants, numbered 7529/30, and dated the 31st of March 1859, also for 7,000*l.*, "being upon goods part of 10,000*l.*, to follow and succeed policy No. 3686, dated the 14th of February 1859, warranted to be shipped on or before the 31st of December 1859," and a memorandum was indorsed on policy No. 3686/33, as follows: "31st of March, 7,000*l.* to follow this at 30/." In this policy of the 31st of March 1859, the ships were described as "A 1, British built, or equal thereto." On the 7th of November 1859, the first indorsement was made upon this policy, and was upon the remainder of the Hong-Kong Insurance Company's policy on the ship W. W. Smith, partly appropriated by the last indorsement on the preceding policy as above mentioned.

On the 16th of March 1860, there remained still 5,000*l.* unappropriated upon the open policy dated the 31st of March 1859.

On the same day the following telegram arrived in London by the Red Sea and India Telegraph, having been despatched from Calcutta six days previously.

"At 6-27 Friday, the 16th of March 1860, received the following message.

From Malta, dated 15. Time 8 P.M.

To Lloyd's, London.

Ship Red Gauntlet, bound to London, burnt and scuttled, some cargo will be saved. Calcutta, March 10, 16-8-22 A.M.

Lloyd, Calcutta."

This telegram became known to the plaintiffs and defendants on the same day (16th of March).

On the 17th of March 1860, the plaintiffs, in accordance with the course of business before described, appropriated the remaining 5,000*l.* upon the above-mentioned policy of the 31st of March 1859 to insurances in excess of 5,000*l.* upon the ships City of Manchester, 2,000*l.*, Blenheim, 2,000*l.* and Agamemnon, 1,000*l.*, and on the same day the plaintiffs effected with the defendants three specific policies on behalf of the Hong-Kong Insurance Company; one on goods per City of Manchester for 3,000*l.*, another on goods per Agamemnon for 4,000*l.*, and a third on goods per Blenheim for 2,000*l.*, parts of the risks in respect of the cargoes of those ships having already been placed upon the open policy just appropriated as above mentioned.

On the 19th of March 1860, the plaintiffs effected a further policy for 10,000*l.* to follow the policy of the 31st of March 1859, which was expressed to be as follows: "Lost or not lost, at and from Calcutta to a port in the United Kingdom. Being on goods. Free of particular average, unless stranded, sunk or burnt. To follow and succeed policy No. 7529/30, dated the 31st of March 1859, warranted to be shipped on or before the 31st of December 1860." The ships being described simply as "ships." The plaintiffs in the mode that had been previously pursued when the prior policies were effected, indorsed on the policy No. 7529/80 the following memorandum, "10,000*l.* to follow the 17th of March at 30/," as instructions for the said policy of the 19th of March 1860, and the defendants initialed the memorandum as an acceptance of the risk (1).

On the 21st of March 1860, the plaintiffs in due course received from the Calcutta agent of the Hong-Kong Insurance Company the following instructions, despatched from Calcutta on the 15th of February 1860. "In our next by regular mail you will find particulars for insurances under our open policy for Red Gauntlet and Surrey." This was the first intimation received in England of any insurance by the Hong-Kong Insurance Company upon the Red Gauntlet.

The plaintiffs, immediately upon the receipt of these instructions from Calcutta, notified to the defendants that the declaration of insurance in excess of 5,000*l.* on the cargo of the Red Gauntlet would be made upon the last-mentioned policy when the particulars were received; the right to declare in respect of the Red Gauntlet was, however, disputed; and on the 26th of March, the plaintiffs having received advices from Calcutta that the Hong-Kong Insurance Company, as the fact was, had taken risks upon the cargo of the Red Gauntlet, to the amount of 4,738*l.* in excess of 5,000*l.* upon that one ship, indorsed a declaration of that amount for the Red Gauntlet, on the back of the policy of the 19th of March 1860, and gave notice of the same to the defendants. The defendants refused to accept or acknowledge such declaration, upon the ground that the burning of the Red Gauntlet was known to both parties before the policy was effected or applied for; the plaintiffs thereupon wrote opposite the declaration per the Red Gauntlet the words "in dispute," and after doing so, declared other risks upon the policy to the full amount, which were initialed by the defendants, but the words "in dispute" were not noticed by the defendants.

The plaintiffs on the 24th of March 1860, before the last-mentioned policy was exhausted, and while there remained upwards of 5,000*l.* unappropriated upon it, effected a further policy with the defendants for 20,000*l.* to follow the policy of the 19th of March 1860; and a memorandum was indorsed on the policy of the 19th of March 1860, as follows, "20,000*l.* to follow the 25th of March," such date being a mistake for the 24th of March.

Similar policies have been from time to time effected during the currency of the preceding policy, and there remains upon the last of such policies an amount unappropriated, more than sufficient to cover the amount of the Red Gauntlet.

The interest of the Hong-Kong Insurance Company and the validity of the insurances are admitted, as well as the loss, and that the goods were shipped on board the said ship, and that all warranties and conditions were complied with, except so far as the same may otherwise appear on this case; and it is agreed that the amount to be recovered by the plaintiffs (if any) shall be settled by an arbitrator to be named by the parties.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether the plaintiffs are entitled to recover in respect of the excess over 5,000*l.* taken by the Hong-Kong Insurance Company upon the cargo of the ship Red Gauntlet. If the Court should be of opinion that the plaintiffs are so entitled to recover, then the plaintiffs were to enter up judgment for the sum so to be settled as above mentioned, together with costs of suit, including costs of reference as to the amount. If the Court should be of the contrary opinion, the judgment was to be entered for the defendants with costs of suit.

for the excess in the Red Gauntlet on the policy effected on the 19th of March. The effect of the course of dealing is to make these successive policies but one continuous insurance; the object being that the plaintiffs should always have any excess over 5,000*l.* on any one ship re-insured from the time of sailing. The risk would attach on any particular ship in the order of sailing.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—I doubt that; the insurance is “on ships, as may be declared.”]

That construction is equally favourable to the plaintiffs. The declaration is only a notification to the defendants of the exercise of the power of appropriation, which is in the insured alone; the insurers having no power to reject any risk coming within the terms of the policy—Harman v. Kingston (2). A declaration of the subject-matter of the insurance is no contract; it need not be assented to; in fact, the appropriation is the important step from which the assured cannot recede; and the declaration given to the insurers is simply information for their protection, and can only be given as soon as practicable by the course of post. The risk attached as soon as the appropriation was made, and by the course of dealing it was to be covered by whatever was the current policy at the time the notice of appropriation reached London.

Bovill (Watkin Williams with him), for the defendants.—There was not here a continuous insurance; there was a break between the 17th of March 1860 and the 19th; on the former day the current policy was filled up and exhausted, and there was therefore no policy for two days. Even assuming the policy to take effect from the 17th, that was after the loss, so that there was no risk on this ship on which it could attach.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—That argument might be valid if the defendants had not or could not insure lost or not lost.]

But on the 17th, taking the earlier date as most against the defendants, both parties had notice of the loss, and an insurance with notice of loss is void. The appropriation can have no validity without a declaration made to the defendants: on this, Harman v. Kingston (2) is directly in the defendants' favour; for it was held, that, inasmuch as the declaration was not made till after the loss, the policy was not a valued policy.

[MELLOR, J.—It may be important that both parties should know as to value; but the risk is quite a different question. COCKBURN, C.J.—There must be an agreement as to valuation. SHEE, J.—The distinction taken in the case is against you; for the policy was held good without a declaration.]

Assuming, then, that the declaration relates back to the time the appropriation was made, still as the loss occurred before the declaration reached the defendants, and before the policy was effected, there was nothing on which it could attach.

Lush, in reply.—There was no knowledge of the loss in the present case. The knowledge that would vitiate a policy must, at least, be a knowledge of the loss of the subject-matter of insurance; here neither party knew whether the plaintiffs had any insurance, much less an excess in the ship Red Gauntlet. But even if they had this knowledge, that does not vitiate the policy, if the underwriter choose notwithstanding to execute the policy—Mead v. Davison (3). The argument of the other side, that a declaration cannot operate if made after the loss, practically amounts to saying that they will only insure such ships of the plaintiffs as arrive safe. As soon as the risk is incurred, if the assured mean to appropriate, they must do so at once, and that was done in the present case. In 1 Arnould on Marine Assurance, p. 175, (p. 221, 2nd edit.) it is said, “As a general rule, the name of the ship ought to be declared before notice of loss; as, however, cases may occur in which it would not be possible, as when the assured does not ascertain the name of the ship till he hears of her loss, it is in no case a condition precedent to the plaintiff's right to recover on the policy.” So, in Robinson v. Touray (4), it was held that a declaration of risk requires no assent, and need not be in writing, and that when a bond fide mistake had been made in the name of the ship, the declaration might be withdrawn, and the right ship substituted.

(4) 3 Camp. 158.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that judgment should be for the plaintiffs. I will first consider whether there was any sufficient policy of which the plaintiffs may avail themselves to recover for this loss. I think there was. It is true that the policy to which the risk on the goods in the Red Gauntlet was appropriated was effected at a time posterior to the appropriation. But I think we must take it that the appropriation in Calcutta (to be followed by a declaration in London) was made in anticipation of a policy to be afterwards effected in London; and if we look at the course of dealing between the parties this is clear, that it was intended that whenever the plaintiffs' principals, the Hong-Kong Insurance Company, from time to time became liable on insurances on goods in any one ship in an excess over 5,000*l.*, they should be always covered as to the excess by re-insurance with the defendants. Mr. Bovill, indeed, did not deny that if the policy had been effected on the 16th of March instead of the 19th, although equally subsequent to the appropriation, the policy would have been sufficient to entitle the company on a proper appropriation to have the benefit of the insurance. But he said that the insurance was invalid, because, at the time the policy was effected, the Red Gauntlet was lost, to the knowledge of both parties. To this there are two answers. The first urged by Mr. Lush was to me conclusive:—the loss of the ship was not the risk insured against, the risk depending on the contingency that the plaintiffs' principals had insured goods on board that ship and in excess of 5,000*l.* And whether this was the case or not was unknown to the plaintiffs and defendants at the time the policy was effected. But, secondly, the knowledge here was common to both parties, and if an underwriter chooses to insure when the subject-matter is lost, I can see no reason why he should not. He may have good reasons for taking the risk; and it may also be observed that the telegram spoke of part of the cargo being saved. On these grounds I think there is nothing in the facts of the case to vitiate the insurance.

The next question is, whether the fact of the declaration having been made to the defendants subsequently to the loss of the ship is any obstacle to the plaintiffs recovering. The policy gives the right to the assured to appropriate goods in any ship, but it is to be declared to the assurers; and it is said by Mr. Bovill that the risk does not attach until the declaration has been made; and if that were true in the present case the plaintiffs could not recover. But to put such a construction on the agreement of the parties would be to frustrate altogether the obvious intention of the whole proceeding, which was to secure to the Hong-Kong Company the certainty of being secured by re-insurance against the excess over 5,000*l.* in any one ship. But whether they had this excess in any particular ship could not be ascertained till the loading was complete and the vessel about to sail, and the appropriation being then made, the declaration could not be communicated to the defendants in less than about six weeks; so that if the defendants' contention were correct, during the whole of that time the plaintiffs would be altogether unprotected. I cannot suppose that that was what was meant by saying that the ship is to be declared. It may be that by declaring it meant that appropriation is to be made by some overt act from which the assured cannot recede, and that when that is done at Calcutta, that is sufficient without more. But without going that length, it is enough to say that, if the declaration must be made to the insurers, it is sufficient if it be made at the earliest convenient opportunity. By this construction the underwriters are protected, because it would be a fraud upon them if after the appropriation to one vessel there were an attempt to appropriate the policy to another. It is quite clear that the appropriation, in some shape or other, must be so made as that the ship shall be insured in the interval between the appropriation and the declaration to the defendants. This view is in accordance with the passage cited from Arnould on Marine Assurance, p. 175, (p. 221, 2nd edit.). It is scarcely necessary to add, that Mr. Bovill's contention that the risk did not attach till the declaration reached the defendants is quite untenable; for if the assured had a right, as he admits they had, to make the appropriation to any ship they chose, to say that a loss occurring between the appropriation and the declaration reaching the defendants would not be covered, is to deprive the assured of all the advantage of their right.

CROMPTON, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the real construction of this policy is that it is to follow the former one as one insurance so as to substitute 10,000*l.* for 7,000*l.*; and the object of the proceedings between the parties is quite clear; the plaintiffs' company wished to cover any excess over 5,000*l.* in any one ship from Calcutta to London, so as to secure themselves on the whole voyage. It appears to me that the policy is to be treated as following and keeping up the former open policy, although there were three slips on three specified ships treated in a different way; but I cannot think it was meant that the short interval between the other risks being appropriated and the fresh policy actually effected was to be left uncovered. Then comes the question, when did the risk on this policy attach? I do not agree with Mr. Lush's first contention, that the effect of the course of dealing and form of policies was that the risk attached in order of the sailing of the ships insured by the plaintiffs' company. But I feel inclined to think that his other proposition is true, that the risk attached as soon as the excess of insurance on the ship Red Gauntlet was appropriated to the defendants' policy by the agent in Calcutta. The risk of the plaintiffs would attach on the loading, and in all probability, I think, the defendants' risk does attach immediately on the appropriation made abroad; but, at all events, I have no doubt that the appropriation made by letter from the agent at Calcutta, and acted on by the plaintiffs in London, by forthwith communicating it to the defendants, was a declaration of the risk in good time. According to the contention of Mr. Bovill, the whole voyage could never be covered. I think the appropriation would be binding in the first instance; at any rate it would be by the declaration delivered in London. It seems to be clearly sufficient if a declaration is made at once in London according to the instructions received from abroad, and I adopt Lord Ellenborough's view (in Robinson v. Touray (4)) that the power of naming or declaring the ship on which the policy is to attach is a power given to the assured, and that they may exercise this power at any time, as long as they can do it innocently and without fraud. Here the appropriation was made perfectly bond fide in Calcutta, and was carried out by the plaintiffs in London. I think Mr. Arnould's statement is quite correct, and it agrees with my view of the law.

MELLOR, J.—The question is, what was the nature of the contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants, as deduced from the documents themselves and the course of dealing between the parties, with reference to which the policies were affected? And it is quite clear that the intention was, that while the defendants were to be protected by a declaration, the plaintiffs' company should always be secured, against any excess over 5,000*l.* on goods on any one ship, as soon as they had contracted this liability. I also agree, that the knowledge of the loss of the ship was not a knowledge of loss in any sense that could vitiate the policy. I entirely agree with what has already been said, and will not repeat it.

SHEP, J.—The defendants have undertaken to insure the excess of risk above 5,000*l.* on any insurance that may be taken by the plaintiffs' company on goods in any one ship from Calcutta to London, to be shipped on or before the 30th of December 1860, on ships of a certain class and to be declared. The Red Gauntlet, on which goods had been insured by the plaintiffs' company for an excess above 5,000*l.*, was one such ship; so that according to the plain meaning of the words the risk would come within the meaning of the contract. Now, when this particular policy was effected, it was known to both parties that the Red Gauntlet had been lost, but it was not known to either that she was one of the ships on which any risk at all, much less in excess of 5,000*l.*, had been taken by the plaintiff's company; and in order to vitiate the policy there must at all events be a knowledge that the particular risk insured was lost. Then the ships are "to be declared"; that can hardly mean that the underwriters have an option to refuse when the declaration is made, for they undertake to insure any excess on any ship of a particular class sailing before a particular time; and the engagement to declare can only mean that as soon as an excess over 5,000*l.* has been taken by the plaintiffs' company, they will declare the name of the ship to which they apply the defendants' open policy, and the policy must attach as soon as the risk taken is so declared. And I do not think the defendants could get rid of their liability, even if it had been known that that risk had been lost at the time the policy was effected.

Justices, Jurisdiction of—Summary Conviction—Irregularity—24 & 25 Vict. c. 97. s. 52.

The appellants were apprehended and charged before Justices with setting fire to the letters in a pillar letter-box. Witnesses were examined in support of the charge, and the appellants were remanded on bail to appear again before the Justices. They did so appear and were represented respectively by attorneys, and were informed that they would be charged under section 52. of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97; and the attorneys were asked whether the appellants would plead guilty to such charge, or whether further evidence should be offered in support of the same. In answer to this they told the attorney for the prosecution that he must go on and prove his case, whereupon other witnesses were called and examined and cross-examined. After the case was closed, the attorneys for the appellants objected that the Justices had no jurisdiction, inasmuch as there was no information on oath, and the appellants were not found committing the offence, and therefore were not legally in custody. The Justices, however, committed the appellants:—Held, that they had jurisdiction to do so.

(Appeal from the Court of Queen's Bench.)

1864. }
June 15. } BINGHAM v. CORBITT.*

Guarantie, Continuing—Mortgage-Deed—Release of Surety.

In consideration of the plaintiff supplying C. with goods, the defendant agreed to be answerable up to 200*l.* for the price of goods supplied to C. at any time due to the plaintiff on an account current after two months' credit. Some time after, 332*l.* being then due from C. to the plaintiff for goods supplied, C. executed a mortgage-deed to the plaintiff as security for the then existing debt and for any future debt for goods to be supplied. The deed contained a proviso that if C. paid the plaintiff the 332*l.* in six months from its date, and all sums due for future supplies in six months from their date, without prejudice to the plaintiff's right not to give credit in respect of future supplies, the mortgaged premises were to be reconveyed to C. There was also a covenant to pay the existing debt in six months, and future debts within six months from their accruing due, without prejudice to the plaintiff's refusing to give credit for future debts. The parties in fact dealt on a two months' credit only. In the course of dealing C. paid off the 332*l.* A further debt exceeding 200*l.* having subsequently accrued, which C. could not pay, the plaintiff sued the defendant on the guarantie. The defendant pleaded that he was discharged by time having been given by the plaintiff to C.:—Held, reversing the judgment of the Court below, that by the mortgage-deed the plaintiff did not give time to C, except in respect of the 332*l.* debt, and that, as that debt had long been discharged, the giving that time did not prejudice the surety as to other and future debts due from C. to the plaintiff; and that, as in fact only a two months' credit was given by the plaintiff to C, the guarantie remained in force, and that the defendant was liable, up to 200*l.*, on C.'s failure to pay the sum due in respect of goods supplied by the plaintiff to C. subsequent to the mortgage-deed.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff against the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench on discharging a rule obtained by the plaintiff to set aside the verdict for the defendant, and to enter a verdict for himself for 200*l*.

The action was on a guarantie given to the plaintiff by the defendant for one John Crowther. The defendant pleaded, among other pleas, that a "deed was made between the plaintiff and Crowther without the consent of the defendant, whereby Crowther covenanted that he would pay the plaintiff the prices payable for goods supplied by the plaintiff to Crowther six months after the same became payable; that the goods were supplied on the terms, without the defendant's consent, that Crowther should have a longer time than two months' credit, viz. six months' credit; and that the plaintiff, without the defendant's consent, gave Crowther that time for payment."

The material question raised in the case was, whether there was any evidence that the plaintiff had discharged the defendant from liability by giving Crowther a longer credit than two months without the consent of the defendant.

The guarantie, which was signed by the defendant and addressed to the plaintiff, was in these terms: "In consideration of your giving John Crowther until the 13th day of August next, for payment of 50*l*. 4*s*. he owes you, and of your supplying him in future with goods, I hereby agree to pay to you the said sum of 50*l*. 4*s*. in case he does not, and I further agree to be answerable to the extent of 200*l*. that may be due to you at any time on current account and interest in respect thereof, after the expiration of two months' credit. As witness my hand this 13th day of June 1857."

The plaintiff supplied goods to Crowther on the terms of this guarantie.

In August 1858, Crowther being indebted to the plaintiff in 332*l*. 13*s*. 4*d*., and the plaintiff being desirous of obtaining further security for that debt and for any further supplies which he might make, and Crowther being anxious to obtain a larger supply of goods on credit, a deed was, on the 28th of August 1858, executed between them, by which Crowther mortgaged certain premises to the plaintiff for securing the existing and any future debt which should from time to time become due from Crowther to the plaintiff on the balance of accounts. The deed contained the following clause: "Provided always; and the grant and assurance hereinbefore contained are upon this express condition: that if the said John Crowther, his heirs, appointees, executors, administrators or assigns, shall pay unto the said Edward Bingham, his executors, administrators or assigns, the full sum of 332*l*. 13*s*. 4*d*. sterling, with interest for the same after the rate of 5*l*. per cent. per annum, on the 28th day of February 1859 without any deduction, and also shall in like manner pay to the said Edward Bingham, his executors, administrators or assigns, all such further sum or sums of money as shall be owing to him or them by the said John Crowther, his executors or administrators, on the balance of account for goods sold and delivered by the said Edward Bingham, his executors or administrators, to the said John Crowther, or otherwise, for or on any other account, cause, matter or thing, at the expiration of six calendar months next after the date when any such further sum of money shall from time to time fall due or become payable (without prejudice nevertheless to the said Edward Bingham refusing to give or allow any future or further credit to the said John Crowther beyond or in addition to the sum in which the said John Crowther already stands indebted to the said Edward Bingham as aforesaid), together with interest thereon, at the rate of 5*l*. per cent. per annum, computed from the same date; then the said hereditaments and premises hereby granted and assured are to be re-conveyed unto the said John Crowther, his heirs and assigns." There was also this covenant: "And the said John Crowther, for himself, his heirs, executors and administrators, hereby covenants and agrees with the said Edward Bingham, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, that he the said John Crowther, his heirs, executors or administrators, shall and will pay unto the said Edward Bingham, his executors, administrators or assigns, the full sum of 332*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, with interest after the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum, upon the 28th day of February 1859, and also that if the said sum of 332*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, or any part thereof, shall not be paid at the time aforesaid, he the said John Crowther, his heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, shall and will, so long as the same sum, or any part thereof, shall remain unpaid, pay to the said Edward Bingham, his executors, administrators or assigns, interest for the said sum of 332*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, or so much thereof as shall remain unpaid, at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum, by equal half-yearly payments on the 28th day of February and the 28th day of August in each and every year without deduction; and also that if any further sum or sums of money shall hereafter become due and owing from the said John Crowther, his executors or administrators, to the said Edward Bingham, his executors or administrators, on the balance of account for goods sold and delivered to him or them by the said Edward Bingham, his executors or administrators, or otherwise, for or on any other account, matter or thing, to pay or at the expiration of six calendar months after the date when any such further sum of money shall from time to time fall due or become payable (but without prejudice to the said Edward Bingham's refusing to give or allow any future or further credit beyond or in addition to the sum now already owing to him by the said John Crowther or any sum that shall or may from time to time be so owing), together with interest thereon computed from the same date, at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum."

After the execution of the mortgage, the parties went on dealing as before; the plaintiff continually supplying goods to Crowther, and Crowther from time to time making payments. The items on each side were set down in an account current between them, shewing the receipts and payments. Only two months' credit was given. If goods were not paid for on two months after the delivery interest was charged on the price. It appeared by the account that, assuming that the sums paid by Crowther were applied in discharging and satisfying the older items in order of the plaintiff's claim, the debt of 332*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* had been paid long ago. The dealings and the account were continued to January 1861, and then shewed a balance due from Crowther to the plaintiff of 417*l.* 17*s.* 10*d.*

The case was tried, before Cockburn, C.J., without a jury. The learned Judge found for the defendant on the above plea, leave being reserved to the plaintiff to move.

T. Jones, for the appellant, the plaintiff. —The plea that the plaintiff had entered into a deed giving Crowther six months' credit was not proved. The deed expressly provided that as to future supplies the plaintiff was not bound to give credit. The only credit given was as to the debt existing at the time of the deed. That was paid off long ago in the course of dealing. The balance now sued for accrued years after. There was, in fact, no alteration of the period of credit on which the goods were supplied. It remained a two months' credit as before the deed, unless, indeed, the deed has the effect of making it a six months' credit.

[WILLES, J.—Unless the deed renders a two months' credit impossible.]

The decision of the Court below was wrong, both in law and fact. The Court of Queen's Bench held that the deed, in effect, gave a credit, and that the goods supplied since the deed were on a different contract, which altered the position of the surety. There was no evidence of any such change.

[BRAMWELL, B.—In September 1859 all was paid up; therefore all the goods supplied in respect of which the claim is now made were after the mortgage-deed.]

Garth, for the respondent, the defendant. —The position of the surety was materially altered by the arrangement made by the mortgage-deed, between the principal and the debtor. It was clearly altered as to the payment of the 332*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* The payment of that debt was postponed for six months. The deed took off from Crowther the pressure to pay that debt. If so, the surety is released—Calvert v. the London Dock Company (1), Rees v. Berrington (2), The Bank of Ireland v. Beresford (3).

[ERLE, C.J.—Assuming that the surety

is not bound as to the 332*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, and that the contract discharges him as to that sum, is the guarantie void as to future supplies? Is the surety in a worse position as to the subsequent claim?]

If a surety may be prejudiced, that is enough to avoid a guarantie. It is not necessary he should be actually prejudiced. The arrangement made by the mortgage-deed allows the debtor to run more largely into debt. The mortgage-deed had the effect of putting an end to the guarantie wholly.

[BRAMWELL, B.—If the surety is once discharged from his liability for the current account, is he never to be liable again? The guarantie is, that the defendant will be answerable up to 200*l.* for sums at any time due.]

It is all one account current. After the mortgage was given, there was no express agreement as to the time of credit; but the mortgage itself is a contract to give an extended time for payment of all future sums.

ERLE, C.J.—We have come to the conclusion that the judgment of the Court below must be reversed. The guarantie on which the action was brought was in respect of goods to be supplied on a two months' credit. From its date in June 1857 the plaintiff went on dealing with Crowther, without any change in the terms upon which they dealt, down to January 1861, the transactions being, according to the oral evidence, all along on a two months' credit. There was no change in the credit given, unless the deed created such a change. The mortgage-deed, it is true, would have prevented the plaintiff having recourse to the surety in respect of the debt, 332*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, due at the time of the deed. But the paying off of that sum has prevented the mortgage-deed having any further operation in respect of that sum. The mortgage-deed was to be a security, not only for that debt, but for payments to become due in respect of supplies after that time. It was to be a security collateral to and beyond the securities then held by the plaintiff. The proviso for re-conveying the premises to Crowther shews that the recourse of the plaintiff as mortgagee against the debtor under the mortgage-deed in respect of any sums was postponed for six months, though it seems to me to contemplate that the parties should go on dealing on the usual terms. The covenant to pay at the end of six months does not merge the simple contract debt which had accrued. There is a remedy under the guarantie as well as a remedy under the mortgage. The stipulation that the deed is to be without prejudice to the plaintiffs refusing to allow any further credit, seems to me to shew that the deed was meant to be a collateral security leaving to the plaintiff all his rights. The defendant's counsel has argued that the guarantie is gone altogether as to the further debts, by reason of the terms of the mortgage-deed. But I cannot see that the surety's position is in any way prejudiced by these terms after the 332*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* is paid. There is no authority to support the view contended for on the part of the defendant. The cases cited are not applicable. We are all of opinion that in respect of the matters for which the action was brought the mortgage-deed did not prejudice or alter the situation of the defendant as surety.

The other JUDGES concurred.

Judgment reversed.

Jan. 13.* } EDWARDS.

Principal and Surety—Giving Time to Principal—Discharge of Surety.

T. P. & D. Price, coal masters, having stopped payment and having petitioned the Court of Bankruptcy, executed a deed which was assented to by the creditors and the Commissioner in Bankruptcy. The deed contained a proposal, that the business should be carried on under inspection; that the plaintiffs, who were creditors and parties to the deed, should be paid in full the sum of 8,700*l.*, being the amount of bills discounted, but partly by instalments, the first to be made on the 31st of December 1860. The plaintiffs covenanted that they should bind themselves, "subject to the provisions thereafter contained, not to enforce claims against any parties to the bills in their hands, who as between themselves and the petitioners were not then liable on such bills respectively, but that the right of the plaintiffs against all parties to the bills in their hands (whether liable or not to the petitioners as between the petitioners or any of them and such parties) should in no way be prejudiced in the event of the proposals made to the petitioners not being carried into effect, and also that in such case the plaintiffs should in all respects be entitled to claim the full amount then due to them after deduction of any sum in the mean time paid to them, notwithstanding their acquiescence in the proposals of the petitioners thereby made." The deed provided that the creditors in general should receive a composition of 10*s.* in the pound; that the business was to be carried on and that the proceeds were to be applied in paying the composition agreed upon; that the creditors, except as mentioned in the proposals, who should execute the deed and who should hold securities upon which any other person should be liable, should not be prejudiced as to their rights against such persons: provided that nothing contained in the deed should prevent the creditors, "other than as provided for in the said proposal," from enforcing their claims against the estate of T. P. & D. Price. At the time of the execution of the deed the plaintiffs were holders of a bill of exchange accepted by the defendant for the accommodation of T. P. & D. Price, and they had no notice that the defendant was not liable to T. P. & D. Price, although they knew that some of the parties whose bills were in their hands were not primarily liable to T. P. & D. Price. The deed remained in full force, and time was given to T. P. & D. Price till the first instalment became due, which they failed to pay:—Held, that the effect of the deed was to give time to T. P. & D. Price, and that equitably the defendant was not liable on the bill so accepted by him.

The first count of the declaration was upon a bill of exchange drawn by John Price, accepted by the defendant, indorsed by John Price to certain persons designated by the name and style of T. P. & D. Price, and by them indorsed to the plaintiffs.

There were also counts for interest and upon an account stated.

The defendant pleaded pleas traversing the acceptance and indorsements. There were also pleas of never indebted and payment, and then came the sixth plea, which was as follows: "And for a sixth plea to the first count for defence on equitable grounds, the defendant says that there never was any value or consideration for the acceptance of the said bill of exchange by the defendant or for the making or indorsement thereof by the said John Price, or for the said John Price, or for the said T. P. & D. Price holding the same. And that at the time of the indorsement of the bill by the said T. P. & D. Price to the plaintiffs, the defendant and the said John Price were merely sureties on the said bill for the said T. P. & D. Price to the plaintiffs for any value given or to be given by the plaintiffs to the said T. P. & D. Price for the said bill, whereof the plaintiffs had notice when the said bill was first indorsed to them, and they took the said bill from the said T. P. & D. Price on the terms that the defendant and the said John Price should be liable to them on the said bill as sureties only for the said T. P. & D. Price; and after the indorsement of the said bill to the plaintiffs and whilst they were the holders thereof, and after the said bill had become due, to wit, on the 17th of November 1858, by an indenture then made between T. P. & D. Price by their names of Thomas Prothero Price and David Price of the first part, the said Thomas Prothero Price of the second part, Thomas Greatrex, Charles Lyne and William Murrey Chapp of the third part, the plaintiffs and one William Williams of the fourth part, John Parry de Winton, David Evans, John Evans and William de Winton of the fifth part, and the several persons whose names and seals were thereunder set in the first schedule thereunder written, being creditors of the said Thomas Prothero Price and David Price of the sixth part, and the several persons whose names and seals were thereunto subscribed and set in the second schedule thereunder written, being separate creditors of the said Thomas Prothero Price of the seventh part. After reciting according to the facts a petition and proceeding for arrangement between the said Thomas Prothero Price and David Price, and their creditors, under the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, it was proposed and agreed by the parties thereto, that certain collieries and works of the said T. P. & D. Price should be carried on under inspection for a certain time therein mentioned, and that the plaintiffs and the said W. Williams should be paid a certain sum, to wit, 8,700*l.* in full, and a certain composition on the residue of their debt in manner therein mentioned, they thereby engaging not to enforce claims against any parties to the bills in their hands, who, as between themselves and the said T. P. & D. Price, were not then liable on such bills; and it was thereby provided, that the rights of the plaintiffs and the said W. Williams should in no way be prejudiced in the event of certain proposals made by the said T. P. & D. Price not being carried into effect; and the defendant further says, that the said deed was executed by the said T. P. & D. Price and by the plaintiffs, and the said W. Williams, and by divers other creditors of the said T. P. & D. Price, and that the said bill in the first count mentioned was one of the bills referred to in the said deed and was then in the hands of the plaintiffs and the said W. Williams, and the defendant was then a party to the said bill, who was not liable to the said T. P. & D. Price thereon; and that the said proposals of the said

T. P. & D. Price in the said deed mentioned have been fully carried into effect; and that the said deed was made and entered into between the plaintiffs and the said T. P. & D. Price without the consent of the defendants.

At the trial, which took place before Blackburn, J., at the Sittings at Westminster during Hilary Term, 1863, the facts which are fully set out in the judgment of this Court were proved, and a verdict was entered for the defendant, with leave to the plaintiffs to move.

A rule nisi was subsequently obtained, pursuant to the leave reserved, calling upon the defendant to shew cause why the verdict should not be set aside, and a verdict entered for the plaintiffs for 126*l.* 6*s.* 10*d.*, on the ground that the substance of the sixth plea was not proved. The Court to have power to make such amendments, if any, as they might think that the Judge should have made at Nisi Prius.

the trial, before me, a verdict was directed for the defendant on this plea, with leave to move to enter the verdict for the plaintiffs on the facts proved and admitted at the trial. Power was reserved to amend the plea if necessary, so that the question is, whether the facts proved and admitted constituted a defence in equity, and is independent of the form of the plea actually pleaded. It was at the trial admitted that, in 1858, the plaintiffs, without the assent or knowledge of the defendant, executed a deed, on the effect of which the question principally depends: that deed was between the Messrs. Price, carrying on business as coal masters under the firm of T. P. & D. Price, of the first part; T. P. Price alone, of the second part; some trustees of the third part; the persons forming the firm of Bailey, Greatrex & Co., bankers (the present plaintiffs), of the fourth part; another firm of bankers, Wilkins & Co., of the fifth part; the several creditors of Messrs. Price who should execute the deed, of the sixth part; and the separate creditors of T. P. Price of the seventh part. It recited that T. P. & D. Price, having stopped payment and presented their petition to the Court of Bankruptcy, had made a proposal, which, as modified, had been assented to by the creditors and the Commissioner, and was intended to be carried into effect by the deed. This modified proposal is then set forth in the deed. The following are the parts of it material to the present question: The proposal was that T. P. & D. Price, the petitioners, should carry on their business under inspectorship for the benefit of all their creditors; that Bailey, Greatrex & Co. (the now plaintiffs), who, it was recited, held various securities for their debt, should be paid in full the sum of 8,700*l.* (being the amount of bills discounted for T. P. & D. Price in respect of some matters specified), by applying the proceeds of the sale of some property over which Bailey, Greatrex & Co. held security in part payment of the 8,700*l.*, and that the residue of the sum of 8,700*l.* and 10*s.* in the pound on the rest of their debt should be paid to Bailey, Greatrex & Co. by eight annual instalments, the first to be made on the 31st of December 1860.

The proposal then contained stipulations on the part of Messrs. Bailey, Greatrex

& Co., amongst others one very material indeed to the present question. They covenanted that they should bind themselves "(subject to the proviso thereafter contained) not to enforce claims against any parties to the bills in their hands, who, as between themselves and the petitioners, were not then liable on such bills respectively; but it was thereby provided that the rights of the said Messrs. Bailey, Greatrex & Co., against all parties to the bills in their hands (whether liable or not to the said petitioners as between the petitioners and such parties) should in no way be prejudiced in the event of the proposals made by the petitioners or any of them not being carried fully into effect, and also that in such case the said Messrs. Bailey, Greatrex & Co. should in all respects be entitled to claim the full amount then due to them after deduction of any sum in the mean time paid to them, notwithstanding their acquiescence in the proposals of the petitioners thereby made."

Then followed in the proposal special stipulations with respect to the debts due to Messrs. Wilkins & Co., the parties of the fifth part, which it is not necessary to notice, and that the creditors in general should receive a composition of 10*s.* in the pound out of the proceeds of the trade. The deed then, for the purpose of carrying out this proposal, contained a grant of licence from all the creditors (as well Bailey, Greatrex & Co. and Wilkins & Co., the parties of the fourth and fifth parts, as the parties of the sixth and seventh parts), to carry on the business under inspectorship so long as they should observe the conditions and covenants on their part contained; these conditions and covenants were to the effect that they would apply the proceeds under the inspectorship to paying the composition agreed upon. Then comes an agreement "that the creditors of the said T. P. Price and D. Price (except as mentioned in the proposal), who shall execute these presents, and who shall hold any bonds, bills of exchange, promissory notes or other securities upon which any other person or persons shall be liable to the payment of the money thereby secured, shall not be prejudiced as to their rights and remedies against such person or persons respectively;" and finally, the deed contains the following proviso: "Provided always, and it is hereby agreed between and by the several parties to these presents, that nothing herein contained shall extend, or be deemed or construed to extend, to prevent the said creditors parties hereto or to be bound hereby, or any of them, or their or any of their respective partners or partner, or their or any of their respective heirs, administrators, executors or assignees, other than as provided for in the said proposal, from enforcing or otherwise obtaining the full benefit and advantage of any mortgage, claim, charge or lien which they or any of them now have or hath upon any estate or effects whatsoever, whether of or belonging to the said T. P. Price and D. Price, or any other person or persons whomsoever, or from suing, prosecuting, or otherwise proceeding against any other person or persons other than the said T. P. Price and D. Price, their or his heirs, executors and administrators, who is, are, shall or may be liable to or accountable for the payment or making good to any of the said creditors of all or any part of their respective debts, either as drawers, indorsers or acceptors of any bill or bills of exchange or promissory note or notes, or as being jointly or separately bound in any bond or bonds, obligation or obligations, or other instrument or instruments, or as being liable or accountable for the payment of any debt or debts without having subscribed any bill, bond or other instrument; whatsoever, or otherwise howsoever as if these presents had never been made; and for conformity sake (but for conformity sake alone) the said T. P. Price and D. Price, their heirs, executors or administrators, may be joined in any such proceeding as last aforesaid."

The bill on which this action was brought was one of those of which the plaintiffs were holders at the time when the deed was executed. It was apparent, from the terms of the proposal, that the plaintiffs were aware that some of the parties to the bills in their hands were not liable to T. P. & D. Price, but it was admitted that they had no notice that the present defendant stood in that position. The only disputed fact was, whether he really was, as between him and them, liable to Messrs. T. P. & D. Price on his acceptance. Evidence was given shewing that the acceptance by the defendant of the bill in question was by way of loan for the accommodation of the Messrs. Price. The question was left to the jury, who found that he was not liable to them, and that finding is not now complained of. The Messrs. Price made default in paying the instalments, the first of which became due on the 30th of December 1860, before this action, but from the execution of the deed till default was made, a period of more than two years, the deed was in full force, and during that period time was given to the principal debtors.

A rule to enter the verdict for the plaintiffs pursuant to the leave reserved was obtained, and was argued in the course of last term, before my Lord, my late Brother Wightman, my Brother Mellor, and myself. We are of opinion that the rule must be discharged, as the effect of this deed is under these circumstances to discharge the defendant in equity. The principle upon which the Courts of equity have proceeded appears to be this. A surety has, as such, a variety of rights; amongst others he has the right in equity to call upon the creditor to enforce all his, the creditor's, remedies against the principal debtor for the surety's benefit and at the surety's risk and expense—Wright v. Simpson (8). No doubt a Court of equity would put the surety under terms to give indemnity to the creditor before it would enforce this right, and consequently the right which the surety has is of very little practical value, and is seldom, if ever, exercised. Still, the surety has this right, and if the creditor wilfully deprives the surety of this right he so far alters the surety's position. Lord Eldon, in his judgment in Samuell v. Hawarth (9), says, that where time is given by virtue of a positive contract between the creditor and the principal, "the surety is held to be discharged, for this reason, because the creditor, by so giving time to the principal, has put it out of the power of the surety to consider whether he will have recourse to his remedy against the principal or not; and because he, in fact, cannot have the same remedy against the principal as he would have had under the original contract." Whether, if the matter were res integra, it might not have been better to confine the surety's right in such cases to compensation in damages for this injury, which is generally only nominal, it is not now open to us to consider; a long series of decisions, many of which may be found collected in the notes to Rees v. Berrington (10), have settled that such an alteration in the position of the surety discharges him, even though the delay may be shewn to be for his benefit. Lord Eldon, in Samuell v. Hawarth (9), gives as the reason for this apparent harshness, that "the law has said that the surety shall be the judge of that, and that he alone has the right to determine whether it is or is not for his benefit."

(8) 6 Ves. 714, 734.

The principle has been imported from the courts of equity into those of law, and is clearly stated by Williams, J., in Strong v. Foster (11). He there says, p. 219, "What I understand by a giving of time in such a case is this: the surety has a right at any moment to go to the creditor, and say, 'I have reason to suspect the principal debtor to be insolvent; therefore, I call upon you to sue him, or to permit me to sue him.' If the creditor has voluntarily placed himself in such a position as to be compelled to say he cannot sue him, he thereby discharges the surety. The case then falls within the general doctrine as to principal and surety, which equally obtains at law and in equity, that, if the creditor does any act to alter the position of the surety he thereby discharges him."

There is, however, another point to be noticed here. The bill of exchange on which this action is brought is a written contract, and conclusively shews, both at law and in equity, that the contract of the defendant to the plaintiffs was as principal and not as surety; and moreover the plaintiffs had not notice at the time when they took the bill that the defendant was other than an acceptor for value. There are authorities, amongst others Strong v. Foster (11), tending to shew that, in order to enable a surety to raise at law a defence on the ground that time has been given to the principal, it is necessary to shew that the original contract between the plaintiff and the defendant was that of creditor and surety. How this may be at law we are not now called on to decide. We are determining this case as a Court of equity. It was decided in this Court, in Pooley v. Harradine (12), on an equitable plea, that the equity on which the Court should act "does not depend on any contract with the creditor, but on its being inequitable in him knowingly to prejudice the rights of the surety against the principal." By this judgment we are bound, even if we did not agree with it as we do. In Pooley v. Harradine (12), the plea alleged that the creditor, at the time when he became holder of the bills, as well as when he gave time, had notice of the relationship of principal and surety between the defendant and his creditor, and the decision did not go further; but it had previously been determined by Sir J. Leach, M.R., that even though the relationship of principal and surety was created, by an arrangement between them after the parties had become liable to the creditor as joint debtors, the creditor by giving time to the principal, with notice of this arrangement, discharged the surety, and this decision was affirmed by Lord Brougham and by the House of Lords—Oakeley v. Pasheller (13). Now, in the present case, the plaintiffs, when they executed the deed, had notice that some of the parties to the bills in their hands were not primarily liable to the Messrs. Price on those bills. They entered into the deed, making stipulations with regard to such parties, and taking their chance as to who they should turn out to be. We think that if the effect of the deed was to alter the position of the parties who should turn out to be sureties, it was as wilfully done and as inequitable as if they had express notice who these parties were.

The question, therefore, as it seems to us, comes round to this, whether the effect of the deed is to give time to Messrs. Price & Co., so that it would discharge ordinary sureties of whom the plaintiffs then had notice. The plaintiffs and Messrs. Price did not intend to discharge the sureties. On the contrary, they have by an express proviso agreed that in the event which has happened, of the proposal not being carried fully into effect, the sureties should be liable then as if the deed had never been made. But during the two years which elapsed before the Messrs. Price made default, the plaintiffs could not without a breach of faith and of contract on their part have sued Messrs. Price, and if the surety had called on them to sue they would have been bound to refuse. It is quite true that where the contract by which the creditor binds himself to the principal debtor not to sue him for a time, is so worded as to shew that it was intended only to apply to suits for the benefit of the creditor, and to except from its operation suits at the instance of sureties and on their behalf, no alteration in the position of the surety is produced, and he is not discharged. And it seems established that, if in the contract for giving time there is an unqualified reservation of remedies against sureties, the contract is to be construed as allowing the surety to retain all his remedies over against the principal debtor, and, as it is said in Price v. Barker (6), "that the covenant not to sue is to operate only so far as the rights of the surety may not be affected." In the deed now before us, the creditors generally have stipulated for a right to have immediate recourse against sureties, but from this there is an exception of those mentioned in the proposal. And on reference to the proposal we find that Bailey, Greatrex & Co. expressly bound themselves not to sue the parties to the bills who stood in the position of sureties, for a period which turned out to be two years, and we find nothing to shew any intention to preserve for those sureties during that time, their right to call upon Bailey, Greatrex & Co. to sue Messrs. Price if so advised. We think, therefore, that an equitable defence is made out, and consequently that the rule must be discharged.

Rule discharged.

Ship and Shipping—Marine Insurance —Voyage Policy—"Seaworthiness."

The "seaworthiness" of which, in the absence of express stipulation, there is an

* Decided in the Sittings after Trinity Term, coram Pollock, C.B., Williams, J., Willes, J., Bramwell, B. and Channell, B.

implied warranty in every voyage policy, is a relative term depending on the nature of the ship as well as of the voyage insured. Therefore, on a policy "on a voyage from the Tyne to Odessa," it being shewn that the vessel was an iron steamer of very light draught of water, constructed for river navigation only, that this was disclosed to the underwriters before the policy was effected and the dimensions of the vessel then stated to them, and that (though it was impossible to make her fit to encounter the ordinary perils of ocean navigation) the ship had been made as seaworthy as her size and construction would admit, the underwriters were held liable on her being lost by the perils insured against.

Error was brought on a bill of exceptions to the ruling of Cockburn, C.J.

The declaration was on a policy of insurance on a vessel called the Kniaz Boratinsky, on a voyage from the river Tyne to Odessa or another port in the Black Sea, and alleged that the length, breadth, draught and tonnage of the vessel were specified in a memorandum made on the face of the policy at the time of making the policy. The claim was for general average loss.

Plea—that at the time of the commencement of the voyage from the Tyne the ship was not seaworthy for the voyage.

A memorandum on the face of the policy (which was in the terms stated in the declaration) set forth that the length of the vessel was 200 feet, her breadth 32·25 feet, her draught about 3 feet, her tonnage 404 tons, and that she was warranted to sail for Odessa on or before the 1st of August 1859. Before the policy was executed, and with a view of getting the vessel insured, the plaintiff had written to the defendant stating that the vessel was an iron steamer going out with nothing in her but her coals, and describing her dimensions as in the memorandum on the policy.

The oral evidence proved that the vessel corresponded with the description given on the face of the policy above set forth, and that she was intended after she had accomplished the voyage to be used in river navigation only, and was, as to the hull, built and adapted to such navigation exclusively, and could not by any strengthening appliances to the hull be rendered fit to encounter the ordinary perils of the voyage insured in the policy. The description and dimensions of the vessel given on the face of the policy were sufficient to convey to any competent person acquainted with shipping that the vessel was not built for ocean navigation and was not an ordinary sea-going vessel.

The plaintiff gave evidence to shew that before commencing the voyage strengthening appliances were put into the hull of the vessel, to assist the vessel in encountering the perils of the voyage, and that such appliances were reasonably proper and sufficient, according to the then knowledge and practice of naval architects, and that by that means the vessel was rendered as seaworthy as a vessel, of such build, capacity, and construction, was capable of being made. The plaintiff further gave in evidence that the vessel commenced the voyage on the 29th of July 1859, with the hull so strengthened as aforesaid, but that nevertheless the vessel was not then, in respect of the said hull thereof, fit to encounter the ordinary perils of the said voyage. In the course of the voyage she received damage from perils of the sea.

The defendant adduced evidence to shew that the strengthening appliances resorted to by the plaintiff were not reasonably proper, or sufficient, according to the then knowledge and practice of naval architects; but that other and better appliances, then well known and practised by naval architects, might have been used, and that the vessel was not, by means of the appliances put into and upon the hull as aforesaid, rendered as seaworthy for the voyage as a vessel of such build and capacity was capable of being made.

Cockburn, C.J. directed the jury as to the issue in question, "that if in their opinion the plaintiff had, before the execution of the said policy, brought to the knowledge of the defendant the nature and description of the vessel intended to be insured, and the more than ordinary risk that such a vessel would necessarily encounter on the voyage insured, and if in their opinion the said vessel at the time of commencing the said voyage had been and was, by the strengthening appliances put into and upon the hull of the said vessel as aforesaid, made as seaworthy for the said insured voyage as a vessel of such a nature and description as the said vessel could reasonably be made, they should find their verdict for the plaintiff on the said issue." The counsel for the defendant thereupon excepted "that the Chief Justice ought to have directed the jury that, inasmuch as it was proved that at the time of commencing the said insured voyage, the said vessel was not, in respect of the said hull thereof, fit to encounter the ordinary perils of the said insured voyage, they, the said jury, ought to find a verdict for the defendant on the said issue." The jury found for the plaintiff.

Mellish (Vernon Lushington with him), for the plaintiff in error, the defendant below (June 14).—This is, in reality, an appeal from the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench in Burges v. Wickham (1), where the law was laid down substantially in the same manner as by the Chief Justice in his direction in the present case. It is submitted that that direction is erroneous. The fact of the plaintiff having brought to the knowledge of the underwriter the particulars concerning the build of the vessel is unimportant, and cannot affect the question of the warranty of seaworthiness. It is not necessary to communicate to the underwriter any fact relating to a matter covered by the warranty of seaworthiness, nor need the underwriter attend to any such communication.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—The warranty of seaworthiness is not express, but implied. Suppose the shipowner says, "I cannot say whether the ship is seaworthy. I will give you all the facts and the dimensions of the vessel, and tell you all I know about her." Is not the old warranty gone?]

It is better to adhere to the well-known rule, and say that there is an implied warranty of seaworthiness in all cases of voyage policies, if nothing appears on the face of policy to the contrary. A few words, "seaworthiness not warranted," might easily be inserted in a case where it was not intended to warrant it. It is inconvenient to allow the matter to turn in any way on the communication to the underwriter, which makes the extent of the implied covenant depend on the opinion of the jury. It is true that seaworthiness does, to a certain extent, admit of degrees; but it ought not to be possible for a jury to be able to find a vessel to be seaworthy, which it is admitted, is not in a state to meet the ordinary perils of the sea. The communication to the underwriter of the dimensions of the vessel is not sufficient to enable him to appreciate the risks he is running, for an underwriter is not bound to know the build of ships of an extraordinary character. The mere statement of the dimensions of a vessel does not in any way modify the usual implied warranty of seaworthiness or contradict it in terms, for it may not be known to any one that a vessel of the particular build would necessarily be unseaworthy. All the authorities shew that in a voyage policy the implied warranty of seaworthiness, according to mercantile usage, is the basis of the contract of insurance—Dixon v. Sadler (2), Biceard v. Shepherd (3), Bouillon v. Lupton (4), Haywood v. Rodgers (5), Knill v. Hooper (6) and Gibson v. Small (7). In the latter case, p. 418, Lord Campbell, in his judgment, says that the term seaworthy means "that the ship is in a condition in all respects to render it reasonably safe wherever it happens to be at any particular time referred to, whether in a dock, in a harbour, in a river, or traversing the ocean." The question always has been whether the ship was at the commencement of the voyage in such a state as to be reasonably capable of performing it and competent to resist the ordinary perils of the voyage—See 1 Arnould on Marine Insurance, par. 248, p. 689, 2nd edit. It will tend much to confuse the law if the Courts put a non-natural sense on the term seaworthy. It is better to adhere to the plain rule suitable to ordinary cases, and to allow those of an exceptional character to be dealt with by express stipulation between the parties.

Bovill, for the plaintiff, (Raymond and Bosanquet with him) was not heard.

Cur. adv. vult.

WILLIAMS, J.—In this case the judgment will be affirmed for the reasons assented to by all the Court in Burges v. Wickham (1), as to the meaning of the term seaworthiness. We express no opinion upon the question controverted by Blackburn, J. in that case, as to the admissibility of parol evidence to qualify a warranty in a written policy, either express or implied.

Debtor and Creditor—Bankruptcy Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 134. s. 192.)—Composition - Deed, Validity of — Cessio Bonorum.

To an action on a promissory note, the defendant pleaded, by way of equitable defence, that, after the accruing of the plaintiff's claim, he was indebted to the plaintiff and divers other persons, and that a deed was made and entered into by and between the defendant of the one part, and the several persons being creditors of the defendant who should execute the same of the other part, relating to the debts and liabilities of the defendant and his release therefrom. The deed was set out in the plea, and after reciting that the defendant, being unable to pay his debts in full, had applied to his said several creditors to receive a composition of 2s. 6d. in the pound, it went on as follows: "which we, the several creditors signing these presents, have agreed to do, and being a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the creditors of the said (defendant) whose debts respectively amount to 10l. and upwards, have agreed to accept such composition as aforesaid, and in consideration thereof, and on payment thereof, or whenever thereafter called upon for the purpose, hereby severally undertake and agree to execute to the said (defendant) a good and sufficient release in the law of our several and respective claims and demands upon him." The plea then averred that a majority representing three-fourths in value of the creditors of the defendant, whose debts respectively amounted to 10l. and upwards, did in writing assent to and approve of the execution of the said deed; that the deed was duly registered, and that the plaintiff was bound thereby as if he had been a party thereto, and had duly executed the same:—Held, that the plaintiff, though a non-assenting creditor, was barred by the deed from maintaining his action; that the deed was a valid deed within section 192. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, as it sufficiently shewed that it was intended to be an arrangement between the debtor and the whole body of his creditors, as all had the option of coming in and signing it; that it was not unequal, although there was no compulsory clause directing the debtor to pay the composition; and that it was not necessary to the validity of a composition-deed that there should be any cessio bonorum.

Error was brought by the plaintiff to reverse the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in favour of the defendant on a demurrer (1).

The declaration was upon a promissory note made by the defendant for the sum of 100l., with the usual common counts.

Plea, by way of equitable defence, except as to 14l. 10s., parcel, &c., that after the accruing of the plaintiff's claim, and after the 11th of October 1861, the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff and divers other persons; and, thereupon, while he was so indebted, a deed, bearing date the 8th of March 1862, was made and entered into by and between the defendant of the one part, and the several persons being creditors of the defendant who should execute the same of the other part, relating to the debts and liabilities of the defendant, and his release therefrom, which said deed, without the schedule, was in the words following, that is to say: "This indenture, made the 8th day of March 1862, between Joseph Robert Wilkin Atkinson, of No. 6, Alma Terrace, Kensington, in the county of Middlesex, gentleman, of the one part, and the undersigned creditors of the said J. R. W. Atkinson, of the other part. Whereas the said J. R. W. Atkinson from divers causes is unable to pay us, the said several creditors, full 20s. in the pound, and whereas the said J. R. W. Atkinson hath applied to us to receive and take a composition of 2s. 6d. in the pound in full satisfaction and discharge of our several and respective claims and demands on him, payable on the 9th of March 1863, which we, the several creditors signing these presents, have agreed to do, and being a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the creditors of the said J. R. W. Atkinson, whose debts respectively amount to 10*l.* and upwards, have agreed to accept such composition as aforesaid; and in consideration thereof, and on payment thereof, or whenever thereafter called upon for the purpose, hereby severally undertake and agree to execute to the said J. R. W. Atkinson a good and sufficient release in law of our several and respective claims and demands on him. In witness hereof the parties hereto have respectively subscribed and set their hands and seals."

The plea then alleged that a majority in number, representing three-fourths in value of the creditors of the defendant whose debts respectively amounted to 10*l.* and upwards did in writing assent to and approve of the said deed, that the deed was duly registered, and that the plaintiff was bound thereby as if he had been a party thereto and had duly executed the same. It then averred the tender to the plaintiff of the 2*s.* 6*d.* in the pound on his debt, and the plaintiff's refusal to accept it.

Demurrer and joinder in demurrer.

Kemplay, for the defendant, the plaintiff in error.—The deed is confined to the debtor and the particular creditors who signed it, and is not a deed for the benefit of all the creditors; therefore the plaintiff, a non-assenting creditor, is not bound by it. It does not on the face of it shew that it is a deed for the equal benefit of all the creditors. It ought to shew (what this deed does not) that it is a deed in respect of all the debts and all the liabilities of the debtor—Ilderton v. Castrique (2), Ilderton v. Jewell (3), Dingwall v. Edwards (4), Hodgson v. Wightman (5), which is similar to this case, and by which the Court below felt themselves bound, is not law. The introduction of the words to the effect that the creditors who execute are a majority in number and three-fourths in value of all the creditors, cannot affect the construction of this deed in respect to the question, whether it purports to affect all the creditors. The statement may not even be true. It is not requisite that that number should execute the deed. If they assent to it in writing it is sufficient. Secondly, the deed is unreasonable and unequal. It does not provide for the payment of the composition to the creditors, but leaves it in the debtor's power to pay some and not to pay others. He might, therefore, tender the 2*s.* 6*d.* in the pound to some, and purposely fail to do so to those whom he wished to prefer, and who for failure of such tender could recover their whole debts. Thirdly, the deed is void, because it contains no cessio bonorum. In Walter v. Adcock (6), there are strong opinions expressed in favour of the necessity of a cessio bonorum. The observations to the contrary in Ex parte Morgan (7), Ex parte Rawlings (8), and Ex parte Cockburn (9), are mere dicta. There has been no decision on the point under the Bankruptcy Act of 1861, except the case now under review. But in Tetley v. Taylor (10) there is an express decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber that a cessio bonorum was necessary under the old law. There is no such difference between the act of 1861 and the previous statutes as to make that decision inapplicable.

Macnamara, for the defendant. — The judgment below is correct. The Court will construe the deed so as to support it if possible. The deed is meant to apply to all the creditors. Pursuant to its language every creditor may come in and sign it if he please. The statute makes the deed to affect all the creditors when signed and duly assented to by the requisite number. If the deed is applicable to all the creditors and is signed by some and is intended for the benefit of all, it is sufficient. It is admitted by the demurrer that the deed relates to all the debts and liabilities of the debtor, for the plea expressly avers that fact. Non-assenting creditors are here put on an equal footing with those who assent. Hodgson v. Wightman (5) is expressly in point on a deed framed like the present deed. The General Furnishing Company v. Venn (11), Macnaught v. Russell (12) and Feltham v. Cudworth (13) are to the same effect. Secondly, the provision as to the payment of the composition money is sufficient. It is a reasonable provision, and equally applicable to all. It cannot be supposed that a debtor would wilfully neglect to pay 2s. 6d. in the pound, and leave himself liable to the whole debt. Thirdly, a cessio bonorum is not necessary. Tetley v. Taylor (10) has no longer any application. The provisions of the new and the old statutes are very different on this point. The Bankruptcy Act of 1849 contained a stipulation that the joint and separate assets of the debtor should be distributed as in bankruptcy. No such provision is contained in the act of 1861. Though the deed contains no release in terms, yet if a creditor were to attempt to act contrary to it, the Court of Chancery would grant a perpetual injunction to prohibit him.

Kemplay replied.

WILLIAMS, J.—The question is, whether the deed set out in the plea is a bar to the plaintiff's claim. The parties thereto are, the debtor of the one part, and the undersigned creditors of the other part. It recites a proposal by the debtor to pay a composition of 2s. 6d. in the pound on the 9th of March 1863, and states that the creditors signing the deed, being the requisite majority, have agreed to receive that sum in discharge of their debts. The plaintiff did not sign the deed, but he is bound thereby if the deed fulfils the conditions imposed by section 192. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and the following sections. We are of opinion that it does. It is within the words of section 192, being a composition-deed between the debtor and his creditors; and it is not shewn that any of the required conditions mentioned in section 192. of the statute have not been observed. The parties intended that the deed should be within that section, as it states the signing creditors to be the requisite majority in number and value. One objection was, that the deed was made with the creditors who signed, and not with all; but all the creditors have the option of coming in and signing. Therefore the objection on this ground fails.

It was further objected that the deed was unequal, as it left to the debtor the option of paying the composition to some of his creditors and of leaving the others at liberty to recover their debts in full. But we cannot assume that the debtor would choose to pay 20s. in the pound, when he could bar the claim by paying 2s. 6d. in the pound. We see no reason for assuming that any such course would be adopted. If the deed was tainted with fraud it would be void, and the object of the debtor would be defeated. In Waller v. Adcock (6) a deed in the same form was held to be a deed within section 192. In Ilderton v. Castrique (2) the deed was decided to be no defence, but the grounds of objection on which the Court relied were different from those which were pressed upon us here; and in that case the judgment of Blackburn, J. supports the validity of a deed in this form. Although no remedy is given for recovering the composition of 2s. 6d. in the pound, yet the liability to pay 20s. in the pound in case it is withheld, is a sufficient security.

It was further objected that the deed contained no cessio bonorum. But in Ex parte Rawlings (8) Turner, L.J. gives an elaborate judgment in his Court, that no objection can be sustained on that ground. So is the declared opinion of the present Lord Chancellor (Lord Westbury) in Ex parte Morgan (7). The reasons assigned in those cases in Chancery we adopt here, as the ground of our judgment, that the deed may be valid under the act of 1861 without a cessio bonorum.

On these grounds we affirm the judgment of the Court below.

I ought to add, that my Brother Willes concurs in the judgment with great reluctance, as he thinks the deed illusory.

The other JUDGES concurred.

Judgment affirmed.

Nov. 4. } LEY RAILWAY COMPANY.

Railway Company—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act (8 Vict. c. 18), s. 68.—Compensation—Notice of Claim—“Nature of Interest.”

The 68th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act enacts, that it shall be lawful for any person entitled to any compensation in respect of any lands or of any interest therein, which shall have been taken for or injuriously affected by the execution of the works, and for which no satisfaction shall have been made, to give notice in writing to the promoters of his desire to have the question of compensation decided by arbitration, “stating in such notice the nature of his interest in the lands in respect of which he claims compensation, and the amount he claims”; and if he desires a jury, then it shall be lawful for him to give notice thereof in writing, “stating such particulars as aforesaid:”—Held, that where lands have been taken, in order to bring himself within this clause a claimant must give, in his notice for a jury, such reasonable information as to his interest as will enable the promoters to judge whether they will pay the whole claim, or what amount they ought to offer; and where the claimant is occupier under a lease for years, it is not sufficient to state in the notice that he “holds under a lease.”

Cameron v. the Charing Cross Railway Company (1) commented upon.

*Declaration—That the plaintiff having an interest in certain pieces of land taken by the defendants under the powers of their act of parliament for making a railway, and in certain other pieces injuriously affected by the execution of the works, and the plaintiff desiring to have the question of compensation settled by a jury, gave notice to the defendants, stating in such notice the nature of his interest in the said lands in respect of which he claimed compensation, the amount claimed being 1,031*l.* 14*s.* 6*d.; that the defendants did not within twenty-one days after the receipt of the notice issue their warrant to the sheriff to summon a jury; and that the plaintiff by reason of such default became entitled to the sum claimed.

Plea, inter alia, that the plaintiff did not state in his notice the nature of his interest in the lands in respect of which he claimed compensation, in accordance with the provisions of “The Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.”

At the trial, before Crompton, J., at the Sittings in Middlesex in Easter Term, it appeared that the plaintiff was the lessee and occupier of a house and land at Hampton, under a lease for the term of eleven years, from Midsummer-day, 1853. The defendants were empowered, under the 25 & 26 Vict. c. clii., to take certain portions of the plaintiff's land for the formation of their railway, and on the 21st of May 1863 gave him notice to treat. Negotiations were entered into between the parties, but no agreement was come to.

*The defendants had entered on the land, as the jury found, on the 23rd of May 1863; and on the 7th of December 1863 the plaintiff served the defendants with a notice that he desired a jury. This notice, after describing the plaintiff's claim as a claim in respect of lands in the parish of Hampton, the particulars of which were contained in the notice served on him on the 21st of May 1863, under the defendants' act, proceeded to state: “The said lands and hereditaments are held by me on lease, and are used partly as and for private grounds, and partly for farming and agricultural purposes. I, the said T. Healey, do claim, as and for the value of my estate and interest in the said lands and hereditaments, and as compensation for the damage that has been and will be sustained by me by reason of the said lands and hereditaments being compulsorily taken by the said railway company, and by reason of the injuriously affecting the lands and hereditaments adjoining the lands required to be taken, and now in my possession and occupation, by the exercise of the powers of the said act, the sum of 1,031*l.* 14*s.* 6*d.”

The defendants did not take any steps on this notice, and the plaintiff accordingly commenced the present action on the 9th of January 1864, and claimed to be entitled to recover the whole amount claimed.

(1) 16 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 430; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 318.

It was objected, by the defendants' counsel (inter alia), that the above notice was insufficient, within the 68th section of the 8 Vict. c. 18; and a verdict was returned for the plaintiff for the amount claimed; leave being reserved to move to enter the verdict for the defendants, if the Court should be of opinion that the notice was insufficient.

A rule nisi was afterwards obtained accordingly, on the ground that the notice was not sufficient, within the 68th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 18), and that it did not contain a sufficient statement of the nature of the plaintiff's interest within that section (2).

J. D. Coleridge and Patchett (Nov. 2 and 3) shewed cause.—The notice describes the interest of the plaintiff sufficiently. By the 68th section, when a person claiming compensation for lands taken wishes the matter to be settled by a jury, he is to give notice, stating "such particulars as aforesaid"; those words are to be construed by looking to the earlier part of the section, which requires the party entitled to compensation to state in his notice of arbitration the "nature of his interest in the lands in respect of which he claims compensation, and the amount of compensation claimed"; and it cannot be denied that the notice does specify the nature of the interest which the plaintiff has in the lands taken by the company; that is to say, that he was the lessee of such lands, and that he used them for private grounds, and for farming and agricultural purposes.

[MELLOR, J.—But is not the claimant bound to give the promoters some means of forming an estimate of the value of the plaintiff's interest; so that before he can put this penal clause into operation, they may be able to make an adequate offer for it?]

By giving them notice that he holds under a lease, he enables them to require the production of the lease, under section 122; and if he refuses to produce it, he suffers from the consequence imposed upon such refusal; namely, that he cannot claim any further compensation than he would be entitled to if he were a tenant from year to year simply.

[CROMPTON, J.—There is a difficulty there, for the claimant need not produce the lease till after the expiration of twenty-one days after notice; while the promoters are bound, by section 68, to issue their warrant within twenty-one days after the receipt of the notice of the claimant.]

There is the same difficulty under section 38, by which they must give ten days' notice before issuing their warrant.

[MELLOR, J.—I doubt whether sections 122. and 38. refer to this case at all.]

If the claimant refuses to produce the lease, the promoters may countermand their warrant.

[CROMPTON, J.—A very heavy penalty is imposed on the company after a proper notice has been made. The nature of the interest should be stated in the notice; do you do so, when there is no statement

(2) The 8 Vict. c. 18. s. 68. is as follows:

"If any party shall be entitled to any compensation in respect of any lands, or of any interest therein, which shall have been taken for or injuriously affected by the execution of the works, and for which the promoters of the undertaking shall not have made satisfaction under the provisions of this or the special act, or any act incorporated therewith, and if the compensation claimed in such case shall exceed the sum of 50*l.*, such party may have the same settled either by arbitration or by the verdict of a jury, as he shall think fit; and if such party desire to have the same settled by arbitration, it shall be lawful for him to give notice in writing to the promoters of the undertaking of such his desire, stating in such notice the nature of the interest in such lands in respect of which he claims compensation, and the amount of the compensation so claimed therein, and unless the promoters of the undertaking be willing to pay the amount of compensation so claimed, and shall enter into a written agreement for that purpose within twenty-one days after the receipt of any such notice from any party so entitled, the same shall be settled by arbitration in the manner herein provided; or if the party so entitled as aforesaid desire to have such question of compensation settled by a jury, it shall be lawful for him to give notice in writing of such his desire to the promoters of the undertaking, stating such particulars as aforesaid; and unless the promoters of the undertaking be willing to pay the amount of compensation so claimed, and enter into a written agreement for that purpose, they shall, within twenty-one days after the receipt of such notice, issue their warrant to the sheriff to summon a jury for settling the same in the manner herein provided; and in default thereof they shall be liable to pay to the party so entitled as aforesaid the amount of compensation so claimed, and the same may be recovered by him, with costs, by action in any of the superior Courts."

whether the lease is for fifty years, or for life, or what it is for?]

The terms of the notice, under section 68, need not be so precise as the terms of the notice referred to in section 18, which is to contain "the particulars of their estate and interest in such lands."

[MELLOR, J.—Then, where things are proceeding regularly under sections 18. and 21, more particularity is required than when hostilely, and with a possibility of a penalty being incurred on the part of the company.]

The question has already been decided by the Court of Common Pleas in Cameron v. the Charing Cross Railway Company (1), where it was held, that a notice which simply stated that the claimant was "the occupier of a dwelling-house, bakehouse and shop, situate," &c., was sufficient.

[MELLOR, J.—It may be that that decision was quite correct, for the claim was in respect of the injury to the trade of the claimant—an injury already done and completed—and therefore the time during which he was to be the occupier would make no difference.]

The decision was given upon the words of the very same section; and the amount of injury would depend upon the time during which the claimant was to be the occupier.

[MELLOR, J.—The promoters are to pay all the costs if the jury give a larger sum than that which has been offered by them (s. 51), so that it is very material that the notice should give them the means of understanding what the interest of the claimant is. COCKBURN, C.J.—And the nature of the interest with reference to the injury is most material.]

This may easily be ascertained by further inquiry. It is impossible for a surveyor to ascertain the value of a person's interest merely from a statement of the duration of the interest; all the covenants, &c. of the lease would have to be taken into consideration. This is expressly pointed out in the case of Cameron v. the Charing Cross Railway Company (1). In The North Staffordshire Railway Company v. Landor (3) Parke, B. says, that an award, within the 18th section, must state the particular interest of the parties, whether an estate in fee or life, or what other interest; but the learned Judge says nothing about the duration of the interest. If the decision in Cameron v. the Charing Cross Railway Company (1) proceeds on the knowledge the parties had irrespectively of the notice, then in the present case there can be no doubt that the defendants knew what the duration of the plaintiff's interest was, for in the course of the negotiations they had a copy of his lease (4).

[COCKBURN, C.J.—We cannot take that into consideration. The question is, whether the notice must give reasonable information; and supposing the claimant to have done nothing but send this notice in, whether, having regard to the subject of this claim, viz., not temporary injury, but permanent taking of land, the statement that he holds the land on lease is sufficient.]

Bovill, in support of the rule.—The distinction has already been pointed out from the Bench between this case and Cameron v. the Charing Cross Railway Company (1), and if the judgments and dicta of every one of the learned Judges in that case are examined, it is clear that, if that had been the case of taking land, the decision would have been against the sufficiency of the notice. There are two conclusive reasons why the "particulars" mentioned in the clause of the 68th section as to a jury, must be taken to mean the particulars as mentioned in section 18; or if referring to the "nature of the interest," &c. mentioned in the first part of section 68, then that "nature of interest" must include the quantity as well as quality of the estate. In the first place, this notice is the foundation of the jurisdiction of the compensation jury, and the interest shewn in the notice is the basis of the calculation on which the jury must award compensation, and it is only on an action being brought for the amount awarded that the company can contest the claimant's title. Secondly, reasonable information must be given to the company in order that they may be able to form an approximate estimate, at least, to the value of the claimant's real interest, so as to enable the parties to come to an agreement; or, if not, to enable the company to protect themselves from the liability to pay costs, which without reasonable information they would be unable to do, except by at once tendering the whole amount claimed.—(He was then stopped by the Court.)

COCKBURN, C.J.—We are of opinion that this rule should be made absolute. I own I have had some difficulty in arriving at this conclusion, because the language of the legislature in the 68th section, upon which this question turns, does to my mind prima facie imply that the notice should contain a statement of the quality of the interest of the claimant in the land, without comprehending also the necessity for stating the quantity of it. The “nature of the interest” seems to me rather to infer that the quality of the interest in the land, be it freehold or be it leasehold, should be stated, and so forth, than as embracing a statement of the number of years for which the claimant’s lease is to run, in case the interest should be of a leasehold tenure. But although that may be the signification which, prima facie, I should attach to the words used in the 68th section, yet the term is general and vague, and may have been used by the legislature as intending to comprehend a statement of the quantity as well as the quality. And interpreting these words by the light which is to be obtained from other parts of the statute in question, and from the general considerations which present themselves with reference to this subject, if we see reason to believe that by putting the narrower construction we shall be defeating the intention of the legislature, and that which may reasonably be presumed to have been the purpose of the legislature, then I think we ought to put the larger construction upon the language in question, so as to give effect to what we believe to have been the intention of the legislature. Now the scheme of this legislation with reference to lands to be taken by railway companies against the will, or, at all events, without the consent of the proprietor, appears to be this. Where power is given to a company to take lands without the consent of the proprietor, they are, in the first place, to give him the notice required by the statute of such intention to take, and they are likewise to give notice of their readiness and willingness to treat with the party interested for the value of the land, and in order to enable them to do so they are, by the 18th section, to demand of the party particulars of his interest. It is plain that is to enable them to treat, on fair grounds, with the proprietor of the land. If the proprietor intends to negotiate with them, and so to avoid the necessity of litigation, he must furnish those particulars, and I think no one can doubt the meaning of the term “particulars” in the 18th section must be taken to be, such particulars as would enable the company to meet the just claim of the party by ascertaining what is the true value of the land, offering him compensation accordingly. Then, if the party declines to treat, or if, negotiations having been entered into, they prove abortive, and do not produce any satisfactory result, the company are not to be deprived of the right which the legislature has given to them of acquiring the land necessary for the purpose for which the company is constituted, but they are to take possession. Then, in that case the position of the parties is reversed, and the proprietor of the land must make the claim for compensation. In that claim the 68th section requires that he should state the “nature of his interest,” and the question we have to determine is, whether he is bound to do less in the way of the statement of particulars, than he would have been bound to do if he had been making a statement of the particulars in the first instance I have mentioned. Now, there can be no reason why he should give less complete information where he is claiming adversely compensation of the company, they having taken possession of his land, than where he does so with a view to a negotiation which may end in their being satisfied of the value of his land. On the contrary, it strikes me there is the greater reason, as soon as the hostile attitude is assumed between the parties, why the landowner should give complete information, inasmuch as if the parties cannot agree, and the matter goes to arbitration or before a jury, the company will have to pay the penalty of costs, if they do not make such an offer as the jury shall afterwards deem reasonable. There seems, therefore, more reason why full particulars should be enforced under the 68th section. Although the language used in that section, as I have already pointed out, might, at first sight, appear capable only of a more limited construction, yet when one looks to what clearly must have been the intention of the legislature, it is not because that form of expression may have been used that we are to adopt that limited construction, if by any reasonable latitude of construction and without putting undue force upon the words used, we can give a construction which appears to do reasonable justice. Now, it is quite plain that the legislature has pointed out that unless the company have these particulars, or have particulars much more extensive than those which have been afforded in the present instance, they cannot be in a right position either to satisfy the claim of the owner of the land without having recourse to litigation; or if he makes a claim which they consider to be greater than he is entitled to make, they cannot put themselves on a right footing by making such an offer as will bear them harmless with regard to the costs in the event of the jury determining that they are not to pay a larger sum. On all these grounds, therefore, I think the true construction of this language used in the 68th section, that is, the "nature of the interest," is, that it is synonymous with and equivalent to the term "particulars of estate and interest," which is used in the 18th section. Now, in this case, all that the claimant has stated is, that his interest is a leasehold interest. That really affords no information whereby the company may be guided as to paying him at once the full amount of compensation he has claimed, or making him an offer which would put him in a right position as to the costs. I think, therefore, the claimant in this instance has not done sufficient, and that the company are entitled to say that this notice is not one under which they are bound to pay the full amount of compensation claimed.

As to the case which has been so much pressed upon our attention (Cameron v. the Charing Cross Railway Company) (1), I do not at all quarrel with the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas. Perhaps there may be language occurring in the judgments which would not have been used by the learned Judges if they had had the present case before them. But fully concurring in the decision of that case, upon the ground that all that was necessary there was, that the interest should be stated as being the interest of an occupier, the obstruction having been temporary and not permanent, and therefore it being clearly unnecessary, in order to guide the company, that the claimant should state whether he was the occupier for the time or for any longer term, fully concurring in the propriety of the decision, I cannot go the length of saying, as it is contended for the plaintiff, that the language of the learned Judges applies to the case now before us. I think that the true construction to be put on the language of the 68th section is, that it requires the same statement of particulars as would have been required under the 18th section, and that it being agreed on all hands that under the 18th section the present statement would not be sufficient, the company are right in their contention.

CROMPTON, J.—I have come to the same conclusion. What we are now to decide upon is, whether a valid notice was given by the plaintiff to the company. The 68th section puts the company in a very bad position; it subjects them to pay the whole of the money claimed if they do not perform an act which they are ordered by the legislature to perform on receiving a valid notice. Therefore it comes, in my mind, to this question: Is this a sufficient, valid notice? Now, I think it is not valid, whatever view we may take of the particular words used in the 68th section. Looking to the words of that part of the section in question, "stating such particulars as aforesaid," coupling them with the "nature of the claim and the extent of the compensation" in the section before, and then looking back to where the word "particulars" in a similar matter have occurred before, I am very much inclined to think it would not be a strained construction to say the legislature meant the same thing by all these expressions. Modern legislation looks more to elegant wording, so to speak, endeavouring not to use the same language again and again; and we have to complain frequently of variations of language, for no earthly purpose that I can discover, except that it looks rather better in print. However that may be, it appears to me that this is not a sufficient notice. The act of parliament directs notice to be given, and on the claimant giving that notice in a valid way, if the company do not obey it, they are put in the situation of having to pay all the money. Therefore, I think, we should see very clearly that a valid notice is given under such provisions. Notice is to be given by the person entitled. Why is that to be given? It must be for some object. The object is, that the company may act upon it, and the company are to act upon it, by seeing whether they can come to an agreement to pay or not. What does this notice say? All that it says is, that the interest is "leasehold." It does not say, as it happened to be in this case, a leasehold with about a year remaining, or whether it is a tenancy from year to year, or a freehold lease for life, or whether it is a very long valuable lease. It really does not give any information upon which the company could act. I agree with what seems to have fallen from the Court of Common Pleas in Cameron v. Charing Cross Railway Company (1), that it is not meant that the notice is to supersede fair inquiry. The most minute particulars a notice could give, would still leave it necessary for the company to inquire, if they did not know beforehand, as to the value of the land in the neighbourhood, and other matters; but in my opinion, the claimant is to give them sufficiently reasonable notice, so that they should be put upon inquiries to enable them to act. This really, to my mind, gives no such notice. I treat this as a question of the sufficiency of the notice, with reference to the subject-matter before us, and I think that this view is rather strengthened by the case in the Court of Common Pleas; because, all the Judges in that case put the question as arising on the nature of the claim, and that they are to judge of the sufficiency quoad the circumstances under which the claim is made, and the circumstances of the case. That is the principle upon which we now go—whether this is sufficient with reference to a claim for taking land. It is observable that my Brother Keating expressly puts this very distinction. He says, "The distinction was expressly pointed out by Mr. MacLachlan, in his able argument, between the notice required where the Company give notice of their intention to take land, and the notice in a case like this, where the claim is in respect of an injury which could only affect the occupying tenant." I give my judgment in this case, upon the notion that claimants are to give a notice which will be of some assistance to the company. Whether they do give a sufficient notice, I think, is a question of law for us, just like the question, whether the notice of dishonour of a bill of exchange is sufficient. I think we are to determine whether this is a sufficient notice. To my mind this is not sufficient under the circumstances, and therefore the rule must be made absolute.

MELLOR, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I will not repeat the observations of my Lord Chief Justice, with reference to the machinery of the act in general; but I entirely agree in the view he has taken of the general provisions, and the effect of them; but looking at this particular section, I certainly think the words "nature of the interest in such lands" may be read to include, not only quality, but quantity, when we find them used in immediate connexion with the words which follow: "the nature of the interest in such lands, in respect of which he claims compensation, and the amount of compensation so claimed therein." Then observe what follows: "And unless the promoters of the undertaking be willing to pay the whole amount of the compensation so claimed, and enter into a written agreement for that purpose, they shall issue their warrant within a certain period to summon a jury, or in default they shall be liable to pay the whole amount claimed." One cannot read these words without seeing that the legislature intend the company, in the particular position of the parties contemplated, to have the information requisite to enable them to form some judgment as to the nature of the interest they were required to pay or tender compensation for; and I think it is, as my Brother Crompton has said, a question, under all circumstances of this particular case, whether the notice is sufficient or not. Entirely agreeing, as I do, in the decision of the Court of Common Pleas in the case referred to—Cameron v. the Charing Cross Railway Company (1)—I think it will be found, on looking at the expressions of the Lord Chief Justice, of my Brother Willes particularly, and also of my Brother Keating, that they were only looking at the particular circumstances of the case, and the nature of the interest which was there alleged to have been injuriously affected. The nature of the injury and of the interest alleged to have been injuriously affected, as already pointed out, was an injury to the occupation, which injury was really determined before the occupation had ceased. Therefore, every possible information which could be required by the company in that case, to enable them to determine what they should pay, was afforded by the notice. I agree in this, that it is not intended the notice should supersede all inquiry on the part of the company. The company, with reference to all matters which are patent, may still find out for themselves, but the nature of the information which must be given is that which is peculiar to the claimant himself, and therefore the notice must, as it appears to me, give that information which is in possession of the party, to enable the company to form some judgment as to the propriety of the claim made upon them, before they determine whether they will issue their warrant or not.

SHEP, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think, in considering the 68th section of the act, we must look, not only to the words of the section, but to the words of those sections which are necessarily and more specially connected with it, including those, and they are the principal ones, to which my Lord Chief Justice adverted, at the commencement of the act of parliament,—the 18th, 19th and 21st. But, further than that, I think we must look at section 38. and section 51, and we must construe the last clause of the 68th section with reference, of course, to the manifest object, and to the effect which the construction would have upon the construction of those two other sections, the 38th and the 51st.

Now, the 68th section provides, that "if any party shall be entitled to any compensation in respect of any lands or of any interest therein which shall have been taken or injuriously affected by the company, and shall desire to have such question of compensation settled by a jury, it shall be lawful for him to give notice in writing of such his desire to the promoters of the undertaking, stating such particulars as aforesaid, and unless the promoters of the undertaking be willing to pay the amount of compensation so claimed, and enter into an agreement for the purpose, or unless they issue their warrant within twenty-one days to the sheriff to summon a jury, then they shall pay the whole of the amount claimed." Now, if we look back to section 38. we shall find that on this requirement of the legislature that they shall issue their warrant within twenty-one days is necessarily involved this further requirement, that they shall give not less than ten days' notice of their intention to cause such jury to be summoned, and in such notice they shall state what sum of money they are willing to give for the interest in such lands sought to be purchased by them from such party, and for the damage to be sustained by him in the execution of the works. So that, incorporating that section with the 68th, it is absolutely incumbent on the company that they shall not only within twenty-one days issue a warrant to the sheriff to summon a jury, but that they shall also state the amount they are willing to pay; and then, if we refer to the 51st section of the act, we shall find that if they offer a sum less than is finally recovered, they will have to pay the whole of the costs. Now, putting all these three sections together, it seems to me to be almost impossible to suppose that the legislature could have intended that it would be sufficient to give to the company a general notice, which did not give them the least means of ascertaining whether the compensation which was claimed was a reasonable compensation or not. Certainly, merely stating that it was a leasehold interest would not enable them to form any estimate at all. I have had a doubt in the course of the argument,—in which, however, my Lord Chief Justice and my learned Brothers do not agree with me,—whether it may be possible that the words "nature of the interest" refer only to the case of arbitration, in the 23rd section of the act, and in the last clause but one of the 68th; but I do not found my judgment upon that at all. I think it may well be that this word "particulars," at the end of the section, refers as well to the words "nature of the interest" in the earlier part of the section, and to the words at the commencement of the section, "entitled to any compensation in respect of any lands or of any interest therein, which shall have been taken for, or injuriously affected by the execution of the works." The word "particulars" may refer to both these parts of the section. I entirely agree, therefore, with the judgment of the rest of the Court.

Rule absolute.

Highway-Rate—Exemption—Evidence of Hamlet repairing its own Highways.

The hamlet of M. forms part of the parish of S. but the lands in M. had never been assessed to the highway-rates of S. nor had S. ever repaired or contributed to the repair of the highways in M. From 1828 to 1841, by living testimony, and previously, by evidence of reputation, it appeared that highway-rates were assessed upon the lands in M. by the neighbouring parish of W. jointly with the lands in W. and the highways in M. were repaired by the surveyors of W. out of such rates jointly with the highways in W. without any distinction. Since 1841, by private arrangement between M. and W. M. ceased to be assessed to the highway-rates of W.; and the occupiers in M. by arrangement among themselves, repaired the highways in M. without any rate or assessment being made:—Held, that a part of one parish could not legally be united to another parish for the purpose of the repair of the highways, and that no continuing consideration was shewn on the part of S. so as to create a liability on the part of W. to repair the highways in M. being part of S.; and that there was no sufficient evidence to draw the inference of fact that M., though part of S. had been originally a hamlet repairing its own highways. That there was therefore no sufficient ground of exemption shewn by the hamlet of M. to avoid its prima facie liability to contribute to the highway-rates of the parish of S. of which it formed part.

1864. }
Nov. 30. }

THE QUEEN v. PAYN.

Coroner's Inquest—Adjournment of the Court.

If a coroner's inquest on a dead body be adjourned, and on the day appointed the Court be not formally opened and further adjourned, the proceedings drop and the Court is dissolved, and everything else done in the matter of the inquest is coram non judice; and this is the case, even where the adjournment takes place only for the purpose of drawing up a formal inquisition after the jury have, in substance, agreed upon their verdict.

This was a rule for a certiorari to bring up an inquisition taken by W. H. Payn, the coroner of Dover, on a dead body, for the purpose of quashing the same.

The proceedings on the inquest, which was held at Margate, commenced on the 2nd of August, and were duly continued to the 5th of the same month, on which day the jury in writing agreed, in substance, on their verdict. The inquest was then adjourned to the 8th of August, for the purpose of having the inquisition formally drawn up in the mean time. The jurors were bound by recognizances to meet again at Margate on the 8th. On the 6th of August, however, the coroner having ascertained that the inquisition would not be ready by the 8th, wrote to the constable, the summoning officer, to inform the jurors that the inquest was further adjourned for a day or two. On the 8th of August the coroner, who resided at Dover, did not attend, and no Court was opened or adjourned. On the 12th of August the constable, by the coroner's written direction, gave a fresh notice to the jurors, who met accordingly on that day, and signed the inquisition, after some discussion as to its terms.

Francis shewed cause (Nov. 25).—The inquisition is valid. A regular adjournment was not necessary at that stage of the proceedings. The substance of the verdict had been agreed upon. It only remained to put it into a legal and formal shape. There is no authority that formal adjournment is absolutely essential to the jurisdiction of the coroner and jury. In 2 Burn's Justice of the Peace, tit. 'Coroner,' p. 37, 29th edit.

it is recommended that the inquisition should be signed before the jury disperse. It is not there spoken of as essential. Secondly, there was a sufficient adjournment. The writing the letter to the summoning officer to put off the meeting, and writing a second letter to bid the jurors assemble at the further day, are sufficient. It was not necessary for the coroner to attend personally on the 8th, and go through the formal process of adjourning the Court to the 12th.

Henry James, in support of the rule.—The proceedings dropped by the non-attendance of the coroner on the 8th. If his letter to summon the jurors to re-assemble were to be treated as a summoning of a second inquest on the 12th of August, that inquest would be bad because not held super visum corporis, and because no evidence was taken on it. The practice on a coroner's inquest is for the court to be opened and to be adjourned from day to day by proclamation—Jervis on Coroners, 290, 293, 1st ed. A coroner's court is like a Court of Quarter Sessions, if it is not duly adjourned the Court has no jurisdiction—The King v. West Torrington (1). The public interest is concerned in its being fully and openly stated when a coroner's court is to re-assemble. The meeting at which the inquisition is signed is most important. Until a juror has actually signed the inquisition, he may change his mind and alter the verdict. If a coroner were ill, the proceedings would have to commence de novo, as in the case of a judge of assize being taken ill on the trial of a cause.

Cur. adv. vult.

SHEE, J.—It is of great importance that the duties of coroners in holding inquisitions super visum corporis should be conducted with the observance of those forms which have been established to ensure regularity. The forms of adjournment are requisite to secure the re-attendance of the jurors after an adjournment at the time and place appointed, and the continuity of the proceedings from the first meeting of the inquest until its completion by the signing of the inquisition. In this case the adjournment from the 5th to the 8th was for the purpose of having the inquisition drawn in the proper form to give effect to the verdict of the jury. If the coroner had taken the trouble, as it was his duty to do, of going from Dover to Margate on the 8th of August, and again adjourned the inquest to a day certain, all would have been right; but not having done so, the final and important proceeding of adopting and signing the inquisition did not take place under the original precept, and was coram non jure. The rule, therefore, will be absolute.

Poor Rate—Railway—Rateable Occupation—Easement—Running Powers.

Under the powers of an act of parliament, a railway was constructed from G. to C, for the common purposes of the G. W. Company and the M. Company, each paying half the cost; on the completion, the half of the railway nearest G. became the sole property of the M. Company, and the half nearest C. the sole property of the G. W. Company. Each company was bound to keep its own half in repair and supply the staff of officials, &c. necessary on that half for the traffic of both companies. The railway was constructed for broad and narrow gauge traffic, with three rails on each line; and in practice the G. W. Company used the broad gauge and the M. Company the narrow, so that of the three rails one was used in common and one exclusively by each company. The traffic of the M. Company far exceeded that of the G. W. Company:—Held, that there was no rateable occupation by the M. Company of the G. W. Company's half of the railway, but only an easement, and that the M. Company were therefore not rateable to the poor-rate of a parish through which that half of the railway passed.

Semble, the G. W. Company were rateable for their half of the railway in respect of the value of the occupation as enhanced by the profits made over it by the M. Company.

Ship—Policy of Marine Insurance—16 & 17 Vict. c. 107. (Customs Consolidation Act) ss. 170, 171, 172.—Deck Cargo—Illegality of Voyage—Owner—Master.

To a declaration on a policy of insurance upon freight on a voyage from R. to Liverpool, averring a total loss by perils of the sea, the defendant pleaded, fourthly, that the cargo consisted of timber and wood, that R. is a port in British North America, that the voyage commenced after 1st September and before 1st May, and the master stowed a portion of the cargo on deck, contrary to the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107. ss. 170–2, and sailed without the certificate required by that statute, and that the plaintiff was the owner of the ship. Fifth plea, the same as the fourth, with a further averment that the plaintiff intended that the vessel should sail so loaded, and made the policy for the express purpose of protecting the adventure.

At the trial the following facts appeared: The whole of the cargo that was on freight was properly stowed below deck; but the master placed some spars on deck to be carried to Liverpool for the owner, having no instructions from the owner to do so. The vessel was not made unseaworthy by the mode of loading, nor did the owner know of it till after the policy was made and the ship had sailed:—Held, first, that these spars were within the meaning of the Customs Act, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107. s. 171. Secondly, that the fifth plea was good, but not proved. Thirdly, that no authority from the owner to the master could be implied to do that which was unlawful, though the act might be otherwise within the ordinary scope of the master's authority, and though it might be done for the benefit of the owner; that the master, therefore, in stowing the cargo on deck, contrary to the statute, could not be taken to be acting by the authority of the owner, nor was the owner bound by the knowledge of the master; and that consequently, on the authority of Cunard v. Hyde (1), the fourth plea was bad, and the plaintiff entitled to recover on the policy.

Declaration—That the plaintiff by a certain policy of insurance caused himself to be insured, lost or not lost, at and from Restigouch to Liverpool, upon any kind of goods, &c., in the ship called the Jane... the said ship, &c., goods and merchandises, &c., for so much as concerned the assured by agreement between the assured and assurers on the said policy were and should be valued at 1,400*l.* on freight, and valued thereat. And it was declared that the said insurance was against perils of the seas, and all other perils, losses and misfortunes that had or should come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the said goods and merchandises and ship, or any part thereof, and which are usually covered by marine insurance, and the defendant for a certain premium paid to him by the plaintiff subscribed the said policy for 80*l.*, and became an insurer thereon to the plaintiff for that amount on the said freight valued as aforesaid. And the plaintiff says, that certain goods of great value were shipped on board the said vessel, to wit, at Restigouch aforesaid, to be carried as cargo on the voyage in the policy described for certain freight therefore payable to the plaintiff, and afterwards the said ship with the cargo on board thereof sailed on the said voyage, and during the continuance of the said risk the said ship, cargo and freight were by the perils of the seas, and by perils insured against, wholly lost; and the plaintiff was then and thence, and always, and until and at the time of the loss interested in the said freight to the amount of all the monies insured by him thereon. And the plaintiff says that all conditions were fulfilled, and all things happened, and all times elapsed necessary to entitle the plaintiff to be paid the said 80*l.* by the defendant, yet the defendant has not paid the same, or any part thereof.

Pleas—And for a fourth plea the defendant says, that the said policy of insurance was made, and the cargo, the freight in respect of which was insured as in the declaration alleged, was shipped on board the said ship after the passing and coming into operation of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107, intituled 'An act to amend and consolidate the laws relating to the Customs of the United Kingdom,' &c., and that the aforesaid cargo consisted of timber and wood goods, and that Restigouch in the said policy mentioned was and is a British port in North America, and that the said ship with the said cargo cleared out and sailed from Restigouch aforesaid after the 1st of September 1861, and before the 1st of May 1862, to wit, on the 13th of November 1861, and that before and at the time of the said ship so sailing as hereinbefore mentioned the whole of the said cargo was not below deck, but, on the contrary thereof, the master of the said ship, before, and at and after the time of the said ship so sailing as aforesaid, placed and permitted and caused to be placed, and to remain and be upon and above the deck of the said ship part of the said cargo, contrary to the statute in that behalf made and provided; and that at the time of the said ship so sailing as aforesaid, the master of the said ship had not obtained from the clearing officer any certificate that the whole of the cargo of the said ship was below deck, contrary to the statute in that behalf made and provided, and that before and at the time of the said ship so sailing as aforesaid, and until and at the time of the alleged loss, the plaintiff was the owner of the said ship, and the said freight so insured as aforesaid was payable to him as such owner in respect of the said cargo.

And for a fifth plea the defendant repeats the several allegations contained in the fourth plea, and says that they are respectively true in substance and in fact; and the defendant further says, that at the time of the defendant's subscribing the said policy and becoming an insurer as alleged, it was known by the plaintiff that a considerable part of the said cargo was then loaded and that a considerable part of the said cargo was intended to be loaded upon and above the deck of the said ship, and that at the time of the defendant so subscribing the said policy and becoming an insurer as aforesaid, it was intended by the plaintiff that the said ship should sail on the voyage in the declaration mentioned after the 1st of September 1861, and before the said 1st of May 1862, with part of the said cargo stowed and loaded above and upon the deck of the said ship, and remaining so stowed as in the said fourth plea mentioned, and the plaintiff effected the said policy of insurance for the express purpose of insuring and covering the freight of the said cargo, including the portion thereof so stowed and loaded above and upon the deck of the said ship as aforesaid.

Demurrers and joinder in demurrer.

There were also traverses of the pleas on which issue was joined.

On the trial, before Shee, J., at Liverpool, it appeared that the vessel did, in fact, sail on the 13th of November 1861, with the whole of the cargo that was on freight properly stowed below deck; but that the master took on board a quantity of spars and other articles for his owner to be carried to Liverpool, which were placed on deck. This he did in the exercise of his general authority as master, without any instructions from the plaintiff, his owner, to do so; his object, it would appear, being to save expense to his owner in obtaining the materials necessary for refitting the vessel in Liverpool after the voyage.

The jury found that the vessel was not, in fact, rendered unseaworthy by this deck load; that the spars and other articles on deck were more than were required for the ship's use on the voyage; and that the plaintiff was not aware of the conduct of the master till after the policy was made and the ship had sailed.

The learned Judge ruled, on the construction of the proviso in the 171st section of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107, that the spars, &c., in excess of what were required for the voyage, were cargo within the meaning of the enactment; and he directed the verdict to be entered for the defendant on both pleas, giving the plaintiff leave to move to enter the verdict for him.

A rule having been obtained accordingly, the rule and the demurrers came on for argument together.

Mellish and Cohen (Nov. 8), for the defendant.—It cannot be denied that the fifth plea is good, but the defendant is also bound to admit that it was not proved, and that therefore the verdict upon that issue must be entered for the plaintiff. The question arises upon the 171st section of the Customs Consolidation Act, and it has been partially discussed in the case of Cunard v. Hyde (1), which has been twice before the Court; but neither of the decisions exactly touches the present question, which is, whether the ship-owner is prevented from recovering, because the master has, without any authority from him, violated the enactments of the statute.

[CROMPTON, J. — The penalty is, by section 172, very plainly imposed upon the master, and not upon the owner.]

This must not be looked at as a simple question of illegality under the provisions of a Customs Act, but as a particular enactment, for the express purpose of preventing the navigation of ships in such a dangerous condition, and further preserving life and property. It is like a provision that a ship must take a pilot on board on entering a particular port, when the failure to do so would prevent the owner from recovering against the underwriter—see Law v. Hollingsworth (2). If the voyage is illegal, the policy is void. The necessity of obtaining a certificate is simply a kind of machinery for carrying out the intention of the legislature. The underwriter makes his policy, and takes his premium upon the understanding that the ship will not carry any deck cargo; the statute positively forbids its being done; and the penalty is imposed upon the master to insure the prohibition being effectual. Even if the section imposing the penalty was left out of the act, the prohibition would equally apply. There is an implied warranty that there shall be no deck cargo; and Lord Campbell, C.J. said, in the second case of Cunard v. Hyde (3), "The absolute prohibition in the statute upon the ship sailing makes the voyage illegal, irrespective of any penalty." In every case of an illegal voyage, it has been held that the owner cannot recover, and without raising any question whether the illegality is the act of the master or not—Bird v. Appleton (4). Farmer v. Legg (5) is an authority to shew that the certificate of the clearing officer could not be dispensed with. See also Bell v. Carstairs (6). Lastly, the direction of the learned Judge was clearly right, that the verdict should be entered for the defendant.

Brett and Milward, contra.—It may be admitted that the fifth plea is good, but the verdict on it must be entered for the plaintiff, as it was not proved. The plaintiff, however, is entitled to recover upon the policy. There is no hardship upon the underwriter; he is protected by the warranty of seaworthiness, and therefore he needed no protection from the legislature. The fourth plea discloses no defence to the action, the ship having been chartered to take a cargo below deck; and the jury having found that the plaintiff never authorized the captain to go beyond the charter, and that he did not know that there had been any infringement of the law till after the ship had sailed. The captain, either from miscalculation or by reason of want of judgment, takes more timber than he could stow below deck; but the jury have found that the ship did not thereby become unseaworthy, and, in point of fact, the risk of the underwriter was not altered or increased. It is quite consistent with the plea that the ship was seaworthy. If it be put that the loading on deck amounts to a statutable unseaworthiness, the objection is met by Cunard v. Hyde (1) when first before the Court. There the plea was stronger than it is here, inasmuch as it averred that the persons interested in the cargo knew that the ship sailed without a certificate; and Blackburn, J., who was counsel in the case, having argued that it was consistent with the plea that the plaintiff had protested against the ship sailing so loaded, Lord Campbell, C.J. assented, saying in his judgment (7), "It is quite clear that, without shewing privity in the illegality or knowledge of it at the time of insuring on the part of the persons interested as insured, the defence must fail; and I should say the same if the statute contained a positive prohibition only on the voyage, and no penalty were imposed upon the master in particular." In order to prevent the plaintiff from recovering, it must be made out that the illegal act of the master amounted to illegality in the owner. In 1 Phil. on Insurance, p. 133, the doctrine is laid down as follows: "It is a general principle of law that if a contract be intended to indemnify the owner from loss on property by reason of its being implicated in an illegal trade, or applied to an illegal use, or which, according to the laws of the country where the contract is made, it is criminal for the owner to hold, such contract is void; and, accordingly, the owner has no legally insurable interest." But it would not be so, if the owner is no party to the act of the master. In order to avoid the policy, it ought to be shewn that the purpose of the voyage was illegal—see Metcalf v. Parry (8), Havelock v. Hancill (9) and Carruthers v. Gray (10).

It does not follow, because an illegal act is done in the course of a voyage, that the voyage became illegal, as appears from Phillips on Insurance, p. 136, where it is said, "So, when the master in the course of a voyage took on board a smuggled chain-cable, though he had intended to do so at the time of sailing, Mr. Justice Story said it was a collateral act, no more touching the legality of the voyage than if they had been taking on board some illegal ship stores, and accordingly held that the policy on the ship was not thereby defeated."

[COCKBURN, C.J.—We are bound by the decision in Cunard v. Hyde (1) to hold that the voyage was illegal, and any one who acts in the voyage with knowledge of such illegality is implicated in it.]

It may be an illegal act of the master, if he does it alone, or of the owner also, if done by his permission, but there is no illegality in the owner if he knows nothing about it. Lastly, as to the way the verdict ought to be entered; the findings of the jury are entirely in favour of the plaintiff, except that the spars were on deck and that there were more than were wanted for the voyage. The fourth plea alleged, that the part of the cargo on deck was part of that which was carried as freight, and the jury have found that was not so.

[Per Curiam.—The plea means that there was cargo carried on deck; and if necessary, the plea might be amended, under section 222. of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852.]

If there be immaterial allegations in a plea, they need not all be found; but if they cannot be separated, they must all be found: and here so much of the plea has not been found.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court (11) was now delivered by—

COCKBURN, C.J.—This was an action on a valued policy on freight from Restigouch to Liverpool, for a total loss by perils of the sea. The fourth plea is to the effect that the ship cleared out and sailed from Restigouch, a British port in North America, after the 1st of September 1861 and before the 1st of May 1862; that her cargo consisted of timber and wood goods, and that the whole of the cargo was not below deck, but on the contrary; and that the master, contrary to the statute (16 & 17 Vict. c. 107. ss. 170, 171. and 172), placed and kept a portion of the cargo on deck, and sailed without the certificate required by the statute, and that the plaintiff was the owner of the vessel. The fifth plea adds the additional averment that the plaintiff intended the vessel should sail so loaded, and made the policy for the express purpose of protecting the adventure so prohibited by the statute in question. Both these pleas were traversed and also demurred to.—[His Lordship then stated the facts which appeared at the trial; the ruling of the learned Judge, and the leave reserved, precisely as they have been already set out, and then continued as follows:—] A rule was accordingly obtained which came on for argument along with the demurrer. On the argument it was not disputed that the fifth plea was good, and that the judgment on the demurrer to that plea must be for the defendant; but it was also not disputed that this plea was not proved, and that the verdict on it must be entered for the plaintiff. We expressed our opinion during the argument, that our Brother Shee's ruling that the spars in question were cargo was correct, and that consequently the fourth plea was proved in substance. It was objected that the plea was so framed as to aver that the portion of cargo loaded on deck was part of that which was carried on freight, but we expressed our opinion that this was an immaterial variance, the substance of the plea being that cargo was illegally carried on deck; and that if necessary an amendment in the plea might be made accordingly. The verdict, therefore, on the fourth plea must stand for the defendant; but the real question between the parties is, whether the fourth plea is good in substance, and on this point we took time to consider. The result of our deliberation is, that in our opinion the plea is bad.

While the cases of Cunard v. Hyde (1) establish, that where the provisions of the sections in question of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107, in respect of the stowage of timber on deck are violated, the voyage is illegal, and a policy of insurance on such a voyage will not attach, they equally decide that knowledge on the part of the assured of the timber being so stowed is necessary to avoid the policy, and that in the absence of such knowledge the assured may recover. In the present case the assured did not in fact know of timber being stowed on the deck, or of any intention on the part of the master so to stow it. But, the insurance being on freight, it is said that as the stowing of the cargo is immediately within the province and duty of the master, the assured, the shipowner, must be considered as bound by the act of the master as his agent, and that the knowledge of the latter must, in law, be taken to be that of the owner. Admitting, of course, the general rule that a principal is bound by the acts and knowledge of his agent, while acting within the scope of his authority, we are of opinion that that rule has no application in the present case. For, although it is true that the stowing of the cargo is undoubtedly within the authority of the master, yet, in the absence of proof to the contrary, it must be taken that his authority, in this as in other respects, is by his instructions limited to that which is lawful. "The trust reposed in a captain of a vessel," says Lord Ellenborough in Earle v. Rowcroft (12), "obliges him to obey the written instructions of his owners where they give any; and where his instructions are silent he is at all events to do nothing but what is consonant to the laws of the land, whether with or without a view to their advantage; because, in the absence of express orders to the contrary, obedience to the law is implied in their instructions. Therefore, the master of a vessel, who does an act in contravention of the laws of his country, is guilty of a breach of the implied orders of his owners." Applying this principle to the present case, it follows, that no authority can be implied in the master, in the discharge of his duty, to do that which, with reference to this part of his duty, was a violation of the law. Again, it is a well-established distinction that, while a man is civilly responsible for the acts of his agent, when acting within the established limits of his authority, he will not be criminally responsible for such acts, unless express authority be shewn, or the authority is necessarily to be implied from the nature of the employment; as in the case of a bookseller held liable for the sale, by his shopman, of a libellous publication (13). Under ordinary circumstances, the authority of the agent is limited to that which is lawful. If, in seeking to carry out the purpose of his employment, he oversteps the law, he outruns his authority, and his principal will not be bound by what he does. Now in the present case, as has been already pointed out, not only are there no circumstances from which an authority to contravene the statute can properly be implied, but according to the authority of Earle v. Rowcroft (12), the reverse is to be presumed. It appears to us therefore impossible to say that the master, in stowing the cargo on deck, contrary to the act of parliament, was acting by the authority of his owner; or that the latter was bound by his knowledge. This view of the law, as here applicable, becomes materially confirmed, if the case be looked at in another point of view. It seems clear, on the authority of Earle v. Rowcroft (12) that if the master of a vessel, acting within what otherwise would be the extent of his authority, contravenes some positive law, and thereby causes injury to his owners, this will be barratry in the master, notwithstanding that the purpose of the thing done was to benefit the owners. In the case referred to, the master, having instructions to make the best purchases with despatch, had gone into an enemy's port to complete his cargo, which could be most speedily and cheaply obtained there, in consequence of which the ship was seized and confiscated. This proceeding on the part of the master, though within the general scope of his authority, and though done in the interest of his owners, was held to be barratrous; and the owner, on a policy in which barratry of the master was insured against, was held entitled to recover. Within the principle of this decision, the soundness of which never has been questioned, the conduct of the master in the present case would have amounted to barratry, as being an unlawful act done in contravention of his duty, though with the intention of benefiting his owners. Had the statute attached the forfeiture of the vessel as the penalty of the offence, and the vessel had been confiscated, the owner would have recovered on an insurance against loss by barratry. But, to constitute barratry, there must necessarily be an absence of consent and knowledge on the part of the owner. Where an act, which would otherwise be barratrous, is done with the assent and knowledge of the owner, it ceases to be barratrous. If, therefore, the knowledge of the master could be taken to be the knowledge of the owner, an illegal and otherwise barratrous act, done by the master, would not in case of loss occasioned thereby give the owner a right to recover. But Earle v. Rowcroft (12) directly establishes that on loss occasioned by the illegal act of the master, without the authority of the owner, the latter may recover; and therefore shews that, where the master does an illegal act, which, but for its illegality, would be within the scope of his ordinary authority, but which, being illegal, is barratrous, this will not amount in point of law, to assent or knowledge on the part of his employer. For these reasons, it appears to us, that the plaintiff in this action cannot be taken to have constructively, any more than he had actually, knowledge of the illegal act of the master, and that, consequently, within the decision in Cunard v. Hyde (1), he is entitled to recover; and that our judgment, therefore, should be in his favour. I should add, that this judgment should be taken as that of my Brothers Blackburn and Mellor and myself. My Brother Crompton, having been obliged to leave the Court before the argument was concluded, takes no part in the judgment.

Bankrupt — Fraudulent Preference — Direction to Jury.

Prima facie a trader who, on the eve of bankruptcy, hands over to a creditor assets which ought to be rateably distributed among all his creditors, must be taken to have acted in fraud of the law. But if circumstances exist which tend to explain and give a different character to the transaction, and to shew that the debtor acted from a different motive, these circumstances ought to be left to the jury; and the proper direction in such a case is that, unless the jury come to the conclusion that the debtor had the intention of defeating the law, and preventing the due distribution of his assets, by preferring one creditor at the expense of the rest, the transaction stands good in law. The whole question turns upon the intention of the trader in disposing of his goods to the particular creditor.

Plea, never indebted.

Issue joined.

Upon the trial, which took place before Blackburn, J., at the last Summer Assizes for Lincolnshire, it appeared that the action was brought by the assignees of William Smith, a bankrupt, against his brother, to recover back a sum of money paid to him by the bankrupt, as it was alleged, by way of fraudulent preference. Evidence was given that William Smith became a bankrupt on the 24th of September 1862. Before his bankruptcy, and at the end of April 1862, he had applied to the defendant for a loan of money. The defendant told him that he had not the money, but that he thought he could get it from his bankers, upon pledging himself to pay it on a particular day. It was arranged between them that William Smith should repay the money on the 1st of July, and the defendant procured it from his bankers on the express contract that he would repay it on that day. On the 1st of July, William Smith of his own accord paid to the defendant the sum of money advanced, with the bankers' charges and commission. From the time of applying for the money in the month of April, William Smith was in embarrassed circumstances, and was hopelessly insolvent on the 1st of July. The defendant knew nothing of this, and acted in a bona fide manner throughout the transaction.

The learned Judge directed the jury that if the bankrupt, though he was aware that bankruptcy was unavoidable, and though no application had been made for payment, paid this debt simply in discharge of the obligation he had entered into to pay on a given day, without any view of giving preference to this particular creditor at the expense of the other creditors, the payment would not be a fraudulent preference within the meaning of the bankrupt law. The jury found for the defendant.

A rule was subsequently obtained, calling upon the defendant to shew cause why the verdict should not be set aside, and a new trial had between the parties on the ground of misdirection.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court (15) was now delivered by COCKBURN, C.J.—This was an action by the assignees of William Smith, a bankrupt, to recover back a sum of money paid to the defendant, as it was alleged, by way of fraudulent preference. On the trial, evidence was given that W. Smith became a bankrupt on the 24th of September 1862. Before his bankruptcy, and at the end of April 1862, he had applied to the defendant, Charles Smith, who was his brother, for a loan of money. C. Smith, according to the evidence, which the jury must be taken to have believed, told him that he had not the money, but that he thought that he could procure it from his bankers on pledging himself to repay it on a particular day, and he asked his brother William when he would be able to repay the money, and was told, on the 1st of July then next. The defendant then went to his bankers and obtained from them an advance of the sum required, on the deposit of some title-deeds, on the express contract that he, the defendant, would repay the money on the 1st of July. He returned to W. Smith and informed him of the terms on which he had obtained the money, and the money was lent by the defendant to W. Smith on the 29th of April, on the security of a promissory note payable on demand. A few days before the 1st of July the brothers again met, when W. Smith, without any fresh application, told the defendant that he should be prepared to pay him on the 1st of July, and requested to know the amount of the bankers' commission and other charges, that he might pay the whole sum at once. He was told what they were, and on the 1st of July, without any further application, he brought the money to the defendant, and paid him. W. Smith was in good general credit till some time after this payment; but the fact was, that he was, during the whole period of this transaction, and had long been, in very embarrassed circumstances; and the money he thus obtained was wanted to pay off a creditor then pressing him for payment. But the defendant was not at all aware of these facts, and it was admitted at the trial, that the whole transaction was perfectly bona fide on his part. The evidence shewed that the affairs of W. Smith continued to get worse, and that on the 1st of July they had become hopeless. On the 22nd of August he issued a circular to his creditors, and on the 24th of September he became a bankrupt.

It was left to the jury as a question of fact, whether at the time of the payment to the defendant C. Smith, bankruptcy was contemplated by W. Smith; and they were told, that if the payment was in contemplation of bankruptcy, and voluntary, they ought to infer that it was intended to prevent the equal distribution of the property amongst the general creditors; in which case it would be void as against the assignees. So far, no complaint is made of the direction; but my Brother Blackburn, who tried the cause, further told the jury, that if the bankrupt, though he was aware that bankruptcy was unavoidable, and though no application had been made for payment, paid this debt simply in discharge of the obligation he had entered into to pay on a given day, without any view of giving a preference to this particular creditor at the expense of the rest, the payment would not be a fraudulent preference within the meaning of the bankrupt law. The jury having found for the defendant, we must take it as a fact, that the payment was made by the bankrupt bonâ fide, and without any intention of giving an undue preference to the defendant. And the question is, whether the direction of the learned Judge to the jury was wrong, in telling them that a payment made under such circumstances was good, as against the assignees, on bankruptcy supervening.

On the part of the plaintiffs, it was contended that the payment, having been made without any application from the defendant, must be taken to have been purely voluntary on the bankrupt's part; and it was urged, that as the effect of such a payment would necessarily be to prevent the rateable distribution of his effects among his creditors, and so to defeat the bankrupt law, and as a man must be taken to intend that which is the necessary consequence of his acts, a payment made spontaneously by a debtor on the eve of bankruptcy must necessarily be a fraudulent preference. The cases were also relied upon, in which the question had been discussed whether the payment had been made voluntarily or on the demand of the creditor; and the language of the Judges, in pointing out this distinction as the criterion of the validity of the payment was also adverted to, as shewing that the absence of any demand by the creditor must be considered as conclusive of the payment being a fraudulent preference. In effect, the argument for the plaintiff came to this, —that no payment made by a debtor, on the eve of bankruptcy, out of a fund which would otherwise be distributable among his creditors, without a demand from a particular creditor, would be other than a fraudulent preference. We are unable to assent to this proposition. There is no doubt that, in the great majority of cases, the question of fraudulent preference would be determined by the fact of the payment having been made spontaneously by the debtor, without pressure on the part of the creditor. Unexplained, a payment so made would carry with it the presumption, that the intention of the debtor was to act in fraud of the bankrupt law. Hence the importance of requiring proof of pressure on the part of the creditor, in order to rebut the inference which would otherwise arise from the apparent spontaneousness of the act; and hence the language of the Judges, in the cases referred to, in distinguishing between a voluntary payment and one made on the pressure of the creditor. But it by no means follows because, in the majority of cases, the absence of pressure by the creditor may properly lead to the inference that the debtor intended to act in fraud of the law, that that circumstance must necessarily be conclusive in a case where other circumstances are found sufficient to rebut the presumption of fraudulent intention; for it must be borne in mind that the true question in all these cases is, whether the intention with which the payment was made was to defeat the operation of the bankrupt law. It is this intention to act in fraud of the law which stamps the preference of the particular creditor, however morally honest, with the character of fraud.

It may not be unimportant to observe how the law as to fraudulent preference has arisen. The statutes relating to bankruptcy contained no provision invalidating payments made prior to the act of bankruptcy; but the Courts, from the time of Lord Mansfield, held, that if a trader, in contemplation of bankruptcy, with a view to evade the bankrupt law, preferred a particular creditor to the detriment of the rest, such a preference was a fraud upon the law and the transaction could not stand. Lord Ellenborough, in Crosby v. Crouch (8), says, "this was an excrescence on the bankrupt laws," and that in his opinion the cases had gone far enough, and ought not to be further extended. Be this as it may, the intention of the party, making the payment, to defeat the law was always considered as the cardinal point on which the whole question turned. "Where an act is done which is right to be done," says Lord Mansfield, in Harman v. Fishar (1), (by which of course he means "right" irrespectively of the bankrupt law), "and the single motive is not to give an unjust preference, the creditor will have a preference." "A bankrupt," says Heath, J., in Hartshorn v. Slodden (12), "has the disposition of his property till the moment when he commits an act of bankruptcy; and unless he dispose of it in fraudem legis, his transfer will be good. Fraud, indeed, changes the complexion of things both in civil and criminal cases." It is with reference to the intention and motives of the party making the payment, that the fact of threats or importunity on the part of the creditor becomes in the majority of cases a matter of so much importance. Not, indeed, that the hostile attitude of the creditor will of itself legalize the payment, if the debtor was uninfluenced thereby, and the payment made voluntarily by the debtor and with a view to prejudice his other creditors—Cook v. Rogers (4). The pressure of the creditor becomes material, because, as is said by Lord Ellenborough, in Crosby v. Crouch (8), "his demand repels the presumption that the bankrupt, on the eve of bankruptcy, made a distinction among his creditors and spontaneously favoured one of them to the prejudice of the rest." The pressure of the particular creditor does not make the payment any the less contrary to the policy of the bankrupt law, which seeks to insure the rateable distribution of the insolvent trader's assets, but which distribution is defeated by the payment to the single creditor whether importunate or not. Neither can it be said that the pressure operates to compel payment by the debtor; for the latter, if he knows that bankruptcy is inevitable, must also know that it will protect his property and his person against the individual creditor. The effect of pressure, therefore, in legalizing the payment is only that it rebuts the presumption of an intention on the part of the debtor to act in fraud of the law, from which fraudulent intention alone arises the invalidity of the transaction. But if the fact of pressure by the creditor only operates in the way pointed out, why may not any other circumstance, which in like manner would serve to repel the presumption of fraudulent intention, be available for this purpose? The question, whether an intention to defeat the law and to prevent the due distribution of his assets existed in the mind of the trader in handing over the portion of them in question to the creditor, is one of fact for the jury. If the act was spontaneous on the part of the debtor, and there are no circumstances to rebut the presumption which arises from the act having been done purely voluntarily on his part, the jury should be told to infer that the preference was fraudulent and wrongful. But if there are circumstances by which the presumption may be rebutted, these circumstances, whatever they may be, are for the consideration of the jury, and cannot properly be withdrawn from them; and a direction to the jury that, although the transaction was apparently voluntary on the part of the debtor, if the effect of the evidence on their minds is to satisfy them that the desire to give a fraudulent preference was not the motive operating on the debtor in handing over his assets to the particular creditor, they ought to uphold the transaction, is in our opinion perfectly correct.

In the present case we must take it, on the finding of the jury, that the motive, operating on the mind of the debtor, was his sense of the obligation arising from the undertaking to return the money on the appointed day. We are not called upon to say whether we approve of the verdict of the jury, or whether it would not have been more satisfactory if the jury, looking to the desperate pecuniary position of the debtor, and the near relationship of the parties, and to the absence of any demand of payment, had come to a different conclusion as to the motive of the payment; we have only to deal with the direction of the learned Judge, that if the desire to fulfil an undertaking, believed to be peremptory, was the motive of the debtor, the payment would be legal and valid.

This case, no doubt, does not fall within the principle of Toovey v. Milne (16) and cases of that class, in which it having been agreed that a fund should be specifically appropriated to a particular purpose, as equity would enforce the specific application, the money would not pass to the assignees. In the present case the agreement was not to pay out of a particular fund, but to pay on a particular day, and the payment was made accordingly. But there is authority for holding that where money is paid under a special contract for repayment made when the money was lent, this will not amount to a fraudulent preference. In Hunt v. Mortimer (3), where a trader in insolvent circumstances, having an order from the East India Company which he had not funds to execute, borrowed money on an agreement that the lender should receive the money for the order and repay himself, and this was accordingly done, this Court upheld the transaction, as not amounting to a fraudulent preference. Parke, J., it is true, puts it upon the principle of the fund being bound in equity to the specific appropriation; but Lord Tenterden, Bayley, J. and Littledale, J. appear to have proceeded on the more general ground. Littledale, J. expressly says, "That a payment is not voluntary if it is the subject of a special contract made before the money was lent." In Vacher v. Cocks (2), in which case an army agent, on receiving credit from his bankers, the defendants, engaged to pay over to them, on receipt, sums which usually came to his hands half-yearly from government for the discharge of pensions, and paid them accordingly, Lord Tenterden, at Nisi Prius, directed the jury that if the payments were made in pursuance of an antecedent contract entered into on opening the new account, or with a view to enable the bankers to honour the bankrupt's drafts, that he might go on for a time, then to find for the defendants; whereupon the counsel for the plaintiffs elected to be nonsuited. A rule to set aside the nonsuit having been obtained, the Court held that, as the direction was admitted to be right on the second point, the nonsuit must stand; so that it became unnecessary to decide whether the direction on the first point was right. But Bayley, J. expresses his opinion, that the questions left to the jury were both proper. His language appears very much to the present purpose. He says, "The question of fraudulent preference depends on what passes in the mind of the party making the payments at the time they are made; if he acts in pursuance of a contract or engagement, or otherwise under such circumstances that he cannot have a choice, the payments are evidently not the result of preference." Littledale, J. appears to have concurred in this view, although Parke, J. expresses doubts as to the direction on the first point, and appears to have thought it incorrect. In another case of Abell v. Daniel (6), where a sum of money had been granted by a trader shortly before his bankruptcy, to his son, whom he was in the habit of maintaining, Lord Tenterden left it to the jury to say whether the money was given in the ordinary course of maintaining the son, or for the purposes of securing an advantage to the latter over the creditors, and with a view to benefit him at their expense. This, it is true, amounts to no more than a ruling at Nisi Prius, but the ruling does not appear to have been questioned.

In our opinion, founded both on the reason of the thing and on the result of the authorities, the whole question turns on the intention of the trader in disposing of his effects to the particular creditor. Prima facie, a trader who, on the eve of bankruptcy, hands over to a creditor assets which ought to be rateably distributed among all his creditors, must be taken to have acted in fraud of the law; but if circumstances exist which tend to explain and give a different character to the transaction, and to shew that the debtor acted from a different motive, these circumstances must be left to the jury, who should be told that, unless they come to the conclusion that the debtor had the intention of defeating the law, and preventing the due distribution of his assets, by preferring one creditor at the expense of the rest, the transaction will stand good in law. This, it appears to us, was in substance and effect the direction of my Brother Blackburn to the jury. We, therefore, hold that the direction was right, and, consequently, that this rule must be discharged.

Rule discharged.

Arbitration—Award—Enlargement of Time—Rule of Court—Affidavit.

Where matters in difference had been referred to an arbitrator by Judge's order, and the arbitrator, after twice enlarging the time, had made his award, the order of reference may be made a rule of Court without an affidavit verifying the dates of such enlargement.

This was a rule calling upon the defendant to shew cause why a rule obtained to make an order of reference a rule of Court, should not be discharged on the ground that the affidavit did not verify the dates at which the enlargements of time for making the award had been made.

This case had been before the Court in Michaelmas Term, 1864 (1), and now the following additional facts were disclosed. The order of reference shewed that two enlargements of time had been made. The plaintiff had wished to have the award set aside, and had endeavoured to obtain from the arbitrator an affidavit that the time had not been duly and properly enlarged by him as it appeared to be from the award itself. The arbitrator refused to make the affidavit, and the plaintiff then filed a bill in Chancery in relation to the same matters as those which were decided on the reference. The defendant, wishing to set up the award as an answer to the bill, obtained a rule to have the order of reference made a rule of Court upon an affidavit verifying the handwriting of the arbitrator. The present rule was then obtained on an affidavit that the time had not been duly enlarged. The arbitrator, having been examined in obedience to the order of this Court (1), swore that the time had been twice duly and properly enlarged, as appeared on the face of the award.

Mellish and Robins shewed cause.—This rule must be discharged, the affidavit having been sufficient according to the practice of this Court. The arbitrator has now been examined, and the Court will assume that he has spoken the truth, and that the time has been duly enlarged.

They referred to Dickins v. Jarvis (2) and to In re Smith v. Reeves (3).

[COCKBURN, C.J. (after consulting with the Masters.)—According to the practice of this Court and of the Court of Exchequer, established since the passing of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, it is sufficient if the affidavits are in the form used in this case. That being so, if a party endeavours to prevent the order of reference being made a rule of Court, and it turns out, as it does here, that the enlargements of time have been properly made, it would seem that he ought to pay the costs.]

Bovill and Shaw, in support of the rule.

—It was supposed that the affidavit used was not sufficient, and when it was found that the arbitrator refused to make an affidavit, the plaintiff was justified in inferring that there was something wrong. The only provision in the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, which can be said to apply to the matter, is that in the 26th section, namely, that it shall not be necessary to call the attesting witness, if there be one; and there is no reason why the old practice of verifying each enlargement should not be followed—see Davis v. Vass (4) and Moule v. Stawell (5). The practice is laid down in 2 Chitt. Archbold's Practice, p. 1631, as follows: "Also, when it is necessary to make any enlargements of the time for making of the award a part of the rule of Court, there should be an affidavit that the enlargements have been duly made. If a cause has been referred by a Judge's order, or an order of Nisi Prius, no affidavit is necessary; unless indeed it is necessary to make any enlargement of the time for making the award a part of the rule of Court, in which case there must be an affidavit of the enlargement."

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule must be discharged. It appears to be the existing practice of this Court that it is not requisite that there should be an affidavit by an attesting witness that the enlargements have been duly made, and that the order of reference may be made a rule of Court upon an affidavit verifying the handwriting of the arbitrator. We cannot therefore expect that any further affidavit should have been made. It appears that the plaintiff applied to the arbitrator to make the affidavit, and he refused to do so. It might be expedient that an affidavit by the attesting witness, if there be one, or by the arbitrator if there be not, should be required in order to remove all doubt, but that is not the practice, and we need not now consider the expediency of it. The conduct of the arbitrator was such as was fairly calculated to engender suspicion, and that being so, the rule will be discharged, but without costs.

CROMPTON, J.—The practice in two, if not in all three of the superior Courts, is not to require affidavits of the kind here insisted on, and I am not willing to upset such practice. On a trial at Nisi Prius it would be supposed that the enlargement had been made at the time it appeared to have been made. The conduct of the arbitrator justified some suspicion, and I therefore agree that there should be no costs.

BLACKBURN, J.—The practice has existed for ten or twelve years, and no inconvenience has been found to result from it. Here the party might not unreasonably doubt whether the enlargement had been properly made or not.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Rule discharged, without costs.

The plaintiff was the owner of land through which the P. river flowed, such land being beyond the district of the board of works for L. The board executed drainage works within their district, by means of which the sewage was carried into a stream which flowed into the P. river. The sewage had for many years been carried into the stream, but only so as to pollute the water in an inappreciable degree. The result of the new works of the board was to do substantial injury to the plaintiff:—Held, by the Court of Queen's Bench, that under the 86th section of the "Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855," the plaintiff had a right to obtain compensation for the damage done in the manner provided by the act, and therefore that the board were not liable in an action.

But held, by the majority of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, reversing the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, that the local board were not authorized by any provision of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, to carry the sewage of the district by means of a new system of sewers into the plaintiff's stream, and that the plaintiff was entitled to maintain an action against them for the nuisance.

and County Bridge Stream respectively, did flow and ought of right to flow, without being fouled and polluted as hereinafter mentioned, near to and through the said land, and the plaintiff and his tenants were entitled to the use and benefit of the water of the said stream or watercourse, and to have the said stream or watercourse flow and run without being so fouled and polluted, and the defendants well knowing the premises wrongfully caused and permitted large quantities of soil, filth and water to flow permanently into the said stream and watercourse, whereby the same became and were permanently fouled and polluted, and the water thereof became and was and always will be impure and unfit for domestic or other necessary purposes, and of noxious appearance, &c., and the said lands became unhealthy and much lessened in value, and the plaintiff was greatly injured, &c.

Pleas, first, not guilty; secondly, not possessed; thirdly, a traverse of the plaintiff's right to have the water flow through the land without being polluted; fourthly, that the several acts, matters and things whereof the plaintiff complains were lawfully done and caused and permitted to be done by the defendants under or in pursuance and in exercise and by virtue of the powers contained in and given to the defendants, by an act of parliament made in the session of parliament holden in the 18th and 19th years of the reign of Queen Victoria, for the better local management of the metropolis.

The plaintiff now assigned as to the last plea, that he sued not only for the grievance therein admitted and therein attempted to be justified, but also for grievances committed by the defendants in excess of the alleged rights and powers in that plea mentioned, and on other occasions and for other purposes than those referred to in the same plea.

Issues were joined and taken.

At the trial, which took place at the Summer Assizes, 1862, for the county of Kent, it was agreed that a verdict should be entered for the plaintiff, subject to a special case to be stated for the opinion of this Court.

The following CASE was accordingly stated.—

The plaintiff is owner of the reversion of certain lands through which flow a stream called the Poole River, and of a watercourse which is known by the name of the County Bridge Stream. The defendants are the board of works for the Lewisham district, constituted on the 1st of January 1856 under the "Metropolis Management Act, 1855" (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120). The Poole River is a natural stream of considerable width and depth. The County Bridge Stream flows in a deep dyke or ditch, and except in wet weather is narrow and shallow. The plaintiff's lands are not within the defendants' district nor within the area to which the "Metropolis Management Act" applies. The injury of which the plaintiff complains is the pollution of the County Bridge Stream and the Poole River, by the discharge through sewers constructed by the defendants of large quantities of filth into the said watercourse called the County Bridge Stream, which joins the Poole River at a point about 400 yards from the outfall of the sewers. It is admitted that the flow of filth into the plaintiff's watercourse and stream is such an injury to the reversion as would entitle him to maintain this action if the remedy by action be not taken away by the Metropolis Management Act, 1855. Prior to the year 1852, but few houses had been built in the district over which the jurisdiction of the defendants as a board of works now extends. The sewage from some of these houses escaped either by open drains cut for the purpose, or by percolation through the soil into open watercourses. These watercourses had a common outfall through a culvert, which has existed for more than twenty years, into the County Bridge Stream; and a small quantity of the sewage which escaped into the watercourses was carried into the County Bridge Stream, and thence into the Poole River, but without fouling either to any appreciable extent.

In the year 1852 the erection of the Crystal Palace at Sydenham was commenced, and in that and the following years a great number of new houses were built within the defendants' district. A great portion of the sewage from the Crystal Palace and from the new houses was carried off in the same manner as the drainage of the houses previously built, videlicet, through the open watercourses, and thence through the culvert before mentioned into the County Bridge Stream; the flow of sewage into the County Bridge Stream was in consequence increased, and the effect was to pollute the latter, and also the Poole River, to an appreciable, but not to a serious extent. The open watercourses continued to be used for the drainage of a large number of buildings within the defendants' district down to the year 1859. About that time the condition of the watercourses had become a serious nuisance to the inhabitants of the district. Large quantities of filth accumulated in them, the effluvia from which were of the worst description, and in many places the adjacent soil was overflown and saturated with offensive matter. In order to put an end to the further use of the open watercourses for purposes of drainage, and to provide efficient means for the drainage of the whole district, the defendants, in the years 1859 and 1860, caused a number of underground sewers to be constructed, the operation of which, as regards the plaintiff's stream and watercourse, is the subject of complaint in this action.

In many instances the defendants' sewers run in the same direction, and follow nearly the same course as the old watercourses. The outfall of both is the same, videlicet, through the before-mentioned culvert into the County Bridge Stream. The mouth of the culvert is within the area of the defendants' jurisdiction, but is very close to the boundary. In addition to the sewers constructed by the defendants, the defendants further adopted into their plan of drainage, and took under their control certain underground sewers, which had been constructed for the drainage of houses built by the Anerley Building Society on an estate within the defendants' district, called the Anerley Building Estate. They had been originally constructed in the year 1856, with an outfall into one of the open watercourses before mentioned. In the year 1859 the defendants provided a new outfall for them into a sewer, which the defendants had substituted for the watercourse. The new system of sewers adopted by the defendants has prevented the accumulation and flow of filth in the open watercourses, and has effectually provided for the drainage of the defendants' district; but the quantity of filth carried into the County Bridge Stream, and thence into the Poole River, was, when this action was brought, and still is, vastly in excess of what had reached it before the sewers were constructed. The effect of the increased discharge from the sewers into the County Bridge Stream and the Poole River as aforesaid is to render them foul, stinking and wholly unfit for cattle or ordinary domestic purposes.

The defendants contend that the plaintiff's remedy for the injury done to his said stream and watercourse is not by action, but by proceedings to obtain compensation, in the manner provided by the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120. In support of their contention, the defendants rely on sections 68, 69, 86, 225. and 226. of the act.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether, under the circumstances of this case, the plaintiff could maintain this action against the defendants.

If the Court should be of opinion in the affirmative, then the verdict was to stand, and judgment to be entered for him for 40s., with costs of suit. If the Court should be of opinion in the negative, then the verdict was to stand for the plaintiff, except as to the issue joined on the last plea, and upon that issue the verdict was to be entered for the defendants, with judgment for the defendants accordingly.

Bovill (Lush and Murphy with him), for the plaintiff (June 5, 1863), contended that the statute referred to in the plea gave the defendants no power to cause the injury which the plaintiff complained of. He referred to 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120. ss. 2, 32, 38, 42, 68, 69, 86, 135, 138; 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102. s. 58.

Mellish (Raymond with him), for the defendants, contended that the plaintiff was not entitled to maintain the action, and that he was enabled to obtain compensation under section 86. of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120. He referred to sections 68, 69. and 86. of that statute; to the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102. s. 58; to Stainton v. the Metropolitan Board of Works and the Lewisham District Board of Works (1);

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court was delivered on the 4th of January by—

BLACKBURN, J.—In this case, which was heard before my Lord, the late Mr. Justice Wightman, and myself, and in which no decision had been come to prior to the death of our late lamented colleague, I have now to deliver the judgment of the remaining members of the Court; and we have come to the conclusion, though not without some hesitation, that our judgment should be for the defendants. The point may be very shortly stated. The drainage of the district of Lewisham has for many years been carried into a stream called the County Bridge Stream, which stream flows into a river called the Poole River, both of which in their progress onward flow through land belonging to the plaintiff, beyond the limits of the Lewisham district. The population and the number of houses in a part of the Lewisham district, having of late years greatly increased, and the want of additional drainage having occasioned an accumulation of offensive matter causing serious inconvenience, the defendants, the board of health for the district, executed the drainage works stated in the case, availing themselves, as heretofore, of the County Bridge Stream to carry off the sewage matter. The effect of the additional and more effective drainage, has been to cause a quantity of offensive matter to pass down into the County Bridge Stream and Poole River, sufficient to pollute the water which before was affected by the drainage only in an inappreciable degree, to such an extent as to cause substantial injury to the plaintiff. It is not disputed that for such injury the plaintiff is entitled to compensation; but the question is, whether his remedy is by action, or by proceeding to obtain compensation under the 86th section of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120.

The drainage works executed by the defendants were, beyond all question, such as they were authorized, and indeed required, to make, and it cannot, we think, be disputed that had the damage to the plaintiff occurred within the district, the only redress to which he would have been entitled would have been compensation under the 86th section of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120. For it is plain that that section contemplates and provides for the possibility of damage being done to water rights by the execution of sewerage works, and would comprehend a case in which a stream was polluted by offensive matter being discharged into it. But it is contended, for the plaintiff, that the authority and powers of the board to carry out the drainage of the district is confined to the limits of the district, and that they are not authorized to do anything which shall cause an injury to those who are beyond the local boundary of their jurisdiction; and the 58th section of the subsequent act of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102. is referred to as shewing that such a board, in the absence of express statutory enactment, would have no authority beyond the limits of the district for which they are appointed. It is, however, to be observed, that the 58th section of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102. has reference to works to be executed beyond the limits of the district, not to an injury arising without the district for works executed within it. Here, all that has been actually done by the board has been done within their district. The injury of which the plaintiff has reason to complain, is only a consequence of what has been done within the district, and so far as the district itself is concerned rightfully done. Now, the words of the 86th section of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120. are sufficiently large to embrace an injury done by the pollution of a stream whether within the local limits of the district or without. And to hold that the present case does not fall within the provisions would be virtually to establish that no board of health or vestry could ever avail themselves, for the purpose of drainage, of a stream flowing beyond the local limits, if any damage should occur to proprietors or occupiers further down the stream. For if the work causing such injury beyond the boundary, ceases, because of such injury, to be within the powers of the local authority, and therefore is actionable, the injury being a continuing one, fresh actions might from time to time be brought, and the works causing the damage would have to be undone. We cannot think that the legislature intended to place this restraint on the powers conferred by the act, and we think, therefore, that it will be safer and better so to construe the act as to make the powers of the local authority and the provision for compensation embrace such a case as the present. It follows that the proceeding by action was not open to the plaintiff, and, consequently, that our judgment must be for the defendants.

Error was brought on this judgment, and the case was argued, in the Exchequer Chamber, November 26, 1864.

Lush (Bovill and Murphy with him), for the plaintiff.—First, the defendants had no right, under the statute 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, even if the damage had been done within the district, to convert this stream of the plaintiff into a sewer. The Metropolitan Local Management Act vests all the trunk sewers in the Metropolitan Board of Works, and the branch sewers in the vestry or local board of the district. The Metropolitan Board of Works have power, with consent of the Secretary of State, to purchase any land compulsorily for the purpose of the main sewers; but the local board have no compulsory powers to take lands: but express power is given to them to purchase any land or any river by consent. That leads to the inference that without such consent the local board have no right to take a river, or to cast the sewage into such river, any more than to cast the sewage on to any man's land against his will. They are expressly forbidden to create a nuisance. Here the local board have turned the whole sewage of the district into the plaintiff's stream, destroying the value of his land for building purposes; and they have fouled the water in such a manner that if it were in the district the same local board might call upon the plaintiff to abate the nuisance which they themselves have caused; and even though out of it, the local board of health of the district in which it is might call on the plaintiff to remove the nuisance. The Court below have construed the provisions of section 86. of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120. relating to compensation, as inferentially giving a power to do the act complained of; but the true meaning of that section, when looked at as a whole, is, that the local board are to abate any nuisance, and if in so doing they cause any injury to an individual, they are to make him compensation. That would apply to cases where the local board had made a sewer alongside a stream, and had thereby drawn away some of the water.

Secondly, even if they had power to take and use any land or river within the district, the local board had no power to take or use any land or river out of the district. This scheme of drainage was carried out before the passing of the statute 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102. s. 58, which empowers vestries and local boards to execute works beyond their district. The legislature seem to have contemplated that the local board could drain into the main sewers, and section 135. of the original act gives the Metropolitan Board of Works power to take up the sewer at the end of the district and carry it away by a new sewer. It is nowhere found in the case that it is necessary to come on to the plaintiff's land. It is only more convenient for the board to do so. They can go in any other direction. It lies on the local board to point out a direct authority in the act empowering them to pollute this river. The plaintiff's counsel rest their case on an implication drawn from the section relating to compensation, whereas the act expressly says that no land nor any right to water can be taken without the owner's consent.

Mellish (Raymond with him), for the defendants.—The injury done to the plaintiff was the subject of compensation, not of action. The defendants were compellable by the statute to turn the open water-courses which ran into the river into underground drains, and necessarily to drain into the river. They were bound to make the sewers so as to drain their district. They could not drain in any other way. The act, which in section 86. says the local board shall cover in offensive open drains, and in section 67. shall "make such sewers as may be necessary for effectually draining the district," compels them to do these works. The proviso that the local board are to do their works in such a manner as not to create a nuisance, only applies to the case of their covering in open drains, and not to the works for the general drainage of the district. It is not found in the case that the fouling is injurious to the health of any one, nor is it a nuisance to any one but to the plaintiff as riparian owner in relation to his use of his field. The prohibition against committing a nuisance means only a public nuisance, not merely an actionable wrong to an individual. It is admitted that if the water had been drawn off by the works of the local board, the case would be one for compensation, but if cutting off the water is a subject of compensation, surely merely fouling it must be so also. If it be a subject of compensation, it matters not whether the injury is done within the district or without. If the works are done in the district, the compensation must be given for injury done anywhere. The power to sell and purchase the stream is only affording another mode of giving compensation if both parties agree. The act clearly contemplates the case of the local board being obliged to injure a stream. It is not correct to say, that the Metropolitan Board could have made a sewer in this place for the benefit of the Lewisham district only. Their power to make drains out of their district is confined to making main sewers, which are charged on the general rates of the metropolis.

Lush, in reply.—By section 89. of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, the local board may transfer the powers and duties of making the sewers to the Metropolitan Board. This the local board will do, if they cannot carry out their system of sewage for want of an outfall, and the Metropolitan Board may take any land necessary for an outfall sewer. The local board have not merely covered in old open drains, but have taken in a whole new district, and carried all the sewage into this river.

Cur. adv. vult.

The learned Judges now (Nov. 28) delivered their judgments seriatim.

PIGOTT, B.—This was an appeal from the judgment of the Queen's Bench upon a special case. The material facts stated by the case are, that the plaintiff was the owner of lands through which flowed the Poole River and a watercourse called the County Bridge Stream. The defendants are the Board of Works for the Lewisham District, constituted on the 1st of January 1856, under the Metropolitan Local Management Act, 1855. The plain-tiff's lands are not within the defendants' district, nor within the area of the Metropolitan Local Management Act. The plaintiff complains of the pollution of the County Bridge Stream and the Poole River, by the discharge, through sewers constructed by the defendants, of filth into the watercourse which joins the Poole River 400 yards from the outfall of the sewers. Previous to 1852 there were few houses in the district of the defendants' board, and only a small quantity of the sewage found its way by open watercourses through a culvert (which had existed for more than twenty years) into the County Bridge Stream, and thence into the Poole River, but without fouling them to any appreciable extent. In 1852, and subsequently, the houses have greatly increased, and the sewage was carried off in the same way, through the same open watercourses and culvert, and being increased, the effect was to pollute the County Bridge Stream and Poole River to an appreciable but not serious extent. But in 1859 the open watercourses had become a serious nuisance to the inhabitants of the district. Large quantities of filth accumulated in them, the effluvia from which were of the worst description, and in many places the adjacent soil was overflowed and saturated with offensive matter. To put an end to the further use of the open watercourses, and to provide efficient drainage, the defendants in 1859 and 1860 executed the works mentioned in the case, availing themselves of the County Bridge Stream to carry off the sewage. For the drainage of the houses of the Anerley Society, which since 1856 had been drained into one of the open watercourses, the defendants had also made an outfall into a sewer, which was by them substituted for the watercourse. The effect of the new and additional drainage made by them has been to cause a quantity of offensive matter to pass into the County Bridge Stream and Poole River, to an extent to cause a substantial injury to the plaintiff's streams, but has effectually provided for the drainage of the defendants' district. For the injury so caused, the plaintiff brought his action, which resulted in the statement of this special case.

The defendants contended that the plaintiff is not entitled to maintain an action, but must proceed for compensation for his injury under the 86th section of the statute 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120. It cannot be disputed that he is entitled to be compensated in some way ; and the question which we have to determine really depends on the proper construction which should be put upon that statute. In my judgment, the effect of the 86th section of that statute is to throw upon the district board the duty of draining and covering the open watercourses which are above described, and gives them power to do so by such works to be constructed in their own district as are necessary for the abatement of the nuisances. The mode of doing the work is not pointed out ; but the board are left to do what is necessary by "draining, cleansing, covering, or filling up." I think, also, that the works for draining the new houses of the Anerley estate are not distinguishable from the rest. They were within the district, and were previously drained by means of one of the open watercourses, and which was a nuisance there. So far as the works which have been constructed within their district are concerned, it appears to me that they are authorized by the statute.

I now come to consider the question of the outfall into the streams of the plaintiff, the lawfulness of which depends upon the language of the proviso. That language appears to me large enough to include every mode in which water rights may be prejudicially affected by sewerage works, and I cannot distinguish between streams within or without the local district.

It is true there is no express permission given to use watercourses for outfalls, nor, in my opinion, was it to be expected that there would be ; but, on the other hand, there is no prohibition on the subject, although the legislature must be taken to have been well aware of the universal custom to drain towns by these outlets. I therefore think that I am justified in construing the provisions of this legislation (so far as the language used will admit of) with reference to the existing and well-known state of things at the time ; and, in my opinion, the terms used in the proviso include cases of polluting water by throwing the sewage matter into it. The 150th section rather supports this view by empowering district boards to contract for the removal of weirs or other obstructions to the flow of water, "whereby sewage is impeded." Mr.

Lush argued that the proviso would be satisfied by our holding that the interference meant to include abstraction, but not pollution of water. I cannot, however, see any reason for such a distinction, or that we are justified in putting an arbitrary limit to the plain language employed. Indeed, it seems to me that, bearing in mind that sewerage is the subject-matter of the legislation, when the statute contemplates water rights being prejudicially affected thereby, it would be more likely to point to pollution as the prejudicial cause than to abstraction or other interference. I think that to adopt Mr. Lush's argument would be a virtual repeal of this section. For even without increasing the area of the drainage, the board would by merely converting an open course into a barrel-drain so confine the sewage matter and prevent percolation that the nuisance at the outfall would be increased, and the liability to an action thus incurred. In fact, it is to this as one cause, in connexion with the increase of new houses in the district, that the plaintiff's injury is attributable ; for the board have not changed the course of the sewerage or point of outfall. The case does not state that the defendants could have sent the outflow in any other direction. By the view I take I believe that I am only giving effect to the language and intention of the legislature, who have taken care that no private rights should be affected without ample compensation. The plaintiff may be deprived of the private enjoyment of his property to some extent, but he is only in the condition, now daily acted upon, of being called upon to yield a private right for the public benefit, and for as full a consideration as a jury may please to give him. The judgment of the Queen's Bench ought, therefore, in my opinion, to be affirmed ; but I speak with diffidence on the subject, finding so many of my learned Brethren take a contrary view.

BYLES, J.—I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to the judgment of the Court. The question is, whether the defendants below can pour off any amount of sewage from their own land, including the sewage of any district above them, into a private stream situated beyond the limit of their district, and I may add to any distance below. The consequences of such interference with the water as has been pointed out in the argument, would be not only the pollution of the stream, but the total annihilation of the value of the adjoining land for building purposes, and it might subject the owner of the soil to the danger of an action or to a prosecution for a nuisance. To test the result of interference of the defendants by a strong case, the power now claimed by the defendants would justify the district adjacent in pouring the sewage of confluent districts, or much more important districts, into the New River, from which a large portion of the metropolis derives its supply of water. One would expect that such a power as this, if conferred on a district board or vestry, would be at least given by express words, but no such words are to be found in the statute. Then, if the power exists it exists by inference if at all. It is now urged that the statute is imperative to compel the vestry or board to do the drainage, and that the drainage in this case cannot be otherwise effected. Therefore it is said that by inference the power is given. The necessity does not appear in this case; nor indeed can it be said that the necessity exists, in the strict sense of the word. Absolute physical necessity there cannot be. The sewage might be removed in carts or suitable vehicles however expensive that might be. Nor does necessity, in the lowest sense of the term, exist, that is, of doing the thing or an alternative so expensive as to be commercially impossible. For by section 89. the district board have the option of turning over the drainage to the general board, who have the power to cut an artificial drain which may effectually dispose of the sewage in the common stream. It is further alleged that the power to give compensation for interference with a stream and the right to the use of the water, implies a power to pollute the water to any extent and to any distance. Those provisions may well apply to cases where there has been an interference with or temporary use of the water, rightly or wrongly, with or without licence, because the power to take a mill and employ the water are both alike made the subject of purchase, not indeed of compulsory purchase, but where the contract is the voluntary act of the party. The act confers no compulsory power on these district boards to purchase land. These reasons might go far to negative an inference that the district board could turn this sewage into a stream even within their own district, but they are stronger to shew that they cannot do so beyond their own limits.

CHANNELL, B.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench should be reversed, and that the plaintiff in error is entitled to our judgment. We are not called on to determine what power the general board might have with reference to such a case as is now before us, but to consider simply whether the district board have the power claimed; and I am of opinion they have not. The case for the defendants in error has been principally based on the 86th section, and the judgment that we are called on to review is founded on that section; and I think the question mainly depends on the interpretation we should put on that section. I have looked carefully through the other sections of the act, and I find, if we divest the case of the power given by the 86th section, there is nothing in the statute that would warrant the proceedings which the defendants in error have taken. It does not appear to me that the introductory words of the 86th section give any sanction to the defendants or justify them in the act which they have done. Great stress has been laid on the provisoes; but I am of opinion that neither the one proviso nor the other can apply to any case which is not met by the introductory words of the section. The two provisoes may well stand upon the construction, which I think is the true one, with respect to the proceedings which are justified by the enacting part of the 86th section; according to which there are two courses open to the board: to do the act making compensation to the party injured after the act is done; or (which in a variety of cases would be the better course to take) to endeavour to contract with the party whose water right is interfered with, and so to purchase the option of doing the act in question. It was necessary to introduce such a power as that, for the board would have no right to apply the rates in the purchase of anything, except to the extent justified by the act. I was much struck by the observation of my Brother Bramwell in the course of the argument, that one would expect such a power as that which is claimed, if intended to be conferred, to have been conferred by express or direct words. I cannot see any such words here, or any equivalent words, which call on me to suppose that such a power was intended to be implied. For these reasons, I am of opinion that the plaintiff was entitled to maintain his action and was not driven to demand compensation, and that our judgment should be in his favour.

BRAMWELL, B.—I think that the judgment of the Court below should be reversed, and my opinion proceeds on the grounds taken by my Brother Channell. In express words, no power is given to do what the defendants have done to the plaintiff's property. One would not expect to find the power to do such an act given to the local board by implication only, when we find that in express terms they cannot purchase land by compulsion. It would be singular if, although they cannot take a man's land, they might, by implication, foul and spoil it. It is manifest that whatever reasons may be given for doing what they have done to the plaintiff's stream, the same could be given for doing it to any pond that he might have in his field. They claim the right to do it simply on the ground of convenience; and if they have a right to do this, I cannot see why they should not have a right to direct the sewage to one of the plaintiff's fields that might lie low, there to find its way out in any way it might happen to do. Still, it may be there is a power given to them by implication to do what they have done. It is said that the power is given by section 69, by which they are directed to cause to be made, and cleansed and maintain such sewers and works as are necessary for effectually draining their parish or district. In the first place, it does not appear that they could not do this in some other way. In the next place, if because they could not, they have a right to divert it into a brook, they have a right to divert it into any piece of land or place where they may find it convenient to send it. Thirdly, they may go to the Metropolitan Board, if they cannot otherwise do it. Fourthly, if they cannot do it at all, and no one can do it, then, as the legislature does not order an impossibility to be done, they must do so as far as they can. Therefore, I cannot see that the section which directs that it is to be done, by implication directs that they should have a power, either of taking land, or fouling land, or spoiling land, or a pond, or a stream in the way in which it has been done in this case. I am certainly very much confirmed in my own mind by the words in section 69: "It shall be lawful for any such vestry or district board to carry any such sewers or works through, across or under any turnpike-road, or any street laid out or intended to be a road or place, or through or under"—leaving out "across"—"any cellar or vault which may be under the pavement or carriage-way of any street, and into, through or under any lands whatsoever"—introducing the word "into," leaving out the word "across." The expression "into, through or under" manifestly does not mean to take it into, and there to leave it. It must be read, therefore, "into and through or under"; that is to say, you may take it in, and you must take it out, either by, "through or under." That this is the meaning seems to me obvious. Now, the argument of the defendants is, that they have a right to take it into and leave it there, except so far as it may find its way out by the laws of gravitation or otherwise. I find nothing in section 86. to warrant the contention, that power is given to the local board by implication to send this sewage into a man's stream. Great reliance has been placed on section 86, more by my Brother Pigott than by the learned counsel for the defendants. It says, in so many words, "every vestry and district board shall drain, cleanse, cover or fill up, or cause to be drained, all ponds, pools, open ditches, sewers, drains, and places used for the collection of any drainage, filth, water, matter or thing of an offensive nature, or likely to be prejudicial to health," and may cause notice to be given to the persons causing any such nuisance, or to the owners or occupiers of premises on which the same shall exist, requiring them to abate it, and if not abated, the local board may abate it. That section manifestly applies itself to a case where there is an existing nuisance, and gives the local board power to abate it. It is said that there was an existing nuisance here, and that these ditches and sewers were nuisances forbidden by the act. So be it. The defendants had a right to abate the nuisance; but they were bound to abate it in some way or other without infringing on the rights of property which the plaintiff was possessed of, unless power is given to them to do so expressly or impliedly. There is certainly nothing in the introductory part of the section to authorize the defendants to do what they have done. Further, they do not say they have done it for the purpose of abating the nuisance, nor have they given any notice to any one. Clearly, therefore, that part of the section would not justify them in what they have done. Then comes the proviso, which I agree is more extensive than the introductory part of the section, "provided also that where any work by any vestry or district board done, or required to be done in pursuance of the provisions of this act," &c., affects any right of water—(Now, I admit that does not mean in pursuance of the immediately preceding provisions, but generally the provisions of this act)—then, compensation is to be made, as a matter of right, to the person whose right of water is affected. It is said that the proviso shews that the local board may do things which would prejudicially affect water-right, and consequently, by implication, shews they have got the power so to affect them. I do not desire minutely to criticize these words, "done or required to be done." Does that expression mean done when not required, or required to be done when it is not done? There is here great looseness of language. Probably the original intention of the draftaman who drew the act was to put a mere proviso on the introductory words of the section; then it occurred to him, or to some one else, why do you not say generally that for whatever damage is done under the powers of this act compensation shall be given. I do not know that there is any necessity to interpolate words; but one may fairly read this proviso as though it had said that where any work is done, or required to be done, by any vestry or local board in pursuance of the provisions of the act,—if any can be done, except as aforesaid—compensation shall be given. To hold that this, which is a mere proviso saying they shall give compensation where they do what they may do, imports that they may do something which otherwise they could not do, is contrary to all the ordinary principles of construction. I think, therefore, the proviso neither itself confers the power, nor shews it is conferred by any of the other preceding sections. I am not aware that it has been suggested that on any other ground the local board possess this power. The Court below seem to have assumed that the local board had such a power, provided the injury had been in their district, and they seem mainly to have directed their attention to this point,—whether the fact of the damage being out of the district made any difference. Mr. Lush has told us that this point, on which he now relies, if made at all, was very faintly made in the Court below; therefore, in expressing my opinion that the judgment should be reversed, I do not think I am differing from the opinion which would have been given by the Court below if their minds had been directed to this question.

KEATING, J.—I am also of opinion that the judgment of the Court below ought to be reversed. It is to be observed, that there is nothing in the case which is stated to us which raises at all the ground of necessity for the execution of the works; and Mr. Mellish, though not exactly relying on that as an argument, did certainly press it as a reason why it was extremely probable that the legislature should have given the power contended for. I entirely agree with the observations made by the other members of the Court, who are for reversing the judgment in reference to the construction of the 86th section. It seems to me clear, if I may be allowed to say so, that the proviso in that section does not extend the power beyond the earlier part of the enactment; therefore, so far as the 86th section is concerned, it does not in any way confer this power. I may say that I think it would be a strong thing to put on the act a construction, in the absence of express words, which should enable the board to deal with the property of an individual as the plaintiff's property appears to have been dealt with; because, if they have a right to discharge the sewage into the stream to which reference is made in the case, they might have poured it over his land under the same power. No doubt it is said that, whatever injury they may do, they are bound to make compensation for; but it seems to me that it is not a case in which compensation could properly redress the injury which has been done to the plaintiff. That, of course, does not affect the construction of the statute. I was much struck with the observation of Mr. Lush, in the course of the argument, that the defendants' power is to abate a nuisance, and it is under their power for the abatement of a nuisance that they seek to exert the power which they have exerted on the present occasion. And it does seem rather anomalous that they, having the power to abate a nuisance, should exercise it in such a manner as to create a nuisance in the plaintiff's land, and one which the plaintiff might possibly be called on by some one else to abate. It is said that compensation might be given which would enable them to abate the nuisance; but it seems to me never to have been contemplated by the legislature to attribute compensation to an injury of this kind. Under these circumstances, it seems to me, for the reasons which have been given by the other members of the Court, that the judgment of the Court below ought to be reversed.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court below ought to be affirmed. It is true that the Court of Queen's Bench state that they delivered their judgment not without some hesitation. But I am not prepared to reverse that judgment, and I own, it appears to me, with most humble deference to the rest of the Court, that the view which the Court below has taken on the subject is the correct view. What fell from my Brother Byles with respect to the New River appears to me to be entirely beside the question. The New River is absolutely and strictly private property. The New River Company is not a public board, and the New River, so far as I know, has not a single drain running into it, from the fountain-head in the town of Ware down to the reservoir in Islington, whence the water is diffused all over London. The judgment of the Court below is founded on a very different state of things. It proceeded on the fact, that the streams in question, namely, the Poole River and the County Bridge Stream, had been used as drains; that the drainage of this very district actually flowed into them, though under circumstances which at the time rendered the drainage into those streams not appreciably a nuisance. And I think it cannot be much doubted that if the local board had allowed the houses to increase, and the quantity of nuisance and filth to accumulate until it actually ran down, time would have done that which the Commissioners have done, and done as I think in obedience to the act. Where there is the drainage of the surplus-water of a brook into a stream which flows into another stream, and so at last into the ocean,—if the neighbourhood becomes more populous by the multiplication of inhabitants, the various sources of pollution which arise out of the necessities of social life will of necessity at last make the drains a nuisance which originally were harmless. The case finds that there were streams which conveyed the water and offensive matter at times, but not in a quantity sufficient to make it appreciably a nuisance. What the defendants have done, is only so to construct the drains as to enable them to carry off not merely that which heretofore was carried off, but that which ought to be carried off in order that the defendants may obey the act and render the district healthy, which otherwise would become unwholesome. The effect of this has been not to do any new act, but merely to increase that which was done before, and to make that appreciably a nuisance which before was not so. That is the foundation of the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench. I think they were perfectly right, and that their judgment ought to be affirmed.

ERLE, C.J.—In this case the declaration was for fouling two streams of the plaintiff. The defendants pleaded that the acts complained of were done in the exercise of the powers given to the defendants by the Metropolis Local Management Act. The facts were that before 1852 the houses in the district were few, and the sewage from those passed into open watercourses which joined to those streams, but did not foul the water to an appreciable extent. If sewage there was, it probably soaked away. After 1852 the Crystal Palace increased the quantity of sewage, and it passed in the same watercourses, and fouled the water of the streams to an appreciable, but not to a serious extent. Between 1852 and 1859 the houses increased and the watercourses became a serious nuisance from the accumulation of filth therein. The defendants, both to put an end to these nuisances, and also to provide efficient drainage for the whole district and for the Anerley Building Society's land, caused a number of underground sewers to be made and arranged, so that the outfall for the sewage of the whole district should be at the same place where the old watercourse comes. This new system of sewers has prevented the accumulation of filth in the open watercourses, but the quantity of filth carried into the streams is greatly in excess of what had reached it before the new sewers were constructed, and has rendered those streams foul, stinking and wholly unfit for cattle or domestic use. The outfall of the watercourse is not the boundary of the defendants' district; the fouling of the stream takes place out of the district. The defendants, in covering the watercourse, acted in pursuance of the powers given by the 86th section, and if any damage arises from such covering, it would be a subject of compensation under that section. But the question arises in respect of the deposit in the plaintiff's stream of a large quantity of sewage brought there by the new system of sewers for the district, made by the defendants, as to which it is admitted that an action lies, unless the defendants were empowered by the act to make the deposit. Then, does the act give that power? Section 86, empowering the defendants to cover open watercourses which are a nuisance, gives no power to use the land or water of other persons for the purpose of receiving sewage, except by agreement. It is clear from the facts stated, that no prescriptive right of fouling the water by twenty years' usage had been gained by anybody. The defendants, therefore, had no right of outfall for the sewage there collected into the plaintiff's stream, unless the act created it; and I can find no such right given either by this or any other section of the act. Section 86, after requiring drains to be covered, so that the nuisance shall be removed, goes on to provide that when any work by any district board done or required to be done in pursuance of the provisions of this act, prejudicially affects any right to the use of water, full compensation shall be made in the manner hereinafter provided, or the board may purchase such right in the manner provided for the purchase of other rights. If the defendants had done no more than covering the open watercourse, and so removing the existing nuisance, they would have acted in pursuance of the powers given by section 86, and the remedy for the plaintiff would have been compensation merely; but as they have made a new system of sewers, and thereby collected a much larger quantity of sewage than reached the stream before, and caused that quantity to fall into the plaintiff's stream, they have exceeded their powers, and are liable to an action. The other sections of the act are framed in accordance with that construction. Section 69. gives the general power over the sewers in the district whereby the district board are required to repair and maintain the sewers vested in them, and to cause such alterations of sewers to be made as will be necessary for effectually draining their district, and it is made lawful for the district board to carry any sewers under any houses or any land whatever, making compensation for any damage done thereby, in manner thereinafter provided. Sections 150, 151. and 152. provide for the compensation to be made if any land or any right or easement in or over any land is to be taken. Section 150. enables the Metropolitan Board and every district board to take any land, or any right or easement in or over any land which may be necessary for the formation or protection of any works which they are authorized to execute under this act. Section 151. enacts that the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, shall, subject to the provisions in this act, be incorporated therewith for the purpose of enabling the Metropolitan Board and every district board to take land or any rights or easements in land. Then section 152. provides that the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, with respect to the purchase and taking of land otherwise than by agreement, shall not be incorporated with this act save for the purpose of enabling the Metropolitan Board to take land or any right or easement in or over any land. From those provisions it is clear that the district board cannot take land or any right or easement in land by compulsion. They can take only by agreement. Thus they could not acquire the easement of depositing sewage in the plaintiff's stream unless by agreement with him as proprietor of the stream. We are confirmed in this construction of the act by considering the other sections to which Mr. Lush referred as sections containing provisions for the vesting trunk sewers in the Metropolitan Board with the proper outfalls, and enabling district boards to connect branch sewers with the trunk sewers, and also provisions enabling any district board to give up to the Metropolitan Board the branch sewers in their district, if they think right, and the Metropolitan Board has power, both in and beyond their district, to take lands both by compulsion and by agreement, so as to dispose of the collection of sewage. If the defendants could maintain the right they have claimed, the plaintiff would probably be liable at his own expense to cover the stream so as to prevent a nuisance, in other words, to be at the expense of making a sewer to carry off the sewage from the plaintiff's district. Also, if the defendants can maintain their right, they would permanently deteriorate the value and enjoyment of the plaintiff's property for residential and agricultural purposes, and would in effect produce a sale by compulsion, which the statute has expressly excluded. The power to purchase streams, which is given by section 86, is subject to the provisions with respect to the purchase by the district board above mentioned—that is, they can purchase by agreement only, and not by compulsion, when damage has been caused by a work done in the exercise of the powers given by this act. For these reasons, I am of opinion that the defendants in doing the act complained of were not acting in pursuance of the powers given by the statute, and therefore that the plaintiff has a right of action, and is not restricted to a right to compensation. In this judgment I consider the point relied on in the Court below, namely, that the damage was done to the plaintiff out of the district of the defendants, to be immaterial. I ground my judgment on the point on which Mr. Lush has relied, as above explained, and which does not appear to have been pressed on the attention of the Court below. With respect to that point, the place of damage makes no difference.

Judgment reversed.

OF THE PEACE OF DEVON, respondent.

County Rate—Police Rate—Borough having separate Court of Quarter Sessions—Non-Intromittant Clause—Charter—15 & 16 Vict. c. 81.

By a charter of James the First, the mayor and recorder of the borough of B, in the county of D, for the time being, were empowered to be Justices to keep the peace in the borough, and to have full power and authority to inquire concerning whatsoever trespasses, misprisions, and other minor offences, defaults and articles done, moved, or committed within the borough, which ought or might be inquired into before the keepers and Justices of the Peace in any county, so that they should not in any manner proceed to the determination of any treason, murder, or felony, or of any other matter touching the loss of life or limb, &c. By the same charter was granted to them the same and similar courts of record, customs, liberties, privileges, franchises, &c. which they had theretofore holden and enjoyed, or ought to have holden and enjoyed. The mayor and recorder had always held a separate Court of Quarter Sessions, and had tried felonies and misdemeanors without any interference by the county Justices, although there was not any non-intromittant clause in the charter under which the privileges of the borough were claimed.

In making a county and police rate the borough had been ordered to pay its proper proportion, although it had never contributed before, and although the Justices had been in the habit of making a rate in the nature of a county rate, and had their own police.

Upon appeal against such rate, it was held, that in the absence of a non-intromittant clause, it must be taken that the county Justices had at any rate concurrent jurisdiction in the borough, and that, under 15 & 16 Vict. c. 81, the borough was liable to pay its proportion.

So held, also, with regard to the police rate.

BAIL COURT. { KELLETT v. THE LOCAL BOARD 1864. { OF HEALTH OF TRANMERE.
 Nov. 24. { THE LOCAL BOARD OF HEALTH { OF TRANMERE v. KELLETT.

Arbitration — Umpire — Public Health Act, 1848, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63. — Duration of Authority — Power of Court to enlarge Time for awarding.

The authority of an umpire appointed under the Public Health Act, 1848, to make an award, endures only twenty-one days from the date of his appointment, unless he enlarge the time, which he may and ought to do during his twenty-one days, notwithstanding the arbitrator's time has not expired.

The Court has no power under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, section 15, or otherwise, to enlarge the time in arbitrations under the Public Health Act.

A rule had been obtained by Kellett to set aside an award which had been made between him and the Local Board of Health of Tranmere, respecting the proportion to be paid by Kellett of the expenses incurred by the local board in paving certain streets.

The ground of the motion was, that the award had not been made within the time prescribed by law.

The local board obtained a cross-rule to enlarge the time for the umpire making the award till the 31st of December.

Both rules came on for argument together.

It appeared on the affidavits that Kellett was the owner of some houses fronting on certain streets in the district of Tranmere, which the local board required the owners to pave. This the owners neglecting to do, the board did the work, and under section 69. of the Public Health Act, 1848, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, had the expenses apportioned. Kellett disputing the propriety of the amount charged on him, the matter was referred to arbitration under the act. The local board appointed their arbitrator on the 5th of January last, and Kellett his on the 15th of January. The arbitrators appointed the umpire on the 3rd of February. The arbitrators enlarged their time till the 30th of April. The umpire made no enlargement at all. The arbitrators did not finally differ till the 27th of April, on which day they gave notice to the umpire that they could not agree. By arrangement the arbitrators and umpire sat together and heard the evidence. The umpire made an award dated the 2nd of May last, but no notice was given of it to Kellett until August last.

Field shewed cause against the rule to set aside the award. — The award was made in time. The umpire had three months to make his award from the time of the duty devolving upon him. Though the statute refers to the time of appointment as the date from which the time runs, that must mean from the time when the appointment is called into operation, that is, when the arbitrators have failed to make an award. To put a literal construction on the words of the statute, leads to the absurd result that in almost all cases the appointment of an umpire would be nugatory, for if the arbitrators enlarge their time beyond the twenty-one days from the date of the umpire's appointment his power is gone. Until the arbitrators have finally disagreed, or their time has expired, the umpire could not even enlarge his time. Under the similar provision of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, section 23. of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, the Courts have held that the umpire's time runs from the time of the duty devolving on him — Skerratt v. the North Staffordshire Railway Company (1) and Bradshaw's case (2). At any rate the umpire has three months in which to award.

F. Russell, in support of the rule. — The umpire, not having enlarged his time, was bound to make his award within twenty-one days from the date of his appointment. The appointment is made when the arbitrators sign it. By the express words of the statute, sections 124. and 125. of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, the time runs from the appointment. Neither in the case of an umpire, nor in the case of arbitrators, does the power of entering on the reference commence at once from the appointment. Before either arbitrators or umpire can act, they must make a declaration before a Justice. It is clear that the act, section 125, contemplates that the umpire shall be appointed at least three weeks before he can be called on to act. The natural construction of the statute leads to no absurd result. The great object of the statute was to obtain a speedy decision. The legislature probably contemplated that, which is the usual course, the arbitrators and umpire should act together, and that the arbitrators would allow ample time for the umpire. At any rate, the umpire would always have some time for awarding in, for the umpire must have the number of days between the appointment of the last arbitrator and his own appointment; and there would have been no difficulty here had the umpire enlarged his time. He had the power to enlarge his time while the arbitrators were considering the matter. It was necessary for him to do so to keep his power alive—Doddington v. Bailward (3). The cases cited, decided on the Lands Clauses Act, do not apply, for there the statute says, that if the arbitrators or umpire fail for three months to make an award their power shall cease, without saying if they fail for three months from any particular date. Here the date from which the time is to run is stated.

F. Russell then shewed cause against the rule to enlarge the time.—The Court has no power to enlarge the time. There is no common law power to enlarge. The statute 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42. s. 39. applies in terms only to references of an action or to references by agreement under the statute 9 & 10 Will. 3. c. 15. Nor does the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125. s. 15, give any such power. That only applies to compulsory references of matters of account under the act, to references in an action or suit, and to references by agreement, specified in section 5. The whole purview of the statute shews that it is so limited. There is no instance of an attempt having ever been made before to apply this provision to compulsory references under the Public Health Act or the Lands Clauses Act. It would be inconsistent with the provisions of the Public Health Act, which say that the award shall be made within three months, to hold that the Court could enlarge the time indefinitely. Again, section 15. of the Common Law Procedure Act says that the arbitrators and umpire shall have originally, and without enlargement, three months to award in. The Public Health Act says twenty-one days. The same remarks apply to references under the Lands Clauses Act. It cannot be supposed that by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, the legislature intended to repeal the special provisions of the Public Health Act and the Lands Clauses Act in reference to arbitration.

Field, in support of the rule.—The Court has power to grant this enlargement under section 15. of the Common Law Procedure Act. Section 12. of that act is universal in its terms. It says "in any arbitration" the Court may appoint an umpire. Section 15. refers to section 12, because it refers to the document therein mentioned. Here the statute and the submission form a sufficient document. It is a very reasonable power for the legislature to grant to the Judges, to enable them to enlarge the time fixed by the earlier statutes.

SHEE, J.—As to the first rule, I am of opinion that it must be made absolute. It is an application to set aside an award under the Public Health Act. The umpire did not make his award within twenty-one days from the date of the appointment, nor did he enlarge his time. At one time I had a doubt about the construction of the statute, arising from the words in section 125, that if the arbitrators fail to make an award the matter shall be decided by the umpire. But the case of Doddington v. Bailward (3), shewing that the umpire has power to enlarge his time before the arbitrators' time has expired, reconciles all difficulties, and prevents any difficulty of putting the plain construction on the words of the act. The award, therefore, is not made in time, and must be set aside.

With respect to the rule to enlarge the time, I am of opinion that the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, section 15, does not authorize the Court to enlarge the time in compulsory references under the Public Health Act, 1848. The fact that no similar application has been previously made confirms my view. The second rule, therefore, must be discharged.

Rules accordingly.

MACKLIN, AND CORNELIUS MACKLIN.

Debtor and Creditor—Bankruptcy Act, 1861, (24 & 25 Vict. c. 134.) s. 192.—Composition Deed—Release of Joint Debtors.

A deed of composition by a debtor with his creditors under section 192. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, containing a release of the debtor by each of the creditors from all debts due from him to them respectively, cannot be pleaded in bar by a joint debtor to an action by a non-assenting creditor; for if it extends to joint debts so as to release a joint debtor, it is bad, and not binding on non-assenting creditors.

Declaration for goods sold and delivered and on an account stated.

Plea, by defendant Reuben Macklin, that after the accruing of the plaintiffs' claim, and after the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, came into operation, the defendant Cornelius Macklin executed a composition deed within the meaning of that act, whereby he covenanted to pay his creditors a composition of 6s. in the pound, and each of his creditors released him from all debts due from him to them respectively, and which deed is as valid and effectual on the plaintiffs and all other creditors of the said Cornelius as if the plaintiffs and all other creditors had executed it, &c., all the requisites of the statute having been complied with.

Demurrer and joinder. (There was also a replication, setting out the deed in terms, to which there was a demurrer, the clause of release was in the terms set out in the plea.)

Kemplay, for the plaintiffs.—This plea raises a novel but untenable point, that when a debtor enters into a deed under the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and that deed contains a release by the creditors, it operates as a release not only to the debtor himself, but to his co-debtors.

[BLACKBURN, J.—Do you concede that such a deed would operate as a release at common law?]

Not unless it apply to joint debts. This deed must be taken to apply only to separate debts. (He was then stopped by the Court.)

Gibbons, for the defendants, argued that the release was a general release of all the debts by each of the creditors; that it therefore applied to joint as well as separate debts, and consequently was a release of the joint debtors.

COCKBURN, C.J.—The 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, cannot have been intended to extend beyond the separate debts of the debtor executing the deed. At any rate, if the release in terms extended to release the joint debtors it is quite plain it would be bad, and not binding on non-assenting creditors; and it makes no difference if the effect, as Mr. Gibbons argues, is the same, though the actual terms do not extend so far. The defendant, therefore, is in this dilemma: either the deed does extend to joint debtors, and is therefore bad; or it does not, and then it affords no bar to the defendant.

LOB, J. concurred.

In order to ascertain whether a structure of wood be a person's "own shop" within the exception of the 13th section of the Market and Fairs Clauses Act, 1847 (10 Vict. c. 14), the proper elements to take into consideration are: whether it is of a substantial character; whether it is merely an alteration of a stall in order to evade the provisions of the act; whether it would admit of a purchaser coming inside, and would protect goods from the weather, and admit of their being sufficiently secured if left in it at night; and also the nature and duration of the holding from the owner by the person using the structure for the sale of goods.

A deed, under section 192, and in the form Sched. D. of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, by which the debtor assigned all his estate and effects to trustees for the benefit of creditors, if it contain no release, cannot be pleaded in bar to an action by a creditor who has assented to and undersigned the deed.

Declaration on a bond for 1,000*l.*, dated the 27th of September 1858.

Plea, that after the accruing of the cause of action, and after the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, came into operation, and before this suit, the defendant being indebted to divers persons, and unable to pay, he, and certain persons as trustees, entered into and executed a deed in the form in Schedule D, of the act, made between the defendant of the one part and the trustees of the other, on behalf and with the assent of the plaintiff and other creditors; and which deed the plaintiff undersigned as a creditor; by which deed the defendant conveyed all his estate and effects to the trustees absolutely, to be applied and administered for the benefit of the creditors of the defendant in like manner as if the defendant had been at the date of the deed adjudged a bankrupt. The plea then alleged the consent of the requisite majority of the creditors, due registration, with certificate thereof, &c.; that immediately on the execution of the deed by the defendant possession of all the property comprised in it, of which the defendant could give or order possession, was given to the trustees; and that everything had happened and been done by the defendant and the trustees and the creditors necessary to make the deed, and the same is, as valid and binding on all the defendant's creditors as if they were parties to and had executed it.

for the plaintiff, that a deed like the present without a release cannot be pleaded in bar to an action.

[CROMPTON, J. referred to a case decided the day before in the Exchequer—Clarke v. Williams (2).]

Macnamara, for the defendant. — The plaintiff is an assenting party to the deed, and has, therefore, agreed to take under the cessio bonorum to be distributed as in bankruptcy. Where a deed is executed according to the form in Schedule D. to the act of 1861, it becomes a substituted contract between the debtor and each of his creditors, and their original debts are extinguished. It would be a fraud on the other creditors for the plaintiff first to assent to the deed and then bring an action.

[BLACKBURN, J.—Have you any case to shew that a creditor executing this deed would at common law have been bound by it as a release of his debt?]

Good v. Cheesman (3) is an authority to that effect.

[CROMPTON, J.—The present deed cannot be brought within that; all that the act intends by one of these deeds is to give the same protection as in bankruptcy. The debtor is protected from an execution unless the Court orders it; but how could it do that, if the effect of the deed is ipso facto to stop any action? BLACKBURN, J.—There is nothing on the face of the deed to bind the creditors. Is there any case at all in point on the old trust deeds?]

Whitmore v. Turquand (4) bears upon the point. In that case Lord Campbell, C., says, "Although this deed contains no release nor declaration that the dividend is to be taken in full satisfaction of the debt, the arrangement is in the nature of a cessio bonorum under the Roman civil law; and I think that when a dividend has been received satisfaction is to be inferred."

[BLACKBURN, J.—That case, as far as it goes, makes against the defendant, as it seems to have been assumed that obtaining judgment without execution was not a dissent from the deed.]

The judgment obtained in that case was before the deed had been executed. Here, 1864. } BURTON v. LE GROS AND

Nov. 7.* } ANOTHER.

Action—County Court, Liability of High Bailiff of—Notice of Action—9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. ss. 106, 138.

The high bailiff of a county court is liable, to the same extent as the sheriff, for the wrongful act of a person employed by one of his sub-bailiffs, to whom a warrant is delivered for execution.

Where, therefore, a warrant to the high bailiff, to levy on the goods of B, was delivered for execution to one of the sub-bailiffs, and he seized goods of B. on the 3rd of December, and left C. in possession, and C. the next day wrongfully sold the goods, contrary to the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 106, the high bailiff was held liable.

The notice of action signed by B, the plaintiff, under the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 138, was: "It is my intention at the end of one calendar month from the date hereof to commence an action against you" (the high bailiff) "in the Court of Queen's Bench, to recover compensation in damages for a trespass and excessive levy committed by you and your officers on the 3rd of December 1863, by selling and disposing of certain goods upon the premises, No. 80, Derbyshire Street, &c., to satisfy debt and expenses under an order recovered against me in the S. county court:"—Held, sufficient.

*Declaration—That a warrant was issued out of the county court of Middlesex, holden at Whitechapel, to the defendants who are the high bailiffs of that court, to levy on the plaintiff's goods 1*l.* 9*s.* 6*d.* recovered against him by one Robert Cousins; that the de-* *fendants seized certain goods of the plaintiff, to wit, &c., of much greater value than 1*l.* 9*s.* 6*d.* and expenses, and wrongfully, negligently and improperly sold them for a much less sum than they were really worth, and converted the proceeds to their own use.*

Second count, for the conversion of the plaintiff's goods.

Plea—not guilty by the various County Court Acts.

At the trial, before Cockburn, C.J., at the Sittings in Middlesex after Trinity Term, it appeared that one Robert Cousins having obtained judgment against the now plaintiff in the Shoreditch County Court, a warrant was issued to the defendants as the high bailiffs of the Whitechapel court to levy 1*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.* debt and 3*s.* costs. The warrant was handed by the defendants to one Sykes, one of their under-bailiffs, for execution, and he levied on the goods in the plaintiff's house, No. 80, Derbyshire Street, Bethnal Green, on the 3rd of December 1863; and the plaintiff being unable to pay, Sykes put and left one Crane in possession, and he (instead of keeping possession for five days as required by the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 106.) himself sold the goods on the next day, the 4th of December, for 2*l.*, offering the plaintiff 8*s.* 6*d.*, being the balance after payment of levy and expenses; this the plaintiff refused to take, and then Crane appeared to have paid the debt and costs to Cousins, and retained the 8*s.* 6*d.* himself. The defendants had in no way personally interfered, nor had they any knowledge even of Crane.

The plaintiff caused the following notice to be served on the defendants:

"To R. B. Le Gros and S. B. Williams, high bailiffs of the Whitechapel County Court, &c.

"Gentlemen,—I hereby give you notice that it is my intention at the end of one calendar month from the date hereof to commence an action against you in Her Majesty's Court of Queen's Bench, at Westminster, to recover compensation in damages for a trespass and excessive levy committed by you and your officers on the 3rd day of December 1863, by selling and disposing of certain goods and chattels in and upon the premises, No. 80, Derbyshire Street, Bethnal Green, in the county of Middlesex, to satisfy the sum of 1*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.* and expenses, under an order recovered against me at the suit of Robert Cousins in the Shoreditch County Court of Middlesex on the 3rd day of June 1862. Dated this 8th day of January 1864.

"James Burton."

And in due course he commenced this action.

A verdict was found for the plaintiff for 20*l.*, with leave to the defendants to move to enter a verdict for them, or a nonsuit, if the Court should be of opinion that the defendants were not liable for the acts of Crane, or that the notice of action was insufficient.

Parry, Serj. moved accordingly.—First, the defendants are not liable for the wrongful act of Crane, who acted without their authority or knowledge, and the whole of whose proceedings were in direct violation of the duties imposed by the County Court Act and Rules.—(See 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 106, and rule 107.)

[BLACKBURN, J.—Unless the defendants can make out any distinction between the position and liability of the high bailiff of a county court and those of the sheriff, they are liable. Gregory v. Cotterell (1) is directly in point. In that case the Exchequer Chamber held, that the sheriff was liable for the wrongful act of a third person whom the bailiff, employed by the sheriff, had employed. And Jervis, C.J., delivering the judgment of the Court, cites, with approval, Smart v. Hutton (2), where the sheriff was held liable for the act of the bailiff in acting directly contrary to his duty and to the mandate, by seizing the person of the debtor under a fi. fa. CROMPTON, J.—This is not a question of master and servant. COCKBURN, C.J.—The sheriff is always considered to be himself in possession by the hands of his minister. CROMPTON, J.—He is liable for every act of his officer civilly, though not criminally.]

Secondly, the notice of action is bad; there is no statement that the goods seized were the property of the person giving that notice, and no amount of damages is stated. The 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 138. requires "notice in writing of such action" (that is, an action for anything done in pursuance of the act), "and of the cause thereof, shall be given to the defendant one calendar month at least, before action." In Eltob v. Wright (3) an action was brought for breaking and entering the plaintiff's house, and taking his goods; and the notice of action, under this very section, was held bad which stated that the defendants broke and entered the plaintiff's house, and took goods therein, without mentioning whose goods: and the objection was also held fatal, that the amount of damages claimed in the action was not mentioned in the notice. Lord Campbell, C.J. says: "I think the notice is not sufficient, as it does not disclose a material part of the claim in the declaration, namely, that part of it which relates to the taking of the goods; the notice does not state the goods to be the goods of the plaintiff, indeed it seems to studiously avoid stating the goods to be hers. The declaration contains a different cause of action from that stated in the notice. We must look to the purpose for which the notice is intended, that is, that a tender of amends may be made, and I therefore think that the declaration and the notice should contain the same complaint. I think also that there is much weight in the third objection, as to the special damage not being stated; it would be very unfair that a large sum should be claimed at the trial, which is not mentioned in the notice of action."

[BLACKBURN, J.—In this case the notice does not charge a trespass to the plaintiff's house, but only charges the wrongful act of selling goods, which must mean the plaintiff's goods. COCKBURN, C.J.—The notice in Eltob v. Wright (3) mentioned the wrong court, which was clearly fatal, so that there was no necessity to give much consideration to the other points.]

There is a third objection: the wrongful act of sale is charged to have taken place on the 3rd of December 1863, whereas it really took place on the 4th of December. The time and place of the wrongful act charged ought to be correctly stated—Breese v. Jerdein (4). In that case the action was against a metropolitan police-constable, and the notice was for wrongfully taking the plaintiff into custody on or about the 27th of May last past; and the Court held, that the notice was insufficient, for that "the want of time and place rendered the notice void, under the 10 Geo. 4. c. 44. s. 41," on the authority of Martins v. Upcher (5), decided on the 24 Geo. 2. c. 44.

[MELLOR, J.—Section 138. of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. requires a notice in writing of the action, and the cause thereof; whereas Jervis's Act (11 & 12 Vict. c. 44. s. 2.) and the older acts protecting Justices, require that in the notice of action the cause of action shall be clearly and explicitly stated (6).]

COCKBURN, C.J. — We are of opinion that none of the points are tenable.

WATSON v. RUSSELL.*

Money Had and Received—Cheque improperly negotiated.

K. had chartered a vessel of the defendant at the hire of 30l. a week, payable every four weeks in advance, with liberty for the defendant in case of non-payment to re-take the ship. A month's payment of 120l. in advance being due, K. applied to the plaintiff to assist him, and the plaintiff gave K. a cheque for 60l. payable to the defendant or order, on the terms that K. should inform the defendant that the cheque was given on the consideration of the defendant's allowing the vessel to proceed on a certain voyage. K. paid the cheque to the defendant, but did not tell him of the plaintiff's conditions. As the whole of the 120l. was not paid, the defendant stopped and re-took the vessel. The cheque being presented at the plaintiff's bankers, on the part of the defendant, was duly cashed:—Held, that as the defendant had received the plaintiff's cheque, which was a negotiable security, without notice of any conditions, and for a valuable consideration, the debt due to him from K, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover from the defendant any portion of the proceeds.

This was an appeal, by the plaintiff, against the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, discharging a rule to set aside the nonsuit and enter a verdict for the plaintiff (1).

The action was for money had and received in respect of 60l., the proceeds of a cheque of that amount drawn by the plaintiff, and payable to the defendant or order.

The defendant had chartered a vessel, on the 16th of November 1860, to one Keys of Liverpool, who had hired her for six months. The charterer agreed to pay as hire for the ship at and after the rate of 30l. sterling a week, to be paid every four weeks in advance, the first payment of 120l. to be made on the vessel being placed at the charterers' disposal. In default of payment of the sums stated at the times and in the manner provided, there was liberty to the shipowner to withdraw the ship without prejudice to any claim for payment. The ship was placed at the service of Keys. The first payment of 120l., due on the 17th of November 1860, was paid. The second payment for the four weeks ensuing becoming due on the 17th of December was not paid by Keys; thereupon the defendant threatened to take the ship away. On the 22nd of December Keys sub-chartered the ship to another person through the plaintiff; and on Keys applying to the plaintiff for assistance, the latter then drew the cheque for 60l. and gave it to Keys, payable to the defendant or order, on the terms that he should inform the defendant that the cheque was given on condition that he (the defendant) would allow the ship to perform the sub-charter. Keys forwarded the cheque to the defendant, but did not inform him of the terms on which it had been given. The defendant received the cheque on the 24th of December. The defendant, however, not having received the whole 120*l.* on that day, stopped the vessel, and from that time the vessel never was again in Keys's possession. The defendant passed the cheque to his bankers, and it was cashed at the plaintiff's bankers' on the 27th of December 1860.

On the trial the plaintiff was nonsuited, but leave was given him to move to enter a verdict for the 60*l.*

The case was argued, in the Exchequer Chamber, by Brett, for the plaintiff, the appellant (Nov. 29, 1864).—The plaintiff was entitled to recover back from the defendant the whole 60*l.*, the amount of the cheque. Even if the defendant had a right to retain it as against Keys, he had no right to keep it as against the plaintiff. Had it been money or a mercantile negotiable instrument, it is admitted that the instructions given by the plaintiff to Keys could have had no effect upon the defendant's rights. But the cheque was not negotiable in the hands of Keys, being intencionally made payable to the defendant or order. It was given to Keys as a mere agent for the plaintiff, with a conditional and limited authority. Keys therefore had no right to hand it over except on those special conditions. It was of no value at all to Keys. Had it not been cashed by the bank, the plaintiff might have recovered the cheque in trover, because it was handed over without authority. So, though it has been paid, the plaintiff may say that the defendant has wrongfully and without authority received 60*l.* of his money. Secondly, if not entitled to recover the whole, the plaintiff is entitled to at least 30*l.* The defendant had no right both to take the ship and keep the money. It would be an unjust interpretation of the charter-party to hold that he could do both. The consideration for the hiring of the ship is 30*l.* per week. The mode of payment being a month in advance does not affect the question. The consideration for the payment is the use of the ship. The power to withdraw the ship gives the shipowner an option of claiming payment or of withdrawing the ship and cancelling the charter, without prejudice to any claim the defendant might have in respect of any week's hire during the time in which the charterer had the use of her. Had the defendant taken the ship on the second day of the month, he could not have sued Keys for the month's hire, for he would have had to aver in his declaration that he was ready and willing to let Keys have the use of the ship during the time.

Edward James, for the respondent, was not heard.

ERLE, C.J.—We are of opinion that the judgment should be affirmed. The plaintiff's cheque was a negotiable security, and if taken by the defendant for value without notice, may properly be held by him, though as between the plaintiff and Keys the former may have been the true owner. Now it was taken for value by the defendant, for when the defendant received it 120*l.* were due to him from Keys for the hire of the ship. But then it is said, that the consideration failed, that the defendant had no right to withdraw the vessel in default of payment, and at the same time retain the sum which had been paid. This is questionable, as a right of action for the 120*l.* having once vested, it is not easy to see how it became divested by the subsequent seizure of the ship, whether rightful or wrongful. But supposing that it did, supposing that the defendant is not entitled, as against Keys, to retain the 60*l.*, or that Keys can maintain an action for the seizure of the ship, still that is a matter between Keys and the defendant, and we think that the plaintiff cannot avail himself of it to maintain this action. It is clear, if the seizure was wrongful, that Keys could sue for it; if not wrongful, and the money is to be returned, and Keys can sue for it, it seems to follow that the plaintiff cannot. We therefore agree with the majority of the Court below, and for the reasons given by them, we think that the judgment ought to be affirmed.

Jan. 26. } ANONYMOUS v. PARR.

Evidence—Practice—Interrogatories before Declaration—Common Law Procedure Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 125), ss. 51, 52.

The Court will not allow interrogatories before declaration, at least where the plaintiff does not shew in his affidavit what his cause of action is.

This was a motion for leave to administer interrogatories to the defendant, after appearance, but before declaration.

It appeared, from the affidavit, that the plaintiffs, a firm of attorneys and solicitors, had clients against whom proceedings in Chancery had been instituted by the defendant, and certain papers were in the plaintiffs' possession connected with the hotel company as to which the proceedings had been taken. At an interview with one of the plaintiffs the defendant produced a book containing copies of several of these papers, and on examination it appeared that the papers in the plaintiffs' custody had been disturbed and tampered with, and a sheet of a confidential letter from one of the plaintiffs' clerks had disappeared; and the defendant displayed a knowledge of the contents of this letter. On this affidavit it was proposed to administer interrogatories as to how the defendant became possessed of the copies, &c.

Watkin Williams, in support of the motion, referred to the terms of section 51. of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, as allowing interrogatories to be delivered with the declaration, or at any other time.

COCKBURN, J.—I am of opinion that there should be no rule. The 51st section points to the delivery of the declaration as the time at which the application for leave to deliver interrogatories should be made. Now, in the present case, not only is there no declaration, but the ground of the application is, that the plaintiff does not know how to declare, so that the plaintiff does not even know what his cause of action is. I doubt, in the absence of authority (1), whether it was the intention of the legislature to allow interrogatories, not to establish a particular cause of action, but to find out what cause of action, if any, the plaintiff has. At all events, I think that, in the exercise of our discretion, we ought not to allow them in the present case; when, although the proceeding may be somewhat intricate, the plaintiff can frame his declaration in any particular form he may think most likely to meet the conjectured circumstances of the case, and can then afterwards amend if necessary; or he can insert several counts, and resist an application to strike any of them out on the ground of the doubtful circumstances of the case.

CROMPTON, J.—I do not see how we can interfere at present. By the 51st section an order is in all cases necessary, and putting the widest construction on the enactment, there must be something to shew the relevancy of the interrogatories proposed to be administered. The general rule as acted on by several Judges, the late Mr. Justice Wightman especially, was not to allow interrogatories till after issue joined. There can be no difficulty in framing a count in trover or trespass, and the plaintiff can easily amend if necessary.

BLACKBURN, J.—I also think we cannot interfere at present. The object of the application is not to save time, but on the ground that the plaintiff does not really know what his cause of action is; but the very essence of our jurisdiction to allow interrogatories is, that we should see what the cause of action is, in order to judge whether the interrogatories are relevant. We must see whether they are ancillary to and in furtherance of a particular cause of action; so that the plaintiff in order to ground his motion ought to shew what his cause of action is.

MELLOB, J.—The necessity of an affidavit that the plaintiff has a good cause of action shews that the Court must know what the cause of action is. Now, here the plaintiff shews that he has been damaged, but is unable to say whether there has been an actionable injury.

1864. { THE QUEEN, on the prosecution
Nov. 29. { of THE BURIAL BOARD FOR { THE PARISH OF AMERSHAM, { v. THE OVERSEERS OF COLESHILL.*

Burial Board—Parish with separate Divisions—Joint Burial-ground—Charging for Money borrowed on Rates—Proportions of Payment—Statute 18 & 19 Vict. c. 128. s. 11.

The vestry of a parish, one for ecclesiastical purposes but divided into two parts for the relief of the poor and other temporal purposes, appointed a burial board, which borrowed a large sum for the formation of the burial-ground, and by deed charged the future rates to be levied on part A, and also the future rates to be levied on part B. for the relief of the poor of the same parish or any part thereof, with the payment of the principal and interest. After a time a sum becoming due for an instalment of the loan and interest, the burial board apportioned the amount between the two parts in the proportion of the value of the property in each part as then rated to the relief of the poor, and demanded payment of the overseers of each part for its respective portion:—Held, that the charge was duly imposed by the deed, and the apportionment made on a correct principle, and a mandamus was granted to compel payment.

Error was brought, by the defendants, to reverse the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench on a special case stated after proceedings commenced on a mandamus.

The case and pleadings are set out at great length in the report below (1), but the following summary of the facts will be sufficient for the purpose of the question in the Court of Error.

The parish of Amersham consists of two parts, Amersham Proper, in the county of Bucks, and the hamlet of Coleshill, in the county of Hertford. There is one church for the two (situate in Amersham Proper), and one parish vestry, and the two constitute one parish for ecclesiastical purposes. But each part separately maintains its own poor, appoints its own overseers, surveyors of highways and constables, and makes out its own jury lists and lists of voters, and each returns a member to the board of guardians. The ratepayers of each part have separate meetings for their respective parts for the transaction of their separate affairs.

Amersham Proper has about 3,100 inhabitants, with a rateable value of 8,966*l.*; Coleshill about 600 inhabitants with a rateable value of 1,758*l.*

The united vestry resolved that a burial-ground should be provided for the parish, and appointed a burial board, and the inhabitants of Coleshill, in a separate meeting, resolved that it was inexpedient to provide a separate burial-ground for Coleshill. The approval of the Secretary of State was given to the appointment of the burial board. The burial board, with the sanction of the vestry, and of the Commissioners of the Treasury, borrowed 1,600*l.* for the purpose of providing and laying out two burial grounds, one to be consecrated and the other to be used as unconsecrated ground, and charged the payment of the principal and interest on the future poor-rates of the parish.

The deed of charge, reciting that the burial board of the parish of Amersham had borrowed 1,600*l.* towards the expense of providing and laying out two burial-grounds, to be paid with interest, and to be charged on the future rates for the relief of the poor to be assessed and levied on the said parish, witnessed that the burial board did "charge the future rates to be made and levied within that part of the said parish of Amersham, which is in the county of Buckingham, and also the future rates to be made and levied within that part of the parish of Amersham which is within the county of Hertford, for the relief of the poor of the same parish, or any part thereof, with the payment of the said principal sum of 1,600*l.* and interest thereon at the rate of 4*l.* 10*s.* per cent. per annum in the manner and at the times following; that is to say, the said principal sum to be repaid by equal instalments of 80*l.* payable annually," &c. The interest was made payable half-yearly. Afterwards the burial board, requiring 152*l.*, that is, 80*l.* for payment of an instalment of the principal debt and 72*l.* for interest, charged Coleshill with 24*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.*, and required the overseers of Coleshill to pay that amount. The board had ascertained the amount by apportioning the whole sum of 172*l.* between Amersham Proper and Coleshill in proportion to the value of the property in the two places respectively as then rated to the relief of the poor. The overseers of Coleshill refused to pay the amount. Thereupon a mandamus was obtained by the burial board to command them to make the payment, and ultimately a special case was drawn up which stated the above-mentioned facts, and raised for the opinion of the Court the question, whether the burial board had power to charge the hamlet of Coleshill with the payment of the monies, and whether it did legally do so.

In the Court of Exchequer Chamber the first point as to the power of the said burial board was not argued, and the only question raised was, whether the charge was a legal charge as imposed by deed.

J. A. Russell, for the plaintiffs in error, the defendants below.—The burial board did not properly exercise their power of charging the poor-rates of the parish pursuant to the acts. The board were wrong in charging in the deed one sum on Amersham Proper and Coleshill jointly. They ought to have charged a separate part of the debt on each. For though Coleshill is part of the parish of Amersham for ecclesiastical purposes, it is a separate hamlet, maintaining its own poor. The question turns on the construction of section 11. of the statute 18 & 19 Vict. c. 128, which amends the original statute, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85. By that section the first duty of the burial board was to apportion the charge on the two parts. As the deed is drawn, the lender might come on Coleshill for the whole amount, for the Court of Queen's Bench would grant a mandamus according to the terms of the deed. The amount to be paid by each part of the parish should have been fixed at first according to the then existing rateable value, and not be apportioned afterwards as the instalments were paid off.

O'Malley, for the defendants in error, the prosecutors below, was not heard.

ERLE, C.J.—We think that the deed is a legal and valid charge upon the property in the parish, and that in carrying it out the proper adjustments are to be made, and that the instalments ought to be divided between the two parts, or paid off in the proportion which the value of the property as rated to the relief of the poor in one part of the parish bears from time to time to the value of the property as rated to the relief of the poor in the other part.

LLOYD v. HARRISON.

Sheriff, Liability of—Escape—Bankruptcy Act, 1861—Invalid Deed of Arrangement, Registration of—Certificate of Registrar—Protection.

The plaintiff having recovered judgment against B. sued out a ca. sa., and delivered it to the sheriff. B. had previously entered into a deed, (to which the plaintiff had not assented,) which purported to be a deed of assignment for the benefit of his creditors, but which was in fact an invalid deed under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. It was nevertheless duly registered, and the Chief Registrar gave a certificate of registration to B, having a note that the certificate was available as a protection in Bankruptcy. The sheriff, on the production of this certificate, allowed B. to go at large, and made a return that B. was entitled to protection from arrest, and that he was not found in his bailiwick.

An action being brought against the sheriff for a false return, and escape: it was held, by Crompton, J., Mellor, J. and Shee, J., that, under the 198th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, the certificate was an answer to the action: by Cockburn, C.J., that the deed being invalid, the sheriff was liable.

The declaration alleged that the plaintiff, on the 17th of December 1862, recovered judgment against W. Baird for 29*l.* 5*s.* 10*d.* in the Court of Exchequer; that he sued out a ca. sa., directed to the sheriff of Montgomeryshire, commanding him to take the said W. Baird to satisfy the plaintiff the sum of 29*l.* 5*s.* 10*d.* The death of the sheriff was then alleged, as also that the defendant was under-sheriff and continued to execute the office; and also that the said W. Baird entered into a deed, bearing date the 16th of December 1862, which was set out in the declaration, and by which Baird assigned all his personal estate and effects to trustees for the benefit of such of his creditors as should execute or assent to the deed (1). That after the delivery of the writ, to wit, on the 26th of December 1862, an entry was made of the deed by the Chief Registrar of the Court of Bankruptcy in a book kept for such registration, and a copy of such entry was published in the London Gazette on the 30th of December 1862, pursuant to the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. That by a certificate given under his hand, the Chief Registrar certified that the deed was duly registered pursuant to the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. That such certificate set forth the nature and effect of the deed. It was further alleged that on the 23rd of December 1862 the writ was delivered to the defendant, and the defendant took W. Baird on the 2nd of January 1863 and detained him in custody, but the defendant suffered him to escape and remain out of his custody until he re-arrested him on the 3rd of January, and after which he again suffered him to escape, and made a false return that the said W. Baird was entitled to protection from arrest under the said writ within the true intent and meaning, and under and by virtue of the 198th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and the other sections relating thereto, and that the said W. Baird was not found in his bailiwick. The declaration then alleged, that the return was false in that the defendant, as such under-sheriff, suffered the said W. Baird to escape upon the production of a certificate of a deed which were not a deed and certificate within the true intent and meaning of the 198th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and which did not entitle the said W. Baird to protection from arrest; and that the plaintiff had not executed or assented to the deed.

(1) It was admitted by Mellish for the defendant that the deed was invalid.

declaration as related thereto, that he suffered W. Baird to depart and remain out of his custody, and afterwards made such return as in the declaration mentioned, upon and by reason of the production by the said W. Baird of such certificate as in the declaration mentioned. The certificate was then set out, and it was to the effect, that the deed in question "being a deed or instrument of assignment of goods, household furniture, and all other the personal estate and effects of the said W. Baird to trustees for the equal benefit of the creditors of the said W. Baird, was, on the 26th of December 1862, brought into the office for registration, and was duly filed and registered pursuant to the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861."

"Note, this certificate is available to the said William Baird for all purposes as a protection in bankruptcy."

It was then alleged that W. Baird had no real estate whatever, and that by the deed all his estate and effects were assigned to the trustees, and that before the arrest and detention all conditions had been performed to make the deed valid and effectual and binding on all the creditors, of whom the plaintiff was one.

The fourth was a similar plea to so much of the declaration as applied to the re-arrest and re-detention.

Cur. adv. vult.

The Court differing in opinion, the following judgments were (Feb. 25) delivered. —

SHEE, J.—We have in this case to decide whether the defendant, an under-sheriff (acting as sheriff after the death of the sheriff during his year of office), was justified in discharging a debtor, whom he had arrested on a capias ad satisfaciendum, on production by him of a certificate, signed by the Chief Registrar of the Court of Bankruptcy, and sealed with the seal of that Court, that the debtor had executed such a deed as is mentioned in the 192nd and 198th sections of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and that the deed had been filed and registered: whereas, in fact, no such deed had been executed by him, and he was not entitled to the certificate which the Chief Registrar is by the latter of those sections empowered to grant. The question turns upon the construction of the 198th section. It has been determined by a series of cases in the Courts of law and equity, and by the Lord Chancellor in bankruptcy, that no deed, touching the matters which are the subject of the 192nd section, is binding on creditors who have not assented to it, to the extent of its being pleadable in bar of actions brought by them against a debtor, or of restraining the execution of final process against his person or goods, or preventing an adjudication against him in bankruptcy, unless it be a deed not open to objection on the grounds of unreasonableness or inequality of its provisions as respects different classes of creditors,—a deed which satisfies the express conditions of the 192nd section, and has been duly filed, registered, and published, as that section and the 193rd prescribe. In all those cases the creditor and the debtor stood face to face upon their legal rights under the statute, the duty or liability of no third person under the provisions of the 198th section being in question. The debtor contended that the creditor was bound; the creditor denied that he was bound by a deed not executed by him, and to which he had not assented; and that issue was determined by the Court on its substantial merits: that is, on the statutory validity or invalidity of the deed. It follows from those decisions, and is also plain from the enumeration of persons in the first few lines of the 197th section, that a debtor cannot entitle himself to have his estate administered under the jurisdiction of the Court of Bankruptcy, in the new and exceptional course for which that section provides, by the execution, filing, and registration of any deed which, not being free from the objections before mentioned, and not satisfying the conditions of the 192nd section, is not binding on creditors who have not assented to it. The deed executed by the debtor in this case not being such as to be binding on the plaintiff, a non-assenting creditor, or to deprive him of his right to proceed in the ordinary course of law or in bankruptcy, he has a good cause of action against the defendant for allowing the debtor to escape, unless the defendant or his officer in so doing has acted in obedience to the express directions of the statute. The 198th section provides, that “after notice of the filing and registration of such deed” (that is, of such a deed as satisfies the conditions of the 192nd section) “has been given as aforesaid, no execution against the debtor’s person or property, other than such as may be had by writ or warrant against a debtor about to depart from England, shall be available to any creditor without leave of the Court” (of Bankruptcy), “and a certificate of the filing and registration of such deed, under the hand of the Chief Registrar and the seal of the Court, shall be available to the debtor for all purposes as a protection in bankruptcy." In the construction of this section, much, as it seems to me, depends upon the true meaning of the words which override the whole of it, "after notice of the filing and registration of such deed shall have been given as aforesaid." Do they mean after the filing and registration of such a deed as is mentioned in the 192nd section, and notice thereof given as aforesaid? if so, the restriction on the creditors' right to execute final process, and the authority of the Court of Bankruptcy to give leave to execute final process against a debtor's person or property are limited to the case of deeds which satisfy the conditions of the 192nd section, and a non-assenting creditor has not under the 198th section as respects process against the debtor's property, nor until execution executed as respects process against his person, and then only by protest against the Chief Registrar's certificate to the sheriff's officer, and if he insists upon giving effect to it by action against the sheriff for an escape, the means of contesting the validity of the deed which has been registered as one binding upon him. If the words mean after notice shall have been given as aforesaid, that such a deed as is mentioned in the 192nd section has been filed and registered, the restriction on the creditor's right to execute final process and the authority of the Court of Bankruptcy to give leave to execute final process extend also to the case of deeds registered, and published by the Chief Registrar in the Gazette as satisfying, but not really satisfying the conditions of the 192nd section; and a non-assenting creditor who, as the Lord Chancellor said in Ex parte Brooks, in re Brooks is "prima facie bound by the registration," has the means of protecting himself, by application to that Court, against the mischief of the Chief Registrar having been surprised into registering in the book kept by him under the 193rd section a deed by which creditors not assenting to it are not bound; and into signing and sealing a certificate in which the conditions of the 193rd section are untruly stated to have been satisfied. I have arrived,—with much distrust of myself, seeing that my opinion is at variance with the decision of the Court of Exchequer in Dewhurst v. Kershaw,—at the conclusion that this latter construction is the right one; that after notice has been given by the Chief Registrar under the 193rd section that a deed satisfying the conditions of the 192nd section has been filed and registered (whether those conditions are or are not satisfied), no process is available to the creditor against the debtor's property or person without leave of the Court of Bankruptcy, and that, in the authority to grant that leave is implied also authority to refuse it, and to relieve a non-assenting creditor from the hindrance of a certificate, to which its seal has been improperly affixed. In the case of Ex parte Morrison, in re Clunn, the Lord Chancellor gave leave to a non-assenting creditor to issue execution, on the ground that a deed which had been registered under the 192nd section and which satisfied the letter of the conditions of that section was "a fraudulent attempt to distort the forms of law from the purposes for which they were intended." On grounds not materially different, as it appears to me, the plaintiff in this case on finding that a deed not satisfying the conditions of the 192nd section, but registered and published in the Gazette as a deed in respect of which they had been satisfied, was set up against him, might, instead of hurrying on to the difficulty which the latter part of the 198th section threw in his way, have applied for leave to issue execution, which leave, in my judgment, the Court of Bankruptcy had power to grant. Much also depends on the construction of the words in the second part of the 198th section, "a certificate of the filing and registration of such deed shall be available." Do they mean "the filing and registration of such a deed as satisfies the conditions of the 192nd section and a certificate of its having been filed and registered shall be available"? or "a certificate that such a deed as satisfies the conditions of the 192nd section has been filed and registered, shall be available"? Against the latter and, I think, the correct construction,—which would have the effect, after notice given in the Gazette, that such a deed as satisfies the conditions of the 192nd section had been filed and registered, of making the certificate, though it ought not to have been granted, a protection to the debtor from arrest, without leave of the Court of Bankruptcy,—it must be admitted that the clear intention of the legislature, that the Chief Registrar should give the protection provided by the 198th section to those debtors only by whom a deed satisfying the conditions of the 192nd section has been executed, raises some presumption. On the other hand, a statutory certificate that those conditions had been satisfied, under the signature of the officer whose duty it is to register deeds and grant protection, and under the seal of the Court of Bankruptcy, must have been intended by the legislature for the practical purpose of an assurance to the ministers of the law, that the matter which is certified had been inquired into and ascertained to be the truth; and the question is, whether the machinery thus employed by the legislature to effect its purpose, and in particular the peremptory rule laid down for the observance of the sheriff's officer in the 113th section of the Bankruptcy Act of 1849, incorporated by reference to it in the 198th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, be not such as to make it, notwithstanding the warrant he holds from the sheriff, his personal duty to discharge a debtor, who, though not really entitled to it, possesses and produces an unrevoked certificate, under the 198th section, of his having executed and registered a deed satisfying the conditions of the 192nd section; a certificate purporting on the face of it to be available to him for all purposes as a protection in bankruptcy? The object of the 198th section unquestionably was to secure for a debtor, really entitled to a certificate, an immediate discharge from arrest. It may be that the legislature, —in reliance on the precautions taken by it that a certificate of a deed, satisfying the conditions of the 192nd section, having been filed and registered, should not be granted, in the case of a deed not satisfying those conditions, and on the authority vested in the Court of Bankruptcy to correct any mistake of the Chief Registrar by giving leave, notwithstanding such filing and registration, to issue execution,—has made the certificate on its production to the sheriff's officer a warrant and order to him to discharge the debtor; and the case of Saffery v. Jones, in which Lord Tenterden said that even if the Insolvent Court had no jurisdiction under the 7 Geo. 4.

c. 57. to discharge the debtor, the language of the 81st section of that act was sufficiently strong to make the order of the Court a protection to the gaoler who had discharged him, seems an authority for so holding. The difficulties which attend any other construction of these sections of the act appear to me insuperable. By the 52nd section the duty of granting protection is imposed upon the Registrars, and they may adjourn any matter coming before them (the question, ex. gr., of the compliance or non-compliance of any deed with the conditions of the 192nd section) for the consideration of the Commissioners. By the 193rd section, after being satisfied by affidavit or by the certificate of the trustee or trustees of a deed, that the fifth condition of the 192nd section, which relates to matters dehors the deed, has been complied with, the Chief Registrar is to enter the dates, names, and descriptions of the parties to such deed, together with a short statement of the nature and effect of it, in a book, to be kept exclusively for the purpose of the registration of deeds, satisfying the conditions of that section,—words which imply the obligation on him of considering and deciding whether deeds brought to him for registration do or do not satisfy those conditions; he is next to give public notice in the Gazette, that such a deed has been filed and registered, and finally, by the 198th section, he is to discharge the duty of granting protection, by signing and affixing the seal of the Court of Bankruptcy to a certificate of the filing and registration of "such deed," which certificate is intended and declared by the act to be available to the debtor for all purposes as a protection in bankruptcy. "Protection in bankruptcy" has no meaning but the meaning given to it in the 112th section of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, viz. "freedom from arrest or imprisonment by any creditor"; to insure which, by the 113th section of the same act (incorporated with the act of 1861), express direction is given to the officer effecting an arrest, that on production by the bankrupt of his protection, he shall be immediately discharged; that the officer shall not detain him, and that if the officer do detain him, except for so long as is necessary to obtain a copy of the protection, he personally shall forfeit to the bankrupt for his own use the sum of 5*l.* for every day during which the detention lasts. In construing these provisions, the first consideration that occurs to one is, the great improbability that the legislature can have intended the words "such deed" in the latter part of the 198th section of the act of 1861 to qualify the plain meaning of the directions given by the 113th section of the act of 1849 to a ministerial officer of the humblest class, under a penalty on him personally with which it would be preposterous to visit an honest mistake or error of judgment, or any but the perverse and wilful disregard of a clear and unmistakable duty. It is hardly conceivable that such a penalty should have been imposed upon a person presumably incompetent to determine any question of legal difficulty, and to whom time for consultation and means of knowledge or advice are expressly denied, if more were required of him than that he should have no opinion of his own, but humbly and submissively obey the clear instructions set forth for his especial guidance, in the only section of an act of parliament which relates to the execution of his duty, on production to him of a document, which that section clearly describes. The unreasonableness of expecting him to understand that the words "a certificate of the filing and registration of such deed shall be available," do not mean a certificate that such a deed has been filed and registered shall be available, and from the words "such deed," that the instructions given to him in the 113th section are not to be the rule of his conduct, in the event (of which he can know nothing) of the Chief Registrar having mistaken his duty, and granted a false certificate, seems strong to shew that, however improperly the certificate may have been granted, the sheriff and his officer are safe, if the latter obeys it. In the case of Norton v. Walker it was decided that an officer was justified, under the 23rd section of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122. in discharging a person who had been adjudicated a bankrupt, and who produced a summons in bankruptcy, though in truth he was not a bankrupt, the words "such bankrupt" in the section being taken by the Court to mean the party so adjudged a bankrupt. "We are of opinion," said the Lord Chief

Baron, "that this is the proper construction. The remedy provided is one which admits of no delay. The party arrested is to produce his summons, and the sheriff is immediately to discharge him. The sheriff could not possibly obey the enactment, if he were bound in the first instance at his peril to ascertain that his prisoner had been a trader, that he had committed an act of bankruptcy, that a fiat had issued on a valid and sufficient debt, and that he had been adjudicated a bankrupt thereon." So here, why should not the officer be held justified in discharging a person who appears by the certificate of the Chief Registrar and the seal of the Court of Bankruptcy to have complied with the requirements of the 192nd and 198th sections by executing "such deed" as is therein mentioned, and to whom the certificate is declared by the latter of these sections to be available for all purposes as a protection in bankruptcy? The case of Thomas v. Hudson, an action against the keeper of the Queen's Prison for an escape, he having released a prisoner on production by him of an order for his discharge obtained from a Commissioner of the Court of Bankruptcy, was decided on the same principle. The Court of Exchequer held, that whether the debt was or was not one from which the Commissioner had power to discharge the prisoner, the defendant was protected, being bound to obey the order of the Commissioner, who was acting judicially in a matter over which he had jurisdiction. And in Wallinger v. Gurney, in which it was questioned whether an interim order of protection under the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116. and 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, was available for a debtor arrested on a ca. sa. for a debt contracted by him since the filing of his petition, Erle, C.J. said, "If there had been a doubt upon the construction of the statutes, the principle of the decision in Thomas v. Hudson, protecting the gaoler in obeying the plain words of the order for protection, would apply to a sheriff obeying the plain words of the order produced to him in this case." It is said there is a great difference, though granted by the same officer, between an adjudication in bankruptcy and a certificate under the 198th section, to which none but those who have conformed to the conditions of the 192nd section are entitled. But the adjudication in bankruptcy, on which protection is granted, is at most a provisional proceeding, which, being obtained ex parte, has little but its name of a judicial character about it, whereas the filing and registration of a deed satisfying the conditions of the 192nd section (after notice thereof in the Gazette), and the certificate of the Chief Registrar under the 198th section, are a final release to the debtor, and as effectual for the protection against creditors of his property and person, as the certificate of conformity granted after his last examination to a bankrupt under the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, and the order of discharge granted to him under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. They are in truth in the scheme of the arrangement clauses of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, substantially the same thing, only that the release under those clauses is arrived at more quickly and in a way more satisfactory, because without the useless and in many cases undeserved torture to the debtor of repeated examination on the instructions of a small minority of his creditors, and without waste to his estate, and with less injury to his prospect of re-establishing himself in business and credit. The case of Ilderton v. Jewell has been cited in the course of the argument as opposed to the construction which, in justification only of the officer, Mr. Mellish asks us to adopt. I cannot see that it affects his argument. In Ilderton v. Jewell, to an action against bail in the Mayor's Court for not rendering in pursuance of their recognizance one Louis Castrique, or paying to the plaintiff the monies which had been adjudged to him in a suit against Louis Castrique, the defendants pleaded the execution by Louis Castrique of a deed, certified by the Chief Registrar of the Court of Bankruptcy to be a deed in conformity with the conditions of the 192nd section, but which being set out appeared not to satisfy those conditions. On these pleadings the question was, whether as against the creditors the debtor was entitled to protection. The Court held that the deed was void, and the plea therefore not an answer to the action: Williams, J. doubting whether even if the deed had been good the bail would have been exonerated. The Lord Chief Justice is reported to have said that the deed being void the certificate was also void. And so it was in the sense of being voidable, and of no significance as between the creditor and the debtor, on whose immunity from arrest the defence of the bail was founded. Under the old system, a certificate of the defendant's bankruptcy and conformity was no answer to an action against the bail, their course being to render him, after which he applied to the Court for his discharge, on affidavit setting forth that he had become bankrupt and obtained his certificate under the Commission. The plaintiff was then entitled to an issue to try the validity of the commission and certificate, and if he could shew them to be invalid or improperly obtained, as was the case with the deed and its filing and registration in Ilderton v. Jewell, the application was refused, 1 Tidd's Practice, 292, 9th edit. That case does not appear to me to prove more than the correctness of the admissions on which Mr. Mellish bases his argument; and it is surely beside the question whether, under the combined effect of the 198th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and of the 112th and 113th sections of the Bankruptcy Consolidation Act, 1849, which latter sections were not even mentioned in Ilderton v. Jewell, the officer in this case was justified in discharging the debtor. In the case of Dewhurst v. Kershaw, also cited for the plaintiff, the Court of Exchequer refused to discharge a debtor, who had been taken on a ca. sa., on the ground that he had executed and registered a deed in respect of which, though invalid under the 192nd section, a certificate had been granted. It does not appear that the certificate had been produced to the officer, and it was unnecessary to consider the effect, as respected him or his principal, the sheriff, of the latter part of the 198th section of the Act of 1861, and its connexion with the 113th section of the Act of 1849. The Court refused to set aside its legally executed process in order to defeat, as between the creditor and the debtor, what it clearly saw to be, under the provisions of the Act of 1861, the very right and justice of the case. In so doing, upon a construction apparently of the words "after notice of the filing and registration of such deed has been given as aforesaid," in which I cannot concur, it upheld when done what the Court of Bankruptcy, on the application of the creditor, must, I think, have allowed to be done. We are, as it seems to me, in no degree fettered by the decision of that case; or rather we are bound, without being overruled by the dicta of learned Judges in cases not depending on the very point before us, to construe the act, if we can, so as to make all its sections operative and consistent. The inconvenience of allowing the process of one of the superior Courts of law to be set at naught by a sheriff's officer, under cover of a certificate which ought never to have been granted, and which may have been declared bad in the very judgment on which the process has issued, was in the course of the argument forcibly noticed by my Lord, without any entirely satisfactory answer on the part of the defendant to the objection which it suggests. The only answer that can be given is, that it is a mischief which has arisen from an imposition practised upon the Chief Registrar or a misconstruction by him of the act of parliament, a misconstruction which, if my reading of the 198th section be the right one, might have been corrected by application to the Court of Bankruptcy for leave to execute the writ; and which, after the explanation of the arrangement clauses by the Lord Chancellor in Ex parte Morrison, in re Clunn, and the discussion in this and other cases, is not likely to occur again, whereas, if we held that the Chief Registrar's certificate, which for the future may be expected to be a safe guide to the officer, does not in this case protect him, he will in all cases in which it has been properly granted be uncertain whether to act upon it or not. It occurs to me further, that the word "available," in the first part of the 198th section, may have been used for the purpose of not interfering with the practice which enables the plaintiff, after he has signed judgment, to prepare his writ of execution and get it sealed by the sealer of the writs, on production to him of the postea and judgment paper; and that the intention was at this stage of the proceedings and on production of the notice in the Gazette, to give authority to the Court out of which the process issues to render it un-"available," by staying the execution of it, until leave obtained from the Court of Bankruptcy. The declaration also complains that the defendant falsely returned to the said writ "that the said William Baird was at the time of the delivery of the said writ to him the defendant, and still is entitled to protection from arrest within the true intent and meaning of the 198th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861." That is, as I think, a false return, the said William Baird not being entitled to such protection. But the substantial ground of action here is the escape—the allegation of a false return, for which, without damage, according to the cases of Dawson v. the Sheriffs of London (2), Williams v. Mostyn (3) and Wylie v. Birch (4), an action would not lie, not being material. Our judgment, in my opinion, ought to be for the defendant.

MELLOR, J.—The question to be determined in this case is, whether the sheriff is protected in an action for an escape, for having discharged a debtor, taken in execution on a writ of ca. sa., out of his custody, upon such debtor producing to the sheriff a certificate, under the hand of the Chief Registrar of the Court of Bankruptcy and the seal of such Court, of the filing and registration of a deed of arrangement, purporting to be a deed of arrangement between such debtor and his creditors, under the provisions of the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, such deed not being in fact a valid deed within the meaning of that section, and not having been executed or assented to by such creditor. On the argument it was admitted by Mr. Mellish, for the defendant, that the deed to which the certificate referred, could not be supported as a valid deed after the decision in Ilderton v. Castrique and Ilderton v. Jewell, and that the certificate of the filing and registration of such a deed could afford no protection to the execution-debtor, and that consequently the creditor was entitled to his execution against the person of such debtor. It was, however, contended, although such deed and certificate were both in fact inoperative to restrain the execution or give protection to the debtor, yet that the sheriff, who bonâ fide gave credit to a certificate, good on the face of it, under the hand of the Chief Registrar and the seal of the Court of Bankruptcy, of the filing and registration of a deed of arrangement under the 192nd section, was excused for acting upon such certificate and discharging such debtor out of custody. After a careful consideration of the various sections of the Bankrupt Act, 1861, which bear upon this question, I am of opinion that the sheriff was excused, and that consequently the action is not maintainable. Much difficulty was experienced during the argument in construing the 198th section of the Bankrupt Act, 1861, and in ascertaining the true effect of a certificate, owing to the enactment that such a certificate should be available to the debtor for all purposes as a protection in bankruptcy. Protection in bankruptcy is either interim or final, neither kind of protection is strictly applicable to cases of this description. A debtor having executed a deed, accepted and assented to by the requisite majority of his creditors and conformable to the provisions of the 192nd section, is perpetually protected against the exercise of any right on the part of a creditor affected by such arrangement other than is provided by the 198th section; but if the deed turn out to be invalid, then, as regards the debtor, who is a party to such deed and aware of its contents, it affords no protection to him, as regards execution either against his person or property. In the present case the deed, although registered under the 192nd section, which makes registration an essential condition to the validity of a good deed, cannot (being otherwise invalid) be made better, by the mere fact of registration, and therefore the certificate of the filing and registration of such a deed cannot extend to protect the debtor who is a party to it; still, it may, in my opinion, operate as an excuse to the sheriff bonâ fide acting under it. It appears to me that the legislature, in framing the machinery for carrying into effect the new provisions for deeds of arrangement which were to bind non-assenting creditors, intended to make the Chief Registrar of the Court of Bankruptcy, so far as regards the registration of such deeds, and the granting of certificates of the filing and registration thereof, a substitute for the Commissioner acting in the matter of an adjudication of bankruptcy. It invests the Chief Registrar with a general jurisdiction to determine, for the purpose of registration, whether the conditions imposed by the statute have been duly complied with; and he must, in the exercise of his functions, examine the deed and ascertain whether it is a deed "relating to the debts or liabilities of the debtor, and his release therefrom, or the distribution, inspection, management, and winding-up of his estate;" whether it has been executed or assented to by the requisite number of creditors of the requisite amount and value; and he must for this purpose examine and determine whether the requisite execution or assent has been duly made by the creditors; and being satisfied of these matters, he must thereupon register the particulars of the deed, with a short statement of the nature and effect thereof, in a book to be kept for that purpose, and he must also publish a copy thereof in the Gazette. Now, it appears to me that the functions of the Registrar, though in part ministerial, are in part judicial. As was said by the Court of Exchequer, in Thomas v. Hudson concerning the functions of a Commissioner in Bankruptcy, "he is to come to a decision on the petition and affidavits, not indeed a decision as to whether a petitioner, having complied with the requisites of the act, shall or shall not have his interim order or his order of discharge, for to these he is in such case clearly entitled, but whether he has or has not done what the statute imposes as the conditions on which he would become entitled to those privileges." In that case the Commissioner had nothing upon which to form his judgment, except the petition and affidavits. The Chief Registrar in determining as to the fact whether the deed in question is a deed relating to the debts and liabilities of the debtor and his release therefrom, &c., and whether it has or has not been executed or assented to by the requisite number of creditors of the requisite amount and value, must, like the Commissioner in Thomas v. Hudson, examine and determine those facts before he registers the deed. And so far as those facts are material as conditions of registration, he must determine the question for himself, subject it may be to his decision being reversed by the Court of Bankruptcy. Although he has no authority to determine as to the validity of the deed itself, he has authority to decide provisionally that the conditions preliminary to registration have been performed, and his certificate must, I think, at least be intended to amount to a declaration evidencing the fact that a deed conforming to the provisions of the 192nd section had been duly executed and registered. Such being the functions of the Registrar, it appears to me that the certificate of such Registrar of the filing and registration of the deed under his hand and the seal of the Court of Bankruptcy, although not giving actual protection to the debtor by reason of the invalidity of such deed, in point of fact nevertheless operated to excuse the sheriff, who had no means of knowing whether the deed to which the certificate referred was in conformity with the 192nd section or not. The duty of the officer, as appears from the 113th section of the former Bankruptcy Act, in case of protection, is immediately to discharge the debtor on his producing his protection in bankruptcy. It would be so strange a conclusion that the sheriff should under such circumstances be rendered liable to an action for giving credit to the certificate of the Registrar, that, as was said by the Court in the case of Thomas v. Hudson, "if there be any construction of the act by which such a consequence may be avoided, we feel bound to adopt it." In the case of Norton v. Walker it was decided that the sheriff was protected under the 23rd section of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, in discharging a person who had been adjudged a bankrupt de facto, although he might not turn out to be a bankrupt de jure. In that case Pollock, C.B., in giving the judgment of the Court, said, "In our view of the case it is not material to consider whether the bankruptcy was valid or not; a fiat had issued under which Robinson had by the proper Court been declared to be a bankrupt, and we think that this was all that the sheriff was bound to inquire into," and the Court there read the words "such bankrupt" to mean the party so "adjudged bankrupt." No doubt the Commissioner of Bankruptcy had there adjudged Robinson to be a bankrupt, and the decision of the Court of Exchequer may therefore be said to have rested on the principle of law which protects sheriffs, &c., in obedience to an order of a Court having jurisdiction over the subject-matter, although the making of the order might in the particular instance be unauthorized. If, however, I am justified in reading the sections of the Bankrupt Act of 1861 as substituting the Registrar with reference to the registration and filing of the deeds of arrangement under the 192nd section and granting the certificate thereof, for the Commissioner acting in an ordinary bankruptcy granting protection, the case becomes at once an authority in favour of the defendant. The Commissioner in the one case and the Registrar in the other are alike creations of statutes by which their functions are assigned, and it appears to me for the reasons already given that the functions of each are analagous, to the extent which is necessary to make the certificate granted by the Registrar an excuse for the sheriff in bond fide discharging a debtor who produced it. I agree that there must be a valid deed in order to give jurisdiction, under the 197th and 198th sections, to the Court of Bankruptcy to administer the estate of the debtor as if he had been adjudged a bankrupt, and to deprive the creditors of their rights against his person or property, except as therein reserved. I cannot adopt a construction which would compel me to decide that, although the deed were invalid and therefore not binding on non-assenting creditors, their only remedy against the debtor's estate would be through the intervention of the Court of Bankruptcy acting under those sections. The Lord Chancellor, sitting in bankruptcy, in the case of Ex parte Morrison, in re Clunn, appears to have given permission to a creditor to issue execution against a debtor's property, on the ground that the deed registered was colourable and fraudulent against the creditor; but the point was not taken, nor were the cases at law cited; but it was assumed that there was authority in the Court, notwithstanding the character of the deed, to permit execution to issue. Had the point been taken, and the Lord Chancellor's attention called to the cases, and he had then decided that he had power, sitting in bankruptcy, to give the leave to issue execution against the goods of the debtor, notwithstanding the badness of the deed, I should have yielded to that decision and considered this point concluded by authority. The single question, however, which we have now to decide is, whether a certificate of the filing and registration of a deed under the hand of the Chief Registrar and the seal of the Court good on the face of it, and disclosing no objection to its validity, can operate to excuse a sheriff who bonâ fide acts upon it, without notice of any objection to it and without the means of ascertaining any, although such deed be in fact invalid by reason of its not being in conformity with the provisions of the 192nd section. As regards the debtor who was a party to the deed, and who has imposed an invalid deed upon the Registrar, it is only just and right that, so far as he is concerned, the certificate should not protect him from arrest or his goods from seizure; and therefore the Courts, in refusing to discharge a debtor arrested under a ca. sa. out of custody upon the production of such a certificate founded on an invalid deed, were fully justified. They had the real facts brought to their knowledge, and were quite right in concluding that the filing and registration of an invalid deed could give it no validity, and that the debtor was therefore not protected from arrest. The sheriff who is called upon to act on the instant has no means of ascertaining the contents of the deed, or whether the conditions of registration have been complied with, or that the certificate is of no effect. Surely, he must, in the absence of all notice to the contrary, give credit to the certificate, as a document authorized and required by the statute to be given to the debtor, as affording sufficient evidence that a deed conforming to the provisions of the 192nd section has been duly filed and registered, and is therefore to be excused in acting under it as he could have done under a protection in bankruptcy. I am not at all prepared to decide, if the creditor could affect the sheriff with notice of the contents of the deed, or of the grounds and facts, by reason of which the certificate could afford no protection to the debtor, that the sheriff would not then be bound at his peril to execute the process of the Court; and although in actual practice the advantage to the sheriff may be small in enabling him to determine for himself upon the validity of such a deed, still the anomaly would be got rid of, of requiring him to act in defiance of such a certificate without the means of knowledge whether it was good or bad. It is not, however, necessary to decide that question, nor whether the Court of Bankruptcy has power to cancel the registration of an invalid deed. I am strongly inclined to think that it has; but my judgment does not depend upon that suggestion, but upon the object which I conceive that the legislature had in view in the sections under consideration. No other question was made in the argument before us, and it was stated by Mr. Baylis that the declaration was drawn in this unusual form, setting out the facts specially, for the express purpose of raising the real question between the parties. It is therefore unnecessary to consider any other point which might arise on the pleadings, more especially as any amendment would have been permitted by the Court which might have been necessary in case any other point had been made. I am of opinion, therefore, with great diffidence seeing that my opinion differs from that of my Lord Chief Justice, that our judgment should be for the defendant.

CROMPTON, J. — The question argued before us in this case was, whether a sheriff was liable in an action for an escape for having discharged a debtor taken on a ca. sa. upon the production by him of a certificate under the 198th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, signed by the Registrar, and purporting that a deed under the 192nd section had been duly registered. I think that we cannot hold the sheriff liable, for obeying what I think are the directions of the act binding upon him. I think that the effect of the enactment is, that the certificate is to be the evidence of the execution of a valid deed upon which the sheriff is to act by discharging the party. The great hardship upon the sheriff, who cannot possibly know and has no means of ascertaining many matters connected with the deed, and who is called upon to act immediately upon the production of the document and receiving the copy, is obvious, and was pointed out on the argument, as it has been in several cases of the same kind; and though there are many cases in which the sheriff has been put in great jeopardy where he could not know the true state of facts upon which he was called to act, in many of which cases he has been relieved by statute, still the situation in which the sheriff would be placed is, as observed by the Court in several similar cases, a strong reason for a construction being put on the enactment which would prevent so great a hardship upon the sheriff.

The first branch of the 198th section of the act protects the debtor's person and property from process where "such" deed has been registered, and I think that this must be taken to mean a deed valid both as to the fact of execution by the three-fourths of the creditors and as to the provisions in the deed. But there follows at the end of the clause a provision that the Registrar's certificate of the registration of such deed shall be available for the debtor as a protection in bankruptcy. By the first branch of the 198th section, the execution by the three-fourths of the creditors of a valid deed prevents any process against either the body or goods being ever available to the creditor without the leave of the Court of Bankruptcy. The estate being in such case by the provisions of the 197th section subject to the jurisdiction in bankruptcy, this immunity from process against the goods or person would be final, subject to the leave of the Court of Bankruptcy, and would not be in the nature of an interim protection. According to this provision, however, the debtor would only be protected where the deed is valid as to its provisions and has been executed by three-fourths of the creditors, of neither of which matters can the sheriff in general have any knowledge. The legislature, however, at the end of the section makes a further provision, and proceeds to enact that the certificate of the Registrar, that such a deed so executed has been registered, shall have the effect of a protection in bankruptcy for the person of the debtor. Great difficulty arises from the mode of legislation by reference to the provisions of former acts of parliament, which frequently are framed so as not to fit or be adapted to the nature of the case, the subject of the new enactment. The protection in bankruptcy was to be available whilst the bankrupt was going to and returning from the court for examination, and for such further time as the Commissioner should indorse on the summons, and the sheriff would see at once from the summons and from the extended time for how long the bankrupt was protected. It was strictly an interim protection. The corresponding protection under the new act, however, shews no limit as to the time during which the debtor is to be protected, and no mode is pointed out by the statute by which that protection, on its face a lasting one, could be taken away from the debtor; and there certainly would be great difficulty, as suggested on the argument, if a Court of law held the deed bad when pleaded in bar, and an execution went against the person of the debtor, and the debtor were to produce the certificate as a statutory protection. It may be that the Court of Bankruptcy might have the power to interfere with the registration of the deed, and of ordering the cancellation of the document; for, though the Court of Bankruptcy would have no power of dealing with the estate in the case of an invalid deed, it might still have the power of cancelling the registration, the act of its officers,—in like manner as the Lord Chancellor had formerly the power of superseding a commission of bankruptcy,—or the protection might possibly be deemed to enure only whilst the proceedings under the arrangement were going on, in analogy to the bankruptcy protection. When the Court of Bankruptcy gives leave to execute process,—as in a recent case of a debtor not paying his composition,—the sheriff might be informed, either by notice or on the face of the process, that it was by order of the Court; and in every case it may be that a formal notification of the deed being bad or having been held bad might operate so as to compel him to proceed. However this may be, I think that the meaning of the act, and of the reference which embodies the former enactments as to the protection in bankruptcy, is, that the debtor shall be protected on a certain state of facts, and that the sheriff shall act on the certificate as the evidence of such facts. But it is said, that there is a great difficulty in the way of this construction, by reason of the decisions by which the Courts have held that the meaning of "such," in the second branch of the 198th section, is "a valid deed"; and that if not valid, the certificate is of no more value than the deed, and so that the debtor is not protected. Certainly, it has been held by the Courts, on motions for discharge, and, I believe, by all the Judges at chambers before whom applications for discharge have been brought, that the debtor has no right to be discharged if the deed be invalid; and the act stating that the certificate is to be available to the debtor, it is said that it can only be available to the sheriff if it be such a certificate as is available for the debtor. In the case of Thomas v. Hudson, however, the Court of Exchequer Chamber held the officer protected, although they assumed, for the purpose of the judgment, that the Commissioner of Bankruptcy had no power to discharge the debtor from the damages for the tort, to which, on that supposition, he clearly remained liable; and in other cases under the Bankruptcy Act the whole jurisdiction might be said to fail where there was no act of bankruptcy, just as in the case where the deed, the foundation of the quasi bankruptcy, turns out to be invalid. But for the decisions under the present act of parliament, it might have been doubted whether the certificate was not intended by the legislature to be a protection to the debtor even where the deed turned out to be invalid, they apparently thinking that such a protection as an interim protection in bankruptcy would be applicable to the new case of a deed which is to have the effect of creating a kind of private bankruptcy. The same construction might be given to the word "such" in both branches of the clause by construing the earlier part to mean, that after such deed (i. e. a valid deed) was registered, the person and property should be exempt from process, except by leave of the Court; and by construing the latter branch as saying that the certificate of "such" a deed being registered, that is, the certificate that a valid deed has been registered, was to be a protection to the person. The Courts, however, have thought, that where the deed is made out to be invalid, the debtor is not protected even to the extent of the limited protection of the latter branch; but they have not decided that the sheriff may not be excused for acting upon the document which the legislature points out as the evidence upon which he is bound to act, under severe penalties and heavy responsibility. In Ilderton v. Jewell the Common Pleas held that the bail could not set up a certificate of a bad deed as a defence against an action on their undertaking to render their principal, and that decision was confirmed in the Exchequer Chamber, though I think that the case was not much argued in the Exchequer Chamber upon this point. I should pay great respect to these decisions of the Courts and Judges on application to discharge prisoners; though being decisions on motions and not liable to review by a Court of Error, they are not, according to modern practice, binding to the same extent as decisions against which an appeal lies. It may be, both as relates to these decisions and to the decision of the Courts in the case of the recognizances of bail, that the Courts may have thought that the debtor by whose negligence or fraud a deed has been registered, not really executed by the required proportions of bond fide creditors, or by whom conditions so unreasonable as to render the deed invalid have been inserted, has no right to rely on it as a protection. It may have been thought a sufficient answer as against him to his prima facie case of the certificate of registration, that his deed, propounded by him, is invalid, whilst the sheriff may be protected by the certificate, on the evidence of which he seems compelled to act without the means of or the time for inquiry. I do not think that we are bound by any authority to hold that the officer of the Court, acting under the express direction of the act of parliament, is not excused. He acts under a document which, whether judicial or not in the strict sense of the word, is a document which is the act of the Court just as much as a writ which protects the sheriff. It is sealed with the seal of the Court and bears the signature of the Registrar, and this authentication seems intended as a notification to the sheriff, who would otherwise be placed in so much difficulty. Whether strictly judicial or not, the document is declared by the legislature to have the effect of a protection in bankruptcy which has been held judicial. I own that I am at present inclined to doubt whether the legislature did not intend the certificate to be a temporary protection, at least to the quasi bankrupt, as well as imperative upon the sheriff; but giving full effect to the decisions that the debtor is only to be discharged or protected if the deed be valid, still the act of parliament, if the deed turn out valid, clearly gives the debtor the protection, and renders the sheriff liable to the severe consequences of refusing to act upon the evidence of the certificate. He being on that supposition liable if the deed is valid, seems to me to be required to act upon the assumption that the certificate shews that a valid deed has been executed; and he is required to act immediately on the production of the certificate and receipt of the copy without having any opportunity of inquiry. If the statute says, "obey this document," and allows no time for inquiry, it seems very difficult to say that the sheriff is liable for obeying the directions of the legislature. My judgment proceeds on the ground that the legislature appears to me to have pointed out the document in question as the one on which the sheriff is to act, at all events until he has notice of the invalidity of the deed; and I think him excused by the legislature directing him not to persist in executing the process if such document be produced, just as he is where the plaintiff himself has directed him not to execute the process. I cannot construe the act of the legislature as imposing so monstrous a hardship upon the sheriff, as to direct him under severe penalties to act upon the production of the document, and yet to leave him liable in so acting as for a breach of duty, if it should turn out that circumstances of which he can have no knowledge have made invalid the deed on which the certificate is founded. The legislature throws upon the Registrar, as the officer of the Court, the responsibility of seeing that the requisite proportion of creditors have signed, and he has the affidavit before him of that fact, and he has also the deed before him from which he is to make in his book of registry a short statement of the nature and effect of the deed. The sheriff, being required to act merely on the production and having a copy of the certificate of the registration, has no means of testing its validity, either in point of fact or law.

The legislature would be putting him in a worse case than in the ordinary case of difficulty of a sheriff who can inquire, and whose duty it was in many cases at common law to inquire, into the validity of documents. Here the legislature in effect takes from him all opportunity of inquiry, and directs what is his duty on production and receipt of a copy of the certificate. It seems to me that the legislature have said that the document in question is to be evidence that "such" valid deed has been duly executed, upon which the sheriff is required to act; and that in effect he is prevented by the legislature from inquiring further, and is compelled to act at once upon such evidence, at all events, unless he has some knowledge or notification of the badness of the deed. I think, therefore, that we ought to hold that the sheriff in the case at bar was justified in discharging the debtor who produced the certificate of the Registrar in due form that such a deed had been executed, although the deed afterwards turned out to be invalid.

As the whole record is before us on the demurrer, and as it is not unlikely that this case may be carried to a Court of Error, I have thought it worth while to consider whether the defendant's case might be held deficient on the ground that it does not appear on the record that there is any answer to that part of the declaration which states that the sheriff made a false return, in stating in his return that there was a valid deed and that the debtor was not found in his bailiwick. Supposing the false return to be a substantive cause of action in itself, notwithstanding the breach of duty, the foundation of the charge being answered, and supposing that we could not construe the plea distributively, we ought, I think, under the circumstances, to make such an amendment as would divide the declaration, and give judgment as to the main part for the defendant, and leave the plaintiff to get his damages for the false return, which would seem prima facie at least to be merely nominal, if the defendant were protected for discharging the debtor. I think, however, that the case falls under the authority of Wylie v. Birch (4). The whole declaration really forms one ground of complaint, as explained by Alderson, B.

in Lewis v. Alcock (5), cited in Wylie v. Birch, where he says: "The falsehood of the return is the conclusion of law, if the facts stated in the inducement are true." And I think that a plea answering the inducement or foundation answers the whole action. The insertion of the untrue statement, that the deed was valid in the present case, seems no more fatal to the plea than was the allegation of the statement in the plea in Wylie v. Birch (4) that the goods remained in the sheriff's hands for want of buyers; and I do not see that there was any difficulty in making a good return by shewing the production of the certificate and giving a copy, supposing those facts amount to a defence; and at all events, Wylie v. Birch appears to me to shew that where the sheriff answers the supposed default in executing the process, the false return gives no right of action for nominal damages, and that the false immaterial statement does not vitiate the good part of the plea. It should be observed that this point was not taken on the argument, and, indeed, as the declaration was framed as stated by the plaintiff's counsel, in an unusual way for the purpose of raising upon the record the real question argued before us (it not being in the usual form for an escape, but proceeding to set out the expected defence and to answer it by anticipation, so as to make the real ground of the complaint as to the false return depend on the precedent matter), it would hardly have been fair to raise such a point for the purpose of obtaining nominal damages, and if it had been raised and could have been substantiated, we ought, I think, to have amended, as before suggested, in this respect as well as with regard to some other objections which might possibly be made to the plea in several views of the case. I think, therefore, that we should treat the question as it was argued before us, and that our judgment on this record should be for the defendant.

COCKBURN, C.J. — This is an action, brought against the defendant as undersheriff of Montgomeryshire, acting after the death of the sheriff, under the 3 Geo. 1. c. 15, for an escape and false return to a writ of ca. sa. issued against one W. Baird; the matter of the alleged false return being that the said W. Baird (who had been arrested on the writ and set at large) was by the effect of the 198th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, protected by a certificate given to Baird, under the 193rd section of that act, on the registration of a deed of composition entered into between him and certain of his creditors, and intended to take effect under the 192nd section. The deed in question is set forth on the record, and is admitted to be invalid as against a non-assenting creditor, by reason of its imposing unreasonable terms; and the question for our decision, on the demurrer to a plea of justification, is, whether a certificate given on the registration of such an invalid deed will be a justification to a sheriff in an action by the execution creditor for an escape and false return. I am of opinion that it will not.

It is now fully settled by a series of decisions that a composition-deed intended to take effect under the 192nd section, if it contains terms which are unequal or unreasonable, will not, though registered according to section 193, avail to bar an action against the debtor at the suit of a non-assenting creditor; the construction put by the Courts on that section by implication being, that it must be taken to have been intended by the legislature that terms which were equal and reasonable should alone be compulsorily binding on those who are not parties to such a deed. It being thus settled that a composition-deed containing unequal or unreasonable terms is not binding on a non-assenting creditor, as not fulfilling the requirements of the 192nd section, it follows that on such a deed a non-assenting creditor is not brought within the jurisdiction of the Court of Bankruptcy under the 197th section of the act, and is not, therefore, under the necessity of resorting to the administration of the debtor's estate under this process of quasi bankruptcy for the satisfaction of his claim. For the section in question not only expressly refers to a deed operative under the 192nd section by using the term "such deed," but the 197th section refers in terms to the creditors "who are parties to the deed, or who have assented thereto, or are bound thereby." As the section thus excludes those creditors who, not being parties to the deed, are not bound by it, which in the case of an invalid deed would be those who have neither executed nor assented to it, the section can have no application, and the Court of Bankruptcy can have no jurisdiction in the case of creditors so circumstanced. This being so with regard to the 197th section, it seems to follow as a necessary consequence that the 198th section can also have no application in the case of a creditor not bound by the deed. The effect of this section is to prohibit execution against the effects or person of the debtor by a creditor, except by the leave of the Court of Bankruptcy; with a further provision that a certificate of the filing and registration of the deed under the hand of the Chief Registrar and the seal of the Court shall be available to the debtor for all purposes as a protection in bankruptcy. But the section speaks of the deed as "such deed," which must be taken to mean such a deed as would be operative under the 192nd and 197th sections. "Such deed," says Erle, C.J. in Ilderton v. Jewell, "must mean a valid deed." It would be in the highest degree inconsistent to leave the creditor who is not bound by the deed, nor subject to the jurisdiction of the Court of Bankruptcy, at liberty to bring his action and recover judgment against the debtor, and then prevent him from reaping the fruit of his judgment by execution thereupon. It was urged, indeed, in the argument on the demurrer, that a creditor having obtained a judgment might resort to the Court of Bankruptcy for leave to issue execution. But this assumes that the Court of Bankruptcy has, in the case of an invalid deed, jurisdiction over a creditor not bound by the deed; the contrary of which position has been shewn. Such an application on the part of a creditor so circumstanced would, of course, be granted on the invalidity of the deed. But, as we have seen, the validity of the deed is, as regards the non-assenting creditor, the foundation of the Court's jurisdiction in respect of such creditor. How, then, under such circumstances, can such an order be necessary?

Some little difficulty is, perhaps, created by the provision that execution shall not issue "without leave of the Court." For as a creditor bound by the deed would also be bound by the provisions of the 197th section, and would therefore be barred from bringing an action against the debtor, and would be compelled to resort to the Court of Bankruptcy to receive his share of the estate, it may be urged that this provision could only apply to a creditor who, by reason of not being bound by the deed, was entitled to proceed against the debtor. But, although at first sight there would appear to be some inconsistency between the enactment of the 197th section, which drives the creditor under a valid deed to his remedy in bankruptcy, and the construing the power, given to the Court by the 198th section, of enabling the creditor to issue execution in an action, as applicable to the case of a valid deed, yet, as it seems to me, the better view, and the one which will best consist with the construction to be put on the other sections of the act, is, that the intention and effect of this provision is to empower the Court of Bankruptcy, under very special circumstances, to enable even a creditor bound by a valid deed to proceed to execution against the debtor. Thus, in the case of Ex parte Morrison, in re Clunne, the Lord Chancellor, on appeal in bankruptcy, allowed a creditor to take out execution where it appeared that the deed, though otherwise satisfying the requirements of the 192nd section, had been executed for the express purpose of defeating the creditor, who had already brought his action and recovered judgment. The provision is, therefore, as it seems to me, quite consistent with the position that, in the case of an invalid deed, the Court has no jurisdiction, and that, consequently, execution may be issued without reference to its authority.

For these reasons I consider it clear that, in the case of an invalid deed, execution may issue against the goods of the debtor, notwithstanding the 198th section. Indeed, in the course of the discussion, Mr. Mellish, who argued for the defendant, being pressed by the observations of the Court, felt constrained to concede the point as to execution against the goods, but endeavoured to distinguish as to execution against the person, relying upon the concluding part of the section, which gives to the debtor, on the production of the certificate, all the protection which an adjudication in bankruptcy would afford. It appears to me that no such distinction can be made in this respect. The prohibition to issue execution against the person occurs not only in the same section as that which prohibits execution against the goods, but also in the same sentence; and the same principle and the same reasoning apply equally to both. Nor can it be supposed that the legislature intended to distinguish between execution against the goods and execution against the person, and to give protection to the person of the debtor where, by reason of the invalidity of the deed, the whole matter was not brought within the operation of the Bankrupt Law, and the property of the debtor remained liable to be taken in execution under legal process. Even in the absence of authority I should be prepared to hold an execution might issue against the person in such a case. But the question has been three times before the Courts, and in each instance it was held that the person of the debtor was not privileged from arrest. In the case of Dewhurst v. Kershaw the Court of Exchequer refused to discharge a debtor who had received a certificate on the registration of an invalid deed. In Ilderton v. Jewell the Court of Common Pleas held, that a certificate, given under such circumstances, afforded no protection in an action against bail who had undertaken to render a debtor in the Lord Mayor's Court. Erle, C.J., in giving judgment, says, "A certificate given in respect of a void deed gives no protection. 'Such deed' means a valid deed. The certificate is as void as the deed itself." Again, in Leigh v. Pendlebury (6), the Court of Common Pleas held, that a debtor, who had received a certificate and had been taken in execution, was not entitled to be discharged out of custody. We must, therefore, take it as now settled by authority, which is binding upon us, that a certificate, given on the registration of an invalid deed, affords no protection to a debtor against execution against his person, any more than against his goods.

But it is said that, though a certificate given on the registering of an invalid deed will be inoperative to protect the debtor from arrest, it may, nevertheless, be available to the sheriff on a plea of justification in an action for an escape or for a false return. Such a position is, in my opinion, untenable. When once it is established that the 198th section affords no immunity from arrest where a certificate has been given on an invalid deed, but that, on the contrary, the judgment creditor is entitled to issue his execution, and that the certificate affords no protection to the debtor if the sheriff thinks proper to disregard it, it seems to me to follow, as a necessary consequence, that the sheriff is bound to execute the process. For the prohibition to the sheriff's officer to arrest the debtor, which is involved in the concluding passage of the 198th section, which extends to the debtor the protection which bankruptcy would have given, is obviously ancillary only to the immunity from process which is conferred by the earlier part of the enactment. And it appears to me to be a startling inconsistency to say, that the certificate, being void for its primary purpose, shall yet be valid for a subordinate one; and having been intended as a protection to the debtor against the sheriff in the execution of legal process, shall, while it wholly fails to protect the party for whose benefit it was designed, yet protect the sheriff, against whom it was intended to take effect. It seems to me a contradiction in terms, to say that the judgment creditor is entitled to have execution against the person of the debtor, the latter not being privileged from arrest, and at the same time to say that the sheriff can nevertheless justify the not executing the process against the debtor. It is the right of the suitor, who has obtained judgment and taken out execution, to have the process of the Court executed. If the sheriff fails herein, and proceedings are taken against him by the creditor, it seems to me that, in the absence of a statutory indemnity against such an action, he can only defend himself by shewing either that the execution of the writ was impossible, or that the debtor was privileged by law from arrest. Although it may be granted that the order or other act of a Court of competent jurisdiction affording protection to the debtor, although founded in error, will still justify the sheriff in not arresting or detaining the debtor, I am at a loss to see how an instrument which is void for the purpose of giving protection to the debtor, can justify the sheriff in liberating the debtor and returning that he was not liable to be arrested.

And here it may be not unimportant to observe, that the return made in this case is clearly untrue, inasmuch as the debtor was certainly not entitled to protection. And though it is true that the substantial cause of action in such a case is the non-execution of the process, and not the false return, yet it appears to me by no means an imperfect test of the legality of the proceeding of the sheriff in not executing the process that the return to the writ is untrue. Still more strikingly would this be so if no good return under the circumstances of the case could be made. Now, I am at a loss to see what return could have been made in this case which would have been good in law, inasmuch as the sheriff cannot say either that the debtor was entitled to protection, or that the sheriff was bound by the certificate.

No doubt, if the legislature, notwithstanding the inconsistencies which must result from such a provision, has enacted that the sheriff shall respect the certificate of registration without reference to its validity or invalidity, the existence and production of the certificate will be sufficient justification for not arresting or for discharging the debtor. But I should certainly expect to find express enactment to this effect, before I should give credit to the legislature for having intended to bring about such an anomalous state of things as that which I have referred to. But far from finding anything in the language of the 198th section which amounts to a direction to the sheriff to respect a certificate without reference to its validity, I cannot but think that, when that section is carefully examined, it becomes plain that a contrary construction must be put on it. The concluding passage of the section is obviously supplemental to the leading enactment which precedes it. First comes the provision that, on the registering and filing of a deed valid under the 192nd section, for such, according to judicial exposition, is the meaning of the term "such deed," the debtor shall have, except by leave of the Court, immunity from execution against his property or person : then follows immediately the provision that the certificate of the filing and registration of "such deed" shall be available to the debtor to all intents and purposes as a protection in bankruptcy. Now, it appears to me, that the words "such deed" in the latter part of the section must necessarily be read in the same sense in which they are to be understood in the former; and that, consequently, the protection in bankruptcy will only arise where the certificate has been given on a valid deed. That the latter part of the section must be taken as contingent on the first part coming into operation will, I think, become further apparent from the following consideration. By the first part of the enactment the Court of Bankruptcy has power to grant leave to issue execution notwithstanding the certificate. It cannot be doubted that in such case the sheriff would be bound to execute the writ, notwithstanding the production of the certificate. This shews that the certificate does not afford an absolute protection, but is conditional on the debtor being entitled to the protection of which the certificate is only the ostensible sign. It seems plain from the fact that both provisions of the section rest on the hypothesis of the same deed, as well as from the whole scheme of this legislation, that (as I have already observed incidentally) the protection in bankruptcy is only ancillary to the immunity from process, and, therefore, only attaches when this immunity accrues.

According to my view of the matter the section is to be read thus : if a valid deed be filed and registered, the debtor is to be privileged from arrest; and a certificate of the filing and registration of such a valid deed shall on its production entitle him to be discharged, or to recover 5*l.* a day against the officer of the sheriff for every day he is detained. According to the opposite construction the section is to have this effect, a valid deed, and a valid deed only, will privilege the debtor from arrest; but, though the debtor is liable to be arrested, a certificate which is inoperative to protect him, if the sheriff thinks proper to arrest him, will leave it at the option of the latter whether he will execute the process of the law or not. It seems to me, with the greatest deference for the opinion of those from whom I have the misfortune to differ, that this is a reductio ad absurdum which ought to be conclusive of the question.

The decisions to which our attention was called during the argument, on cases arising on the Bankrupt and Insolvent Acts, have, as it seems to me, no application to the present case; first, because the protection to the debtor there resulted from judicial acts of Courts of competent jurisdiction; secondly, because in those cases the debtor was clearly entitled to immunity from arrest, or there was an express enactment protecting the sheriff when acting in obedience to the order of the Court; all of which circumstances are wanting in the present instance. The case of Saffery v. Jones arose on the Insolvent Act, 7 Geo. 4. c. 57, the 81st section of which expressly indemnifies the sheriff for anything done in obedience to any order of the Court. The jurisdiction of the Court to make the order for the discharge of the debtor having been questioned, Lord Tenterden says, "Even if the Insolvent Court had no jurisdiction, the language of the clause is sufficiently strong to make the order of the Court a protection to the gaoler." Taunton, J. says, referring to the 81st section, "But for this section the gaoler was between two fires; if he did not discharge the prisoner pursuant to the order of the Insolvent Court, he would probably be liable to an action by him; if he did discharge him he might be liable to an action for an escape at the suit of the creditor. This section was framed to meet that difficulty." In Norton v. Walker, which turned on the provision of the Bankrupt Act, 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, as to the discharge of a bankrupt arrested on a writ of ca. sa., the Court of Exchequer held that the words of the section, "if such bankrupt shall be arrested, he shall on producing his summons be immediately discharged," were to be taken to mean "the party so adjudged bankrupt"; and that consequently it was not necessary for the sheriff, in an action against him for an escape, to shew the validity of the bankruptcy. It was enough that the party had been adjudged a bankrupt to entitle him to protection. In Thomas v. Hudson, which was an action against the keeper of the Queen's Prison for an escape, the Court of Exchequer held that the defendant, who, in obedience to an order of a Commissioner in Bankruptcy acting under the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116. and 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, had discharged a prisoner in custody on an execution in an action of tort, though the jurisdiction of the Commissioner did not extend to discharging an insolvent in custody in such an action, was justified in obeying the order, on the ground that the order was "that of a Judge acting in a matter over which he had jurisdiction." Alderson, B., in delivering the judgment of the Court, goes into an elaborate argument to shew that, to use his words, the Commissioner is "exercising functions strictly judicial," and that "his judgment is conclusive." This judgment was afterwards affirmed in the Exchequer Chamber, the Court adopting the reasons given for it in the Court below. There can be no doubt that the adjudication of bankruptcy, upon which the summons which gives protection issues, taking place, as it does, after proof of the petitioning creditor's debt, the trading, and the act of bankruptcy, is a judicial act; as is necessarily the giving of the certificate of conformity whereby the bankrupt obtains his final release. Equally clear is it that the act of an Insolvent Commissioner in adjudging, after hearing all parties concerned, that an insolvent prisoner should be discharged, was a judicial proceeding; and the reasoning of Alderson, B., in Thomas v. Hudson, shews that the order of a Commissioner in Bankruptcy acting under the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, was also an exercise of judicial authority. Can the same be said of the act of the Chief Registrar in granting the certificate of registration under the 198th section of the present act? I think not. The Chief Registrar is bound to register any deed brought to him for registration within the prescribed time, which purports to be a deed within the 192nd section, if accompanied by such an affidavit as the section requires. There is nothing which makes it incumbent on him to ascertain whether the deed is one which will be binding on all the creditors; he is not empowered to make any order for the protection of the bankrupt; he is simply to certify that the deed has been filed and registered. It seems to me that this is much more in the nature of a ministerial than of a judicial proceeding. And what to my mind materially confirms this view is, that the proceeding being altogether an ex parte one, no power is given either to the Registrar or the Court to withdraw or annul the certificate at the instance of a non-assenting creditor, if the deed should be shewn to be invalid. Under the Bankrupt Act, the adjudication of bankruptcy might be annulled, or the interim protection withdrawn on the refusal of the final certificate. Under the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116. the interim order for protection made in the first instance fell to the ground, if the Commissioner on the hearing of the case on the merits refused to make the final order. Under the Insolvent Act, 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, no discharge could be made till all the requirements of the act had been fulfilled and all parties concerned had been fully heard. But here, while the proceeding is ex parte, there is no authority to annul the certificate, if it has been improvidently granted upon a deed which turns out to be void; and the result of holding that the granting of such a certificate is a judicial act, and that the certificate will justify the sheriff in not arresting, will be that, while the Courts hold that the judgment creditor is entitled to his execution against the debtor, and that the latter is not privileged from arrest, the sheriff, who is in the difficulty before pointed out, will never fail to give effect to the certificate unless indemnified by the creditor, whereby a burden will be cast on the creditor, which he may not always be able to satisfy, and to which, unless imposed on him by the authority of the Court, he ought not to be subject.

I cannot think that the legislature can have intended to give to an ex parte proceeding like the present, which it provides no means of opposing or reviewing, the character and effect of a judicial act. But, however this may be, the main and the essential difference between the cases referred to and the present is, that in the former the party who had been discharged by the sheriff's officer or the gaoler was clearly entitled to his discharge; and if, instead of having been set at liberty by those officers, he had applied to the Court out of which the execution issued to be discharged, the Court must have ordered him to be released from custody. The reasoning of Alderson, B. in Thomas v. Hudson is directed to shew that, under the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, the order of the Commissioners in Bankruptcy was conclusive against all the world. Nor, as it seems to me, can it be doubted that the orders of the Court, under the Bankrupt and Insolvent Acts, in granting either provisional or final protection, are, as regards the right of the bankrupt or insolvent to protection from arrest, conclusive and binding upon every one, and entitled to have effect given to them by any Court upon whose process a person who has obtained such protection may be in custody. But, under the sections of the recent Bankrupt Act now under consideration, the debtor who has obtained a certificate is not, as we have seen, entitled to protection, unless the deed, on the registration of which it is granted, is a valid one. Here, if the debtor had been before the Court on an application for his discharge, the application would have been refused. The case is, therefore, clearly distinguishable from those which arose on the former acts.

It is true that if a defendant is held liable, under such circumstances as the present, a sheriff will be placed in a position of exceeding hardship. If a party taken in execution produces a certificate, the sheriff's officer has no means of knowing whether the deed on which the certificate has been granted was a valid deed or not. If he discharges the debtor, and the certificate proves void, the sheriff becomes responsible to the execution creditor; if the debtor is detained, and the certificate turns out to be good, the officer becomes liable, under the combined operation of the 198th section of the recent act and the 113th section of the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, to forfeit 5*l.* a day to the party so detained. But it is not for us, on this account, to interfere with that which, ex debito justitiæ, is the clear right of the execution creditor, namely, to have his writ executed, or to have redress against the minister of the law, whose duty it is to execute it, and who fails in that duty. We must leave it to the legislature, which has brought the sheriff into this dilemma, to extricate him from it. This is not the first time sheriffs have been placed in a position of difficulty from having to execute writs at their peril. Prior to the Interpleader Act, 1 & 2 Will. 4. c. 58, sheriffs were often embarrassed where property which they were directed to take in execution was claimed by a third party. But the sheriff had to act at his peril. If, from uncertainty as to whether the goods belonged to the execution debtor or not, he omitted to seize and returned nulla bona, and the goods turned out to be the goods of the debtor, he was liable in an action by the creditor. It is true the Court resorted to certain contrivances to protect the sheriff, such as delaying the proceedings of the creditor, so as to drive him, where it was possible, to contest the question of property with the opposing claimant before the sheriff should be compelled to act; but if the sheriff took upon himself to act without the interposition of the Court, and made a return, he was obliged to stand or fall by the return so made. If the return proved untrue in law or fact, the execution creditor could not be barred of his right of action against the sheriff. It was a sense of the hardship of the position in which the sheriff was thus placed that led to the provision of the Interpleader Act in favour of sheriffs. In like manner, a sheriff might be embarrassed by a claim of privilege from arrest. In some cases, he might make himself liable to serious consequences by making the arrest. Out of regard to this difficulty, the Court would sometimes insist on an indemnity being given, and would delay the return till this had been done—see Delvalle v. Plomer (6). If, however, the sheriff chose to allow the privilege, he might do so, and return accordingly; but he did so at his peril, for if the party was not, in fact, privileged, the sheriff was liable in an action for a false return.

It is not now necessary to consider how far, if this had been an application for the exercise of our summary jurisdiction, either to assist the creditor or to protect the sheriff, we might have taken into consideration the difficulty in which the latter is placed. As I have before observed, the question on this demurrer is, whether the sheriff was justified in taking upon himself to discharge the debtor, and returning that he was protected by the certificate from arrest. To this, for the reasons I have stated, there can, in my judgment, be but one answer; unless, indeed, we were prepared to overrule the cases of Dewhurst v. Kershaw, Ilderton v. Jewell and Leigh v. Pendlebury, which, I think, it is not competent to us to do. And as against the hardship of the position in which a sheriff is thus placed must, I think, be set the position of the creditor who, being entitled to execution against the debtor, will have that which, as the law stands, is his undoubted right, frustrated by the refusal of the sheriff to execute the writ. It may perhaps be doubted whether the difficulty which has arisen from the presence of unequal or unreasonable terms in composition-deeds had presented itself to the mind of those by whom the recent Bankruptcy Act was framed. Possibly, the decisions of the Courts, whereby the implied condition that the terms of such a deed shall be equal and reasonable has been superadded to the express requirements of the act, may have been an encroachment on the province of the legislature. The effect of these decisions, and of the consequent ones as to execution issuing against the debtor, have tended to unhinge the machinery of this system of what may be called quasi bankruptcy. But we are bound by these decisions; and it appears to me that it flows from them as an inevitable consequence that, the debtor being disentitled to protection, the sheriff is bound to execute the writ at his peril, and is liable in an action for not doing so.

In my opinion, therefore, our judgment should be for the plaintiff.

The majority of the Court being of a contrary opinion,—

Judgment for the defendant.

[IN THE EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.]

(Appeal from the Court of Queen's Bench.)

1865. } GARNETT AND MOSELEY GOLD
Feb. 2. } MINING COMPANY v. SUTTON.*

Limited Liability Act, 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 47).—Old Company newly Registered as Limited—Remedy for Company's old Debts—Liquidators—Winding-up.

If a joint-stock company, registered under the statute 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, while it is in debt obtains registration as a company with limited liability under the statute 19 & 20 Vict. c. 47, and proceedings are afterwards taken to wind it up, the liquidators appointed under the last-mentioned act may make a call upon the old shareholders for a sum per share exceeding the amount of the sum remaining unpaid on such share, and for any sums per share that may be requisite to discharge the old debts.

This was an appeal, by the defendant, against the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench.

The defendant was a holder of 2,000 shares of 1*l.* each in a company called the Garnett and Moseley Gold Mining Company of America, which had been completely registered as a joint-stock company under the statute 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. The defendant had paid 1,500*l.* in respect of those shares. Subsequently the company was registered as a company with limited liability, under the statute 19 & 20 Vict. c. 47. At the time of such registration the company was largely in debt.

The company afterwards failing, proceedings were taken to wind it up. Liquidators were appointed under the last-mentioned act, and they made a call of 1*l.* per share on the defendant among other shareholders. This call was requisite to raise the sum necessary to discharge the debts due from the company before its registration as a limited company. All the present shareholders had been shareholders in the old company.

The defendant refused to pay the call.

Hall, for the appellant, the defendant (Feb. 1).—Though this company was registered originally under the statute 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, before the Limited Liability Act (the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 47.) passed, and the defendant was indebted for his shares before that act, yet, after the company had been registered under the Limited Liability Act with a limited liability, the liquidators appointed under that act had no power to make a call on any shareholder for any sum greater than the sum, at the time of the winding-up of the company, remaining unpaid by the shareholder in respect of his shares. It is clear that such would be the limit of the liquidators' authority, if this company had been a new company for the first time registered under the Limited Liability Act. Section 116. of the act reserves the rights of creditors of the old company against the company and its shareholders; but by the express terms of section 113, all the provisions of the Limited Liability Act are to apply to an old company newly registered, as much as to a new company registered for the first time under it, and an old company newly registered is placed on the same footing as a new company, in all respects except one, viz., that by section 116, the rights of old creditors to proceed against the company and its shareholders are reserved. This is provided plainly with the view of preventing any injustice being done to individual creditors. But that section gives no new rights to creditors. It does not apply to the case of new creditors, nor does it give the old creditors a new remedy. In fact, the reservation in section 116. is much against the supposition that the liquidators have a right to make unlimited calls in the case of such a company as the present, for if the liquidators had such power, it would not be necessary that the old rights of the creditors should be retained. Section 59. is a plain enactment that the winding-up powers of the act are to apply to old registered companies; and section 61. limits the powers of the liquidators under sections 84. and 104. to make calls on the shareholders to the amount yet remaining unpaid on their shares. Ex parte Stevenson (1), which will be cited as an authority in support of the contention on the other side, is a decision of Turner, L.J., only; Knight Bruce, L.J., expressing a doubt as to the correctness of Turner, L.J.'s opinion. That decision proceeded on a misconception of the case of The Plumstead Water Company (2), and under a misapprehension of the terms of section 113. of the Limited Liability Act.

After the argument for the appellant the Court rose. On the following morning,

Garth (Bovill with him) was prepared to argue for the respondents, the plaintiffs, but he was stopped by the Court, and the following judgment was delivered by—

ERLE, C.J.—The question for the Court is, whether the defendant is liable to certain calls made by the liquidators in respect of the company being wound up. The company existed as an unlimited company under the Joint-Stock Companies Act, prior to the act of 1856, and afterwards became registered as a limited company, and became thereby a new corporation under the Joint-Stock Companies Act, 1856. The defendant objects to pay calls made by the liquidators of 1*l.* per share, which is the full value of the share, because he has already paid 15*s.* per share, and is therefore, if it is a limited company, only liable to 5*s.* per share more. Section 61. of the statute of 1856 says, that "if the company be limited, no contribution shall be required from any shareholder exceeding the amount, if any, unpaid on the shares held by him." 5*s.* per share is unpaid, and therefore if this is to be taken absolutely as a limited company, the call of 1*l.* is too much and cannot be sustained. But before the registration under the statute of 1856, the company, of which the defendant was a member (and all the shareholders were in the same position), had been a joint-stock company, and had incurred debts, which are still existing, and which require a call of 1*l.* per share to liquidate them. The question is, whether the liability of the defendant, by reason of his having been a shareholder in the unlimited company continues, notwithstanding that the unlimited company became a limited company. We are of opinion that the statute of 1856 has saved that liability. Now, the statute of 1856, section 107, repeals all the statutes creating joint-stock companies, and would repeal liabilities in respect of being a member of those joint-stock companies, were it not that, by section 109. of the same statute, which is the statute under which the defendant claims, it is enacted, that "no repeal hereby enacted shall affect any right acquired or liability incurred under any such acts before such repeal came into operation." Therefore there is an express saving of the liability under the former acts. It would be a huge injustice if a joint-stock company under the earlier acts, becoming registered as a limited company under the act of 1856, could get rid of their liabilities and debts. They have the power of becoming registered as a limited company and being incorporated, and they must do that which the law requires of them, namely, pay their debts under the former statutes. Then section 113, which gives the registration to a limited company, says, that an old company when registered under the act as a limited company shall become a limited company, and shall be incorporated, and that "all the provisions of this act shall apply to such company, in the same manner in all respects as if it had been originally incorporated under this act." Those words, had they not been qualified, would have had the effect of clearing off all the debts; but they are followed immediately by the clause—"subject nevertheless to the reservations hereinafter contained with respect to the existing rights of creditors and other persons." It is therefore an incorporated company from the date of the registration, subject to its liabilities under its already existing debts. Then comes section 116: "The registration of any existing company under this act, shall not nor shall any act of the company subsequent to such registration, prejudice any right which previously to such registration has, or which would, if no such registration had taken place, have accrued to any creditor or other person against the company in its corporate capacity, or against any person then being or having been a member of such company, but every such creditor or other person shall be entitled to all such remedies against the company in its corporate capacity, and against every person then being or having been a member of such company, as he would have been entitled to in case such registration had not taken place." The intention of the legislature is perfectly clear to prevent what I call the great injustice of the company's clearing off its debts by merely taking out a certificate of registration as a limited company. It must pay its debts before it can have the benefit of the registration. We are of opinion that the effect of this clause is to make this a limited company quoad the liabilities incurred while they had a certificate of registration as a limited company, and to leave it an unlimited company quoad the liabilities existing prior to the time it took out such a certificate. Therefore section 61, which limits the right of the liquidators to make a call for the amount remaining unpaid on the shares in the limited company, does not apply to the defendant as a shareholder in the unlimited company, which we consider him to be in respect to the debts of the unlimited company incurred prior to the registration. The judgment, therefore, will be affirmed. The judgment of the Lords Justices, or one of them, in Ex parte Stevenson (1), is in accordance with the view which we have enunciated.

The delivery of grounds of appeal, against an order of removal, with the notice of appeal, is as valid for all purposes as a delivery of them fourteen days at least before the Sessions begin.

The appellants have not, by the statute 11 & 12 Vict. c. 31. s. 9, twenty-one days, plus the fourteen days after the delivery of the depositions, for giving notice of appeal absolutely, so as to entitle them as of right to have the appeal entered and respited, if after those days have expired there does not remain enough time before the Sessions to deliver an effective notice of appeal according to the practice of the Sessions; and the Sessions may, in their discretion, refuse to respite if they deem that the appellants have been guilty of unreasonable delay in giving their notice of appeal.

Though the time for giving notice of appeal must be calculated with reference to the first day of the Sessions, yet when for practical convenience the county is divided into distinct divisions, and a distinct Court is held in each division, by adjournment from one to the other, and the rules of practice made by the Court in each division assume that the day when the Court for that division begins its sittings is the first day of the Sessions, it is sufficient if the grounds of appeal are delivered fourteen clear days before the first day of the sitting of the Court for the division in which the appeal is according to the practice to be tried.

An attorney having been struck off the roll in Easter Term 1859, for misappropriating to his own use money received from a client for a particular purpose, the Court, in Hilary Term 1865, allowed his name to be restored to the roll, on affidavits of numerous attornies to his good character and conduct in the interval.

This was an application on behalf of Richard John Saltren Robins, late an attorney of Plymouth, to be restored to the roll of attornies. In the year 1857, having received the sum of 18*l.* from Mrs. Smale, a client, for the purpose of paying succession duty, he appropriated it to his own use, and in Easter Term 1859 he was struck off the roll of attornies for this misconduct.

He applied to be restored in Trinity Term 1860, but unsuccessfully; and again in Hilary Term 1864; but on the last occasion the Court intimated that, if after the lapse of another year the applicant was able to produce vouchers of his good conduct, they would be inclined to re-admit him.

Sir R. P. Collier (Solicitor General) moved accordingly, on affidavits shewing the above facts, and that the applicant had repaid the money misappropriated to the representatives of Mrs. Smale, deceased; that he had been employed as an attorney's clerk since he had been struck off the roll; and on affidavits of the gentlemen in whose employ he had been, and of other attornies to the number altogether of fifteen, vouching for his past good conduct; and, in addition, a memorial, signed by thirty-eight attornies of Plymouth and its neighbourhood, recommending him to the merciful consideration of the Court.

No opposition being offered on the part of the Law Society, the Court (1) directed that the applicant should be re-admitted.

Attorney and Solicitor, Re-admission of.

An attorney having been struck off the roll, in order to be called to the bar, was afterwards disbarred for professional misconduct; the decision of the Benchers being affirmed, on appeal, by the fifteen Judges. After the lapse of twenty years an application was made on his behalf to be re-admitted an attorney; but the Court refused the application, on the ground that there were no affidavits of professional persons and others as to his good conduct and character in the interval.

This was an application on behalf of Henry Hugh Pyke to be restored to the roll of attornies.

(2) See the next case.

R

In 1836 Mr. Pyke, having been a practising attorney for about six years, was struck off the roll at his own request, with a view to being called to the bar. Having been called to the bar by the Society of Gray's Inn in 1838, in October 1843 he was summoned before the Benchers to answer the charge, "that after he was called to the bar, he participated, by previous agreement, in the profits of an attorney"; and also the additional charge "that he had acted both as attorney and counsel in or about the year 1840 in getting up and conducting an indictment against one William Thompson, at the Middlesex Sessions, for a poisonous nuisance which affected not only his (Pyke's) health, but also his freehold estate, as well as that of his neighbours in the place in which he then resided."

After hearing his defence, the Benchers disbarred him; and on appeal to the fifteen Judges, after two days' hearing, their decision was affirmed.

In November 1845 Mr. Pyke applied to this Court to be restored to the roll of attorneys, but the application was refused (1).

Since he had been disbarred, Mr. Pyke had been engaged in assisting his father in conducting his business of a law and general agent, and since his father's death in carrying on such agency on his own account; and he had kept up his professional knowledge by reading the law reports and other law books.

Stammers, in support of the application, contended, that as the offences of which the applicant had been found guilty were simply offences against the conventional regulations of the Bar, the fact of his having been disbarred ought not to affect him in his character of attorney, as he had committed no offence nor any malversation in that character; and that even if it were to be considered that he had violated the rules of the profession in general, he had suffered by his long exclusion from the profession sufficient punishment to vindicate the dignity and character of the profession. He cited Anonymous (2), where a solicitor who had been struck off the roll for misconduct, was restored after ten years, during which he had maintained an irreproachable character, the application being supported by a memorial signed by a very large number of solicitors. In that case the counsel in support of the motion cited In re Smith, before Lord St. Leonards, in which Mr. Smith's name, after having been struck off the roll for some irregularity in practice as Master Extraordinary, was ordered to be restored, but with a proviso that he should be suspended from practising for six months. They also referred to The King v. Greenwood (3), where an attorney about two years previously had been struck off the roll for malpractice, and was upon petition reinstated; the Court declaring that the striking off the roll was not to be understood as a perpetual disability, but was sometimes only meant as a punishment, and might be considered in the light of a suspension only if the Court saw cause. The Master of the Rolls said, "though he was very properly struck off, yet considering the great length of time that has elapsed, and the great suffering that he has endured, considering the testimonials to his character, and that the Law Institution does not oppose, he had determined to restore him to the roll." He also cited In re Robins (4) and Ex parte Calland (5); also Dugdale's Origines Juridicales, p. 311, cap. 70: "Orders relating to all the Innes of Court. Orders made and agreed upon to be observed and kept in all the four Houses of Court xxii Junii A.D. MDLVII. 3 & 4 Ph. & M. . . . 2. That none attorney shall be admitted into any of the Houses. And that in all Admissions, from henceforth this condition shall be implied; that if he, that shall be admitted, practise any Attorneyship, that then ipso facto to be dismissed; and to have liberty to repair to the Inn of Chancery from whence he came, or to any other, if he were of none before." — This is all, in effect, that Mr. Pyke now asks to be allowed to do.

Bovill (with him Garth), on behalf of the Incorporated Law Society, submitted that Mr. Pyke was in exactly the same position as he was when his application was refused in 1845.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—Except that he has undergone twenty years' exclusion.]

Bovill then intimated, that a transcript of the shorthand-writer's note, verified by affidavit, of Lord Chief Justice Denman's judgment when the case was before the Court in 1845 (which was rather fuller than the report in 1 New Practice Cases, 330) being before the Court, the Law Society wished to leave the matter entirely in the hands of the Court.

COCKBURN, C.J.—We think that enough has not been done to entitle Mr. Pyke on the present occasion to the order for his re-admission, which he seeks at our hands, because he has not produced that evidence which has been required on all other similar occasions, of good conduct from the time when he was unfortunately excluded from the legal profession up to the present moment. We must take it that the sentence of the Benchers of Gray's Inn disbarring Mr. Pyke, confirmed as it afterwards was by the decision of the Judges, was perfectly right; and that the conduct with which Mr. Pyke was charged, and of which he was found guilty, was such as to render him unfit for the profession of the bar, of which he was then a member; and I think there is nothing which we should more anxiously uphold than that the same honour and the same integrity which are essential to the character of a barrister are also essential to the character and position of an attorney; and therefore I quite feel that an individual who is unfit to fill the position of a member of the bar, from dishonest or dishonourable conduct, ought certainly not to be admitted into the other branch of the profession. Still, however, I cannot but feel that, both on principle and precedent, sentences of exclusion, either from the one or the other branch of the profession, need not, because, looking at the terms in which they are pronounced, they are of a perpetual character, be considered, therefore, under every state of circumstances, to be inexorably an exclusion for all time; and when we find that for a breach of professional conduct a gentleman has been excluded, and has suffered twenty years' exclusion, if we were perfectly satisfied that that sentence, however right it was when it was pronounced, had had the salutary effect of awakening him to a higher sense of honour and of principle, and that he could shew us that, having suffered the humiliation, and all the serious consequences as affecting his interests in life, which such a sentence must necessarily carry with it, he had been awakened to a higher sense of honour and principle,—I do not think we should have been inexorable to an application of this kind. I think we ought to look at the case as though Mr. Pyke had never been on the roll of attorneys at all, and had no occasion to come to this Court to have his name removed from the roll, in order to be admitted as a barrister. Suppose Mr. Pyke had been simply a member of the bar, and was disbarred, and after the lapse of twenty years had articulated himself to an attorney, and had served his articles, and he had proposed himself for examination and admission, would it have been an insuperable bar to his admission as an attorney that twenty years before he had been removed from the position and status of a member of the bar? I think that would depend upon how far the examiners in the first instance, or the Court if applied to, felt that in the interval the conduct of the individual had been so irreproachable as to lead to the conclusion that, notwithstanding the delinquency in early life, he might be safely intrusted with the interests of the clients who might commit their affairs to him, and he might be admitted to an honourable profession without that profession suffering any degradation by his being so admitted. On applications to strike an attorney off the roll, or to re-admit an attorney under peculiar circumstances, we ought to bear in mind that it is not with regard to the individual himself, or the punishment that he may have deservedly brought on himself, that the circumstances are to be inquired into; we have a duty to perform to the suitors of the Court, and not only to the suitors of the Court, but to the profession of the law, by taking care that those permitted to practise in it are persons on whose integrity and honour reliance can be placed. Nevertheless, I do not think that rule should be so inexorable as that after a man has undergone a long period of exclusion and punishment and suffering that that carries with it, if we are satisfied that his conduct has been such in the mean time as to insure confidence in his character, we might not either admit him in the first instance or re-admit him. I think, therefore, if Mr. Pyke can satisfy us, whatever the business has been he has been carrying on—I understand it to have been that of a law agent, either assisting his father or as principal—that his conduct and character have been unimpeached, and are unimpeachable, by evidence of trustworthy persons, especially members of the profession, we should be disposed to listen to this application; but as it stands now, we have simply the fact that Mr. Pyke was disbarred as being unworthy to remain a member of the profession, and so long as that stands, without anything more to satisfy us that Mr. Pyke is a person that ought to be admitted to the roll of attorneys, we cannot give effect to the application that has been brought before us, certainly with great ability, and with the greatest propriety, by Mr. Stammers. The application may be renewed if Mr. Pyke can furnish us with such evidence as I have referred to; but the want of it is a difficulty, and until that difficulty is removed we cannot accede to the application.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. On the fact of a gentleman being disbarred, two things are to be considered on his application to be admitted to practice as an attorney: one is, whether he has suffered sufficient punishment,—twenty years' exclusion may be sufficient punishment; but the other is his fitness to be trusted with the office: and the fact of his being disbarred raises a presumption against his fitness; and until he shews, not that no charge has been made against him, but, affirmatively, that during the interval his conduct has been such as to rebut the presumption against him, we cannot admit him.

MELLOR, J.—I quite agree with the observations of the Lord Chief Justice, and concur in all his reasons.

Application refused (6).

Error—Interpleader—Ship, Mortgage of—Freight.

S. and F., owners of a ship, mortgaged her to the plaintiff, and also assigned to him all the freight to be earned by the ship. S. and F. retained possession of the ship, and sent her to Cuba, expecting to find there a return cargo; but none was ready. The captain of the vessel, therefore, determined to buy for his owners a return cargo for an English port, and he obtained a cargo of wood from T. & Co., who supplied it to him, and took a bill of lading for the wood from the captain, who, by the bill of lading, bound himself "to deliver it in the like good order in the said port, or in such other my manifest may appoint, to order —, who, on faithful delivery being shewn, shall pay me — for freight and conveyance." A black line was drawn through the space in the bill of lading usually filled up with the amount of the freight. T. & Co. sent to M. & Co., of Havannah, the bill of lading, and the invoice of the goods, stating them to be "shipped by order of M. & Co., of Havannah, and for account of risk of whom it may concern." M. & Co. paid T. & Co. for the goods, and drew bills for the price on an English merchant, who refused to accept them. The defendant thereupon accepted the bills for the honour of the drawer, and paid them when due. He also received the bills of lading indorsed in blank by T. & Co. S. & F. became bankrupt. The plaintiff took possession of the ship on its arrival in England and claimed freight for the cargo. The defendant sold the cargo, and paid the freight, under protest, to the dock company, with whom the cargo had been deposited. On an interpleader issue whether the plaintiff was entitled to claim freight,—Held, that he was so entitled, as the goods remained the property of T. & Co. under the bill of lading.

Error will lie on a special case stated in proceedings on an interpleader issue.

Error was brought by the defendant, on the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in favour of the plaintiff on a SPECIAL CASE.

The case is set out at great length in the report below (1); but the following summary will suffice to explain the arguments and judgment.

Messrs. Skeene & Freeman, the owners of a vessel called the Shakespeare, had mortgaged her to the plaintiff, and had assigned to him all the freight to be earned by the ship. Messrs. Skeene & Freeman, retaining possession of the ship, sent her afterwards to Manzanilla, in Cuba, having previously arranged with some merchants there to supply a return cargo of wood for the vessel. The ship was greatly delayed getting to Cuba, and when she arrived the captain found that there was no return cargo ready for him, that which had been prepared for him having, in consequence of the delay, been otherwise disposed of. He then tried to charter the ship, but failed. The captain thereupon determined to purchase a cargo of wood, and applied to Messrs. Torres & Co., at Manzanilla, for the purpose.

On the 9th of June 1858 Messrs. Torres & Co., writing to Messrs. Morrison & Co., of Havannah, stated that they had agreed to give the captain a large quantity of mahogany, cedar and lancewood spars, which was specified that they might serve him as ballast to proceed to England. They added, "If this bargain be ratified we believe that the owners may be content." "When we despatch the Shakespeare we shall send your invoice and bill of lading of our shipment and disbursement, drawing on you for the amount."

On the 13th of June Messrs. Torres & Co. wrote again to Messrs. Morrison & Co. that the captain had succeeded "in contracting with Messrs Ramirez & Co. for one part of mahogany and three parts of cedar, in such manner that with this wood and that which we have sold him he will have almost a complete cargo for account of the vessel, if not conformably with the desires of the owners, at least with the greatest advantages which could be hoped for in the present circumstances. We have agreed to pay Messrs. Ramirez & Co. the amount of the wood which the captain has bought of them, and for its account, as well as ours, and our disbursements, we shall draw upon you when we send you the bills of lading and invoice."

Messrs. Morrison & Co. promised to honour the drafts. The cargo mentioned was shipped on board the Shakespeare.

A bill of lading, dated the 17th of June 1858, was given by the captain, stating that he had received on board the vessel then ready to sail for Falmouth from Messrs. Torres & Co. certain mahogany and cedar; and it proceeded, "which I acknowledge to have been delivered to me to my entire satisfaction, and bind myself on my arrival in safety with my said vessel to deliver in the like good order in the said port, or in such other my manifest may appoint, to order —, who, on faithful delivery thereof being shewn, shall pay me — for freight and conveyance."

The blank space in the bill of lading, in which usually would be stated the amount of the freight, was filled up by a black line being drawn along it. Messrs. Torres & Co. sent to Messrs. Morrison the bill of lading, with an invoice which stated that they had shipped the effects on board the Shakespeare "by order of Messrs. Morrison & Co., and for account of risk of whom it may concern."

Messrs. Morrison & Co. paid Messrs. Torres & Co. the amount of the invoice price. Messrs. Morrison & Co. drew for the price on some English merchants, who refused to accept the bills. The bills, however, were accepted by the defendant for the honour of the drawers, and ultimately paid by him.

The bill of lading was accordingly handed to the defendant indorsed by Messrs. Torres & Co. in blank.

Messrs. Skeene & Freeman stopped payment on the 28th of June 1858.

In September 1858, when the Shakespeare reached Gravesend, the plaintiff took possession of the vessel and cargo under his mortgage. The defendant when the vessel arrived in dock claimed the cargo under the bill of lading. The plaintiff refused to allow the defendant to have the cargo, except on payment of freight. The defendant protested against his liability to freight, but ultimately paid it under protest to the dock company, with whom the cargo had been deposited. The cargo was never offered to the assignees of Messrs. Skeene & Freeman. The defendant afterwards sued the dock company to recover back the amount so paid for freight, and the dock company having interpleaded, it was by an interpleader order directed that the plaintiff should be the plaintiff, and the defendant the defendant, in an issue to try whether any and what freight was payable for the goods; whether the plaintiff was entitled to any freight legally and equitably as against the defendant, and whether the captain was entitled to any freight as against the defendant.

The Court below having given judgment for the plaintiff, error was brought. On the case coming on for argument

Montagu Smith (Matthew with him), for the plaintiff below, the defendant in error, took a preliminary objection, that error could not be brought on a special case, stated on an interpleader issue; that the Interpleader Act, 1 & 2 Will. 4. c. 58, intended that the judgment of the Court in which the issue was tried should be final. He relied on the cases of King v. Simmonds (2), Snook v. Mattock (3) and Thorpe v. Plowden (4) to shew that error did not lie on a judgment on a feigned issue, under the Interpleader Act, nor except where there was an action; and he contended that section 32. of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, which permits of error being brought on a special case, applied only to special cases where there was an action; and he further urged that the case of Withers v. Parker (5), in which the Court decided that an appeal might be brought in an interpleader case, was distinguishable, on the ground that the right of appeal was a new right given by the statute, while proceedings in error were governed by long-established rules and practice.

Honyman (Lush with him) was not heard on this objection.

[ERLE, C.J.—We think that error will lie on a special case stated on interpleader proceedings.]

Honyman (Lush with him), for the plaintiff in error, the defendant below, argued that the plaintiff was not entitled to freight, on the ground that the cargo was the property of Messrs. Skeene & Freeman, the shipowners, and that, consequently, no freight could have been payable to them in respect of a cargo which was their own property; that the plaintiff, as mortgagee, could not stand in a better position than the mortgagors, as he had not taken possession of the ship till the end of the voyage—Alexander v. Simms (6); and in order to support the contention that the cargo was the property of the mortgagors, he relied on the expressed intention of the captain to buy a cargo for them, and of Messrs. Torres & Co. to sell the wood to the captain, and on the blank in the bill of lading, where the amount of the freight is usually inserted, being filled up with a line, denoting, as he contended, an agreement that no freight at all was to be payable. He cited Sanders v. Vanzeller (7).

Montagu Smith, for the defendant in error, was not called upon to argue.

ERLE, C.J.—We are of opinion that the judgment of the Court below ought to be affirmed. The ship belonged to Messrs. Skeene & Freeman, and while it was earning freight, the plaintiff took possession of her as mortgagee. It appears that the ship at that time was carrying a cargo, which, it was contended, was the property of the shipowners, Messrs. Skeene & Freeman, and that therefore no freight would be due. But the whole fallacy of the argument lies in the assertion that the cargo had become the property of Messrs. Skeene & Freeman. Messrs. Torres & Co. had caused certain goods to be put on board the vessel, which, on certain contingencies, would have become the property of Messrs. Skeene & Freeman. But those contingencies never were realized. Messrs. Torres & Co. kept the control over the property, and did not intend to part with it until the price was paid; for the bill of lading was to the order of the loaders of the goods. The goods were never offered to Messrs. Skeene & Freeman. The defendant took up the bills drawn by Messrs. Torres & Co. for the honour of the drawer, and took to the bill of lading, and demanded the cargo. We think that it was his duty to pay the freight. The reasons assigned in the judgment of the Court below seem to us to be perfectly sound.

PUST V. DOWIE.*

Charter-party—Freight payable on Condition of Ship taking a Cargo 1,000 tons of Weight and Measurement—Condition Precedent — Part-Performance of Contract.

By a charter-party, made at Liverpool by the plaintiff, chartering his ship to the defendant for a voyage from Liverpool to Sydney, the defendant was to pay for the use of the vessel in respect of the voyage a lump sum in full, "on condition of her taking a cargo of not less than 1,000 tons of weight and measurement." The plaintiff placed the vessel at the disposal of the defendant, who loaded her with 525 tons weight goods and 330 tons measurement goods. The ship could not safely carry any more. There were left 150 tons vacant space. The ship sailed with this cargo. A cargo of 1,000 tons of weight and measurement is usually, and at Liverpool, loaded one-third weight goods and two-thirds measurement goods; but the ordinary cargo for the Sydney market reverses these proportions, being two-thirds weight and one-third measurement. The vessel was capable of carrying 1,000 tons of weight and measurement in the ordinary proportions of one-third weight and two-thirds measurement. In an action by the plaintiff for the freight, it was held that the defendant was liable; that the condition was not broken, since the charter-party meant that the ship was to be capable of taking an ordinary cargo of 1,000 tons weight and measurement at the port of loading, and not a Sydney cargo; and further, that even if the condition had meant a Sydney cargo, and had not been complied with, and was in terms a condition precedent to the right to the freight, still, as the defendant had received part of the consideration for the contract in having the ship placed at his disposal, and in having loaded her with his goods, with which she had sailed, he could no longer treat it as condition precedent to defeat the claim to the freight wholly, but must avail himself of the breach of the condition in reduction of the amount claimed.

Appeal by the defendant against the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench.

In this case the declaration was framed on a charter-party made at Liverpool by the plaintiff as captain of the vessel and the defendant as charterer, that the vessel should receive and take on board from the charterer a full and complete cargo of lawful merchandise and proceed to Sydney, New South Wales, and there deliver her cargo; in consideration whereof the defendant was to deliver the cargo alongside to be loaded on board, and was to pay "for the use and hire of the vessel, in respect of the voyage, the sum of 1,550*l.* in full, on condition of her taking a cargo of not less than 1,000 tons of weight and measurement, payment to be made; the captain to receive the freight payable abroad as per bills of lading, or an order handed over to him by the charterer at the current rate of exchange and the balance to be paid in cash on sailing, less three months' interest." It went on to state "that such goods only as the charterer may direct shall be received on board," and provided that the master was, at the charterer's request, to sign bills of lading for any rate of freight that might be filled in, and payable in any manner that the charterer might choose. The captain to have an absolute lien for freight on the cargo, and to have no recourse on the charterer for any freight due abroad for bills of lading if not paid.

The breaches alleged were, that the charterer made default in loading the ship with the cargo as agreed, and did not pay the 1,550*l.* over and above the freight payable abroad as per bills of lading, and which on the whole amounted to a sum less than the sum of 1,550*l.*

Plea, first, as to the alleged default in loading, that the defendant did not make default in loading the ship; secondly, as to the same, that the plaintiff was not ready and willing to take the cargo, nor was the ship ready or able to receive it; thirdly, as to the non-payment of the balance of the said sum of 1,550*l.*, that the vessel did not and could not take a cargo of not less than 1,000 tons of weight and measurement pursuant to the said conditions; but, on the contrary, could and did take only a cargo of very much less than 1,000 tons weight and measurement; fourthly, payment.

The Issue was joined on these pleas. There was also a demurrer to the third plea.

On the trial, before Blackburn, J., it appeared that the action was brought to recover 219*l.* 12*s.*, the difference between the sum of 1,550*l.* stated in the charter-party and 1,330*l.* 8*s.*, for which bills of lading had been given for freight payable at Sydney.

The charter-party was entered into at Liverpool, and in pursuance of it the defendant proceeded to load the vessel, and when he had loaded 525 tons weight goods and 330 tons measurement goods, making together 855 tons, the ship was deep enough for her intended voyage. There were then 150 tons of vacant space. The ship sailed with this cargo on board her. A ton measurement is equal to 40 cubic feet, and the vessel's cubic contents were 800 tons. In ordinary cases one-third of the cargo is weight, and two-thirds measurement goods; but a Sydney cargo is ordinarily two-thirds weight and one-third measurement.

The learned Judge directed the jury, that the meaning of the charter-party was that the ship would hold 1,000 tons if loaded with a full cargo in the ordinary proportions of weight and measurement goods. The jury found that the vessel was exactly of 1,000 tons capacity according to the ordinary loading. They also found that the cargo put on board was the ordinary Sydney cargo.

On this finding a verdict was entered for the plaintiff, with leave to the defendant to move to enter a verdict. Pursuant to this leave a rule was obtained by the defendant, which was ultimately discharged (1).

On the demurrer also judgment was given for the plaintiff (2).

Baylis, for the appellant, the defendant below (E. James with him).—The defendant, the charterer, was entitled to put on board any cargo of lawful merchandise, the charter-party not limiting the cargo to any special kinds, and to load what amount of weight goods and what amount of measurement goods he pleased, as the charter-party does not specify what quantity of weight goods and what quantity of measurement goods are to be loaded—Moorsom v. Page (3), Cockburn v. Alexander (4) and M'Lachlan on Merchant Shipping, 378. Even if the defendant has not an unlimited option of selecting the cargo, it is reasonable to suppose that the 1,000 tons cargo intended by the charter-party, has reference to the ordinary and usual cargo suitable for the place mentioned in the charter-party as the place to which the ship is to proceed, and not to the general capacity of the ship. Now, the jury have found that the Sydney cargo is usually two-thirds weight and one-third measurement, and that this ship will not carry a cargo of more than 855 tons on those proportions—Cuthbert v. Cumming (5). If it be said that the cargo ought to be a reasonable proportion of measurement and weight goods, then it must be taken that 525 tons weight and 330 tons measurement goods is a reasonable proportion. The proportion cannot be limited to exactly half and half.

Secondly, as to the demurrer. By the terms of the charter-party, no part of the balance of the freight was payable, unless the vessel could take 1,000 tons. The words "on condition" in the charter-party, import a condition precedent on their fair meaning. The Court will give effect to the plain words of any contract importing a condition precedent—Stadhard v. Lee (6), Tidey v. Mollett (7), Behn v. Burness (8) and Graves v. Legg (9). The plaintiff therefore cannot recover on the charter-party at all. He may sue indeed on a quantum meruit, for freight, having carried the goods; but in that action he would be met by the fact that the amount that the defendant would have to pay for freight, according to the rate per ton in the charter-party, is less than the sum actually paid by the defendant. The Court below, in their decision on the demurrer, rely on the ruling in Behn v. Burness (8), that when a party receives a partial benefit, a condition precedent loses that character and becomes a warranty. That principle does not apply to this case, for no part of the benefit had been derived by the defendant when the goods had been put on board the vessel.

Mellish (Kemplay with him), for the plaintiff, was not called upon.

ERLE, C.J.—We are of opinion that the judgment of the Court below ought to be affirmed. The argument has turned upon the portion of the charter-party in which a pre-payment was stipulated to be due from the defendant on condition of the ship taking a cargo of not less than 1,000 tons of weight and measurement. The action is brought for balance of freight due. The defence was that the above-mentioned condition had not been performed. It was argued, for the defendant, that the meaning of that condition was, that as the ship was chartered from Liverpool to Sydney, the stipulation in the charter-party was for the taking a Sydney cargo. Now a Sydney cargo is an unusual cargo in this respect, that it consists of two-thirds weight and one-third measurement. In ordinary cases, and at the port of loading, the proportion of loading by weight and measurement would be reversed. The question upon which the right to the balance of freight depends is, whether the defendant can maintain that that stipulation was for a Sydney cargo of 1,000 tons. We think that it was not, but that the stipulation relates to what the vessel was capable of taking. The jury have found that the vessel was capable of taking an ordinary cargo of 1,000 tons of weight and measurement, that is, such a cargo as is an ordinary cargo at the port of loading. That being so, we think that there was no breach of the condition, and that there is no defence upon the facts.

Then, with respect to the demurrer. The third plea states that the vessel did not, nor could, take a cargo of not less than 1,000 tons of weight and measurement. Even if we were to construe the words as a condition precedent, the case falls within the principle laid down in Behn v. Burness (8), that where a part of the benefit of the contract has been received by the party, he cannot reject it in toto. Here the ship has been placed by the shipowner at the disposal of the defendant, and loaded by the latter. Though the breach of a condition precedent might have given the defendant a right originally to repudiate the contract, it cannot now justify him in wholly refusing to pay any part of the freight. But he may have the benefit of the breach of contract, if any, in reduction of the amount claimed.

For these reasons, and also on the grounds stated by the Court below, in which we fully concur, we are of opinion that the judgment of the Court below ought to be affirmed.

Landlord and Tenant—Fixtures—Right to remove—When to remove.

By a lease of land intended to be used for salt-works, the lessees covenanted that they would erect certain buildings and works, and that they would at the determination of the term "leave at the disposal of the lessors all the fixed materials of what nature or kind soever that should be in or about the said intended wychhouses or salt-works, or any ways relating thereto, save and except all the salt-pans and other movable articles made use of at all or at any of the said wychhouses or salt-works," which they the lessees were to take away for their own use and benefit. The interest of the lessees became afterwards vested in the defendants, who took upon themselves the performance of the above covenant, and also covenanted that they would yield up possession of the premises, with all erections, buildings and improvements, together with the cisterns, doors, &c., and "also all other fixtures and appurtenances of what kind or nature whatsoever which should be used in or about the buildings," "but as to the salt-pans and other articles made use of at all or any of the said wychhouses, &c., and belonging to the defendants and their assigns, they should be at liberty to take and carry away from off the said premises, upon making good all such injury or damage as the said wychhouses, &c. might sustain in consequence of such removal," with an option to the lessors of purchasing any part of the salt-pans or other movable articles. The defendants sunk a brine-shaft and erected an apparatus for working it. They underlet the premises on the 13th of December 1861. The plaintiffs, on the 23rd of June 1862, wrote a letter demanding possession, as the underletting gave them a right of re-entry on the land; and an action of ejectment was brought on the 7th of July 1862. Between the 18th of January and the 17th of March 1863, the defendants sold and removed a number of fixtures, &c., and on the last-mentioned day they confessed judgment in the action of ejectment:—Held, that under the above covenants, the defendants had a right to take away such fixtures as could properly be called tenant's fixtures; and that they were entitled to a reasonable time after the receipt of the letter of the 23rd of June 1862, within which they might remove them.

The first count of the declaration contained three breaches of covenants in a lease from the plaintiffs to the defendants. The first breach was for not during the term and before the determination thereof, repairing the wychhouses, pan-houses, salt-works, storehouses, reservoirs, counting-house, cottages, and other buildings which were at and after the making of the lease erected upon the demised premises, and a certain pit and shaft sunk by the defendants on the hereditaments and premises thereby demised, and for not at the determination of the term delivering up quiet and peaceable possession of all and singular the hereditaments and premises, with all erections, buildings and improvements made thereon, together with the brine cisterns and other things therein mentioned, being other than the salt-pans and other articles, detached chimney, pan-house, smithy and carpenter's workshop, which the defendants were entitled to remove. The second breach was for not making good the damage caused by the removal of the salt-pans and other articles which the defendants were entitled to remove. The third breach was for underletting without the plaintiffs' consent. In the second count all the allegations in the first count, antecedent to the first breach of covenant therein mentioned, were repeated; and it was further stated, that after the condition was broken as therein mentioned, and before the plaintiffs entered for such breach, the defendants pulled down a part of the premises and dis-annexed fixtures and effects belonging to the plaintiffs, being other and different from the salt-pans and articles which the defendants were empowered to remove, and other than the detached chimney, smithy, and carpenter's shop mentioned in the said second count.

The third count was for waste.

The fourth count was for trespass after the determination of the term; and the fifth count was in trover for a conversion.

The defendants pleaded twenty-one pleas. The first plea was pleaded to the first breach of the first count, and was a plea of payment of 200*l.* into court.

The plaintiffs joined issue on all the defendants' pleas, and demurred to the sixth, seventh, fifteenth and sixteenth pleas, and new assigned to the sixth, seventh, eleventh, twelfth, fifteenth and sixteenth pleas.

The defendants joined in demurrer, and pleaded not guilty to the new assignments.

The plaintiffs joined issue on the plea to the new assignments.

The cause came on to be tried at the Liverpool Winter Assizes, 1863, when a verdict was entered, by consent, for the plaintiffs, subject to a reference, with power to the arbitrator to state a special case.

The arbitrator subsequently stated a special case, which was substantially, and so far as is necessary for the purposes of this report, as follows :

By indenture of lease, bearing date the 6th of October 1798, John Sumner and Philip Sumner demised to George Leigh, John Leigh, James Leigh and Joseph Leigh a piece of land in Wharton, called the "Up Loont," with liberty to the lessees to sink, search for and get brine from under and out of the demised premises for the use of certain wychhouses or salt-works intended to be erected thereon by the lessees, and also to get salt rock to be refined or manufactured at the said wychhouses or salt-works, and for the purposes aforesaid to sink and make brine-pits, reservoirs and other conveniences upon the demised premises, and to dig for clay and sand, to make bricks and build wychhouses or salt-works thereon, together with storehouses, pans, windmills, engines and other erections and buildings, for the purpose of making and storing white salt and rock salt, to hold the same for sixty years from the 10th of October 1798; and the lessees thereby covenanted with the lessors that they would erect all such wychhouses or salt-works as they should erect and build in or upon the said demised premises, or any part thereof, as also all the storehouses, reservoirs, windmills, engines, and other buildings and erections whatsoever necessary and appurtenant thereto, in a good, substantial, workmanlike manner, with brick or stone, and should or would cover the same with slate or tiles, and should and would from time to time, and at all times during the said term, at his and their own proper costs and charges, well and sufficiently repair, amend, maintain and keep all and singular the said wychhouses or salt-works, together with the storehouses, reservoirs, windmills, engines and other buildings to be erected and built upon the said demised premises, in good, substantial, tenantable working order, repair and condition, and at the end or other sooner determination of the said term, should and would yield and deliver up the quiet and peaceable possession of all and singular the said hereditaments and premises, with their appurtenances, unto the lessors, their heirs and assigns, in such good repair and condition as aforesaid, and also leave at the disposal of the said lessors, their heirs and assigns, all the fixed materials, of what nature or kind soever, that should be used in or about the said intended wychhouses or salt-works, or any ways relating thereto, save and except all the salt-pans and other movable articles made use of at all or any of the said wychhouses and salt-works, which they the said lessees, their executors, administrators or assigns, were to take and carry away for their own use and benefit, they the said lessees, their executors, administrators and assigns, making good all such injury or damage as might be done to such intended wychhouses or salt-works by the removal of such pans.

During the term created by the lease of 1798 the lessees thereunder made, erected and set up in and upon the land thereby demised wychhouses and salt-works, together with storehouses, reservoirs, engines and other buildings, with fixed materials used in or about such wychhouses or salt-works, as well as salt-pans and other movable articles made use of at the said wychhouses or salt-works; but no brine-pits were at any time sunk or made under that lease.

In the year 1849 negotiations took place between the defendants and the parties respectively entitled to the interests of the lessors and lessees in the lease of the 6th of October 1798, for a surrender of the said lease of 1798, and the granting to the defendants of a new lease, which, on the 2nd of January 1850, were carried out by the surrender and new lease hereinafter mentioned.

By indenture of surrender, bearing date the 2nd of January 1850, between the Rev. John Leigh of the first part, and Sir Oswald Mosely of the second part (the said parties thereto of the first and second parts being the parties then entitled to the interest of the lessees in the said lease of 1798), other parties (also interested in the said lease) of the third, fourth and fifth parts, the defendants of the sixth part, and the plaintiffs and John Sumner (since deceased), Philip Sumner (since deceased) and John Jackson (since deceased), being the parties then entitled to the interest of the lessors in the said lease, of the seventh part, after reciting (amongst other things) the said lease of the 6th of October 1798, and that the said parties thereto of the first and second parts had, with the consent of the parties thereto of the seventh part, lately agreed with the defendants to assign to them the salt-works and premises demised by the said recited indenture of lease for the unexpired residue of the said term therein granted, in consideration of the defendants taking upon themselves the fulfilment and performance of all and singular the covenants in the said lease, so far as the same covenants and agreements were capable of being performed and taking effect, which the defendants had agreed to do, and had since applied to the said parties thereto of the seventh part to accept and take a surrender of the said premises for the unexpired residue of the said term, and to grant to them a new lease of part of the said premises, together with other land specified in the plan on the back thereof, and coloured red, for the full term of thirty years, to be computed from the 2nd of January 1850, which the said parties thereto of the seventh part had agreed to do, the parties of the first and second parts, at the request of the defendants, and the said parties of the third, fourth, fifth and sixth parts, did thereby assign and surrender unto the said parties of the seventh part, their heirs and assigns, all that field, close or parcel of land, and all and singular other the hereditaments and premises described and comprised in the said indenture of lease of the 6th of October 1798, together with all and singular buildings, cisterns, reservoirs, canal and improvements standing and made thereon, or on any part thereof, together also with all ways, paths, passages and rights of passage, lights, liberties, easements, privileges, profits, commodities, advantages and appurtenances whatsoever to the said hereditaments and premises belonging or in anywise appertaining, and all the estate, right, title, interest, trust, property, possession, term and terms of years, claim and demand whatsoever, both at law and in equity, of them the said John Leigh and Sir Oswald Mosely, parties of the first and second parts, and the said several other parties of the third, fourth and fifth parts respectively.

The case then stated that the plaintiffs and J. Sumner and Philip Sumner and John Jackson had demised to the defendants the "Up Loont" and the "Big Meadow" for thirty years, with liberty to sink pits for brine, and make pits, engines, &c.

And the defendants thereby covenanted with the plaintiffs, amongst other things, that the defendants would during the said term sink and form a brine-pit and shaft in the best and most approved manner, and with the best materials, to the satisfaction of the lessors or their surveyor; and, further, that the defendants should and would from time to time, and at all times during the said term, at their own proper costs and charges, in all things well and sufficiently repair, amend, maintain and keep all and singular the wychhouses, pan-houses or salt-works, together with the storehouses, reservoirs, counting-house and cottages and other buildings then erected and built, and thereafter to be erected and built, upon the said demised premises, and also the said pit and shaft to be sunk, made and found as aforesaid, and all and singular other the hereditaments and premises thereby demised, in good, substantial and tenantable working order, repair and condition, and at the end or other sooner determination of the said term, should and would yield up the quiet and peaceable possession of all and singular the said hereditaments and premises, with all erections, buildings and improvements made thereon, together also with the present brine cisterns, and all doors, shutters, hurdles, roofs and roof-supporters, coal-deposits, salt-stages, weighing-machines, coal quays, and all flues in the refined salt stoves, and also all other fixtures and appurtenances of what nature or kind soever, which should be used in or about the said counting-house, cottages and other buildings, wychhouses or salt-works, or in anywise relating thereto, unto the said parties thereto of the first part, or their assigns, in thorough and good working order, repair and condition in all respects; but as to the salt-pans and other articles made use of at all or any of the said wychhouses, pan-houses or salt-works, and belonging to the defendants and their assigns, they should be at liberty to take and carry away from off the said premises, upon making good all such injury or damage as the said wychhouses or salt-works and premises might sustain in consequence of such removal; but, nevertheless, it was agreed and declared that the lessors should at the end of the said term have the option of purchasing all or any part of the said salt-pans and other movable articles which should be used in or about the said salt-works and premises, or any of them; and, further, that they, the defendants, should at all times during the continuance of that demise use their best endeavours to preserve and keep all and every the brine pit and pits, reservoir and reservoirs, which should be sunk, made or be upon the said premises during that demise, also the brine to be found therein, or in or upon or under any part or parts of the said demised premises from sustaining any injury or damage by fresh water, leakage or otherwise however. And also that they, the defendants, should not nor would sub-let, assign or dispose of the said demised premises, or any part thereof, without the licence and consent of the parties thereto of the first part. There was a clause of re-entry for a breach of this covenant.

Under the agreement with Mr. Leigh's representatives, recited in the deed of surrender, dated the 2nd of January 1850, the defendants took possession of the salt-pans and other property which had belonged to such representatives, and they had done considerable repairs to the premises.

After the granting of the said new lease of 1850, the defendants sunk a brine-shaft, and erected an apparatus for working it.

In the summer of 1861 the plaintiffs entered into a contract of sale with Messrs. Vardin of all interest in the land, and on the 13th of December 1861 the defendants underlet the land to J. Foster, but afterwards renewed possession. However, the plaintiffs wrote to the defendants on the 23rd of June 1862 a letter demanding possession of the premises in consequence of their right of re-entry upon the defendants underletting without consent; and an action of ejectment was brought on the 7th of July 1862. On the 18th of January 1863 the defendants had a public auction of the salt-pans and other articles and things on the premises, and afterwards, between that day and the 17th of March 1863, they were removed from the premises. On the 17th of March the defendants confessed judgment in the action of ejectment, and judgment was signed on the 25th. The case then contained a very long description of the buildings, works and fixtures which had been upon the premises. Saltpans, wychhouses, pan-houses, &c. were erected during the continuance of each of the above-mentioned leases, and for the purposes of this case it was to be taken that between the 18th of January and the 17th of March 1863 the defendants removed the salt-pans, hatch-frames, bearers, loose fire-bars, iron doors, and steam pan-houses, but none of the brickwork.

The material questions for the opinion of the Court were, first, were the defendants entitled to remove any and which of the articles and things described? Secondly, up to what time did the rights of the defendants to remove such of the said articles and things, if any, as they were entitled to remove, continue?

Kemplay, for the plaintiffs.—First, none of the articles enumerated were removable. This depends on the terms of the lease of 1850; by this the defendants have renounced the right which as tenants they would otherwise have had of removing trade fixtures—Dumergue v. Rumsey (1). Walsley v. Milne (2) shews that in certain cases, even without such a covenant, trade fixtures enure to the landlord's benefit, and become at once part of the inheritance, as when the mortgagor remains in possession of the premises and erects trade fixtures.—[He then went through the different articles, contending that they were all tenant's or trade fixtures, citing notes to Elves v. Mawe (3) and Whitehead v. Bennett (4).]

Secondly, assuming the fixtures to have been removable, they were not removable at the time the removal took place—see the notes to Elves v. Maws (7). Weston v. Woodcock (8) shews the right of a tenant to remove tenant's fixtures continues so long only after the determination of his term as he remains in possession under a right to consider himself as tenant. In Leader v. Homewood (9) it was doubted whether a tenant holding over at sufferance had any right to remove fixtures. At all events, in a case of forfeiture, the removal must take place within a reasonable time after the tenant has notice that the landlord exercises his right of determining the tenancy; here the defendants had this notice in June 1862, and the removal did not take place till March in the following year.

[COCKBURN, C.J. referred to Stansfeld v. the Mayor of Portsmouth (10).]

He also contended that the parol evidence was not admissible to explain the meaning of the words used in the lease as to what are meant by "other articles used in salt-works." He also referred to ss. 68. & 69.

Mellish (Holland with him), for the defendants.—First, the defendants were entitled to remove all the articles which have been removed. By the lease of 1850, they were to be at liberty to take away the salt-pans and other articles made use of, &c. Secondly, they were entitled to remove and did remove them within a reasonable time, under the circumstances, after the determination of the term. The first lease must be carefully considered, and it appears to be a long lease in the nature of a building lease, with a covenant to erect buildings, to keep them in repair, and at the end or sooner determination of the term to yield up and deliver peaceable possession of the hereditaments with their appurtenances in good repair, to leave the fixed materials, save and except all the salt-pans and other movable articles made use of at all or any of the said wchhouses and salt-works. Therefore the defendants were to deliver up whatever belonged to the lessors, but if they had found on or brought on to the premises articles or things which could be removed without injuring the buildings, such articles or things would be tenant's or trade fixtures, which they would have a right to remove, although they had been fixed then to the buildings. The second lease amounts to nearly the same, upon the question before the Court. Lawton v. Salmon in a note to Fitzherbert v. Shaw (11) shews that the salt-pans would go to the heir and not to the executor. In Foley v. Addenbrooke (12) it was held that the defendants had a right to remove whatever was in the nature of a machine or part of a machine, but not what was in the nature of building or support of building, although made of iron; and that in such removal the defendants might disturb such brickwork as was necessary, and were not bound to restore it to a perfect state, as if the article it was intended to support or cover were still there, but that the defendants were liable for any unnecessary disturbance of brickwork. But the principle is settled by Elliott v. Bishop (13), where there was a covenant to deliver up the demised premises together with all locks, &c., "and other fixtures and articles in the nature of fixtures, which shall at any time during the said term be fixed or fastened to the said demised premises, or be thereto belonging." The tenant had put up certain fixtures which were necessary for carrying on the business of a licensed victualler, and which were of the description called and known as trade and tenant's fixtures. The Court of Exchequer Chamber held, agreeing with the judgment of Platt, B. in the Court below (14), that the tenant, notwithstanding the covenant, had a right to take away such fixtures. See also The Duke of Beaufort v. Bates (15). The second question is, whether they were removed within the time which the defendants were fairly entitled to. In Fitzherbert v. Shaw (11), the parties in an action of ejectment entered into an agreement that judgment should be signed for the plaintiff with a stay of execution for a given period. It was held, that during that period the tenant could not be allowed to do any act by which the premises would be altered, but that he must deliver them up in the same condition as they were when the agreement was made and the judgment was signed. Here there is a clause giving the landlord an option to purchase the fixtures, and if he did not elect to exercise that option and purchase them, the tenant had a right to take them as long as he remained in possession.

[MELLOR, J.—Can that be so? Would a tenant who held over beyond his term be entitled to remove fixtures, as long as he chose to hold over?]

Yes, it is submitted that he would. Stansfeld v. the Mayor of Portsmouth (10) shews that after an entry for a forfeiture, the assignees of a lessee are entitled to a reasonable time within which they may enter to remove fixtures. Penton v. Robart (16) decides that a tenant may remove trade fixtures so long as he remains in possession, although the term is at an end, and there has been judgment against him in an action of ejectment. In Weeton v. Woodcock (8) it was held that a tenant could not remove after his term was over. But that case was afterwards discussed in Leader v. Homewood (9), where it was left doubtful whether a tenant holding over at sufferance would be allowed to remove fixtures. Minshall v. Lloyd (17), Heap v. Barton (18), Dumergue v. Rumsey (1) were also referred to.

Kemplay, in reply.—The proposition that the tenant may remove fixtures at any time during his continuance in possession is directly contrary to Weeton v. Woodcock (8). Here, as soon as the writ of ejectment was served the tenant became a trespasser. The real principle is, that as soon as the fixtures are attached to the freehold they belong to the landlord, not that they belonged to the tenant, as was thought to be the case when Penton v. Robart (16) was decided, and that they were given by him to the landlord. They, ipso facto, belong to the landlord at the expiration of the term, unless the tenant has done some act. But if a reasonable time is to be allowed, when is it to begin to run; from the time at which the action is com-

[Per Curiam.—The time must be calculated from the earlier date, from the moment at which the tenant receives the notice. BLACKBURN, J.—The arbitrator will take all the circumstances into account in determining what is a reasonable time.]

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think that the true construction of this lease is that contended for by the defendants. Is there anything in the covenant to restrain them from removing trade fixtures? There is a provision in the first lease that they were to deliver up to the landlords peaceable possession of the hereditaments with their appurtenances, and leave at their disposal all the fixed materials, save and except all the salt-pans and other movable articles, &c.; and by the second lease they were to be at liberty to take away the salt-pans and other articles made use of, &c. Now, the case of Elliott v. Bishop (13) is an express authority that by such a covenant a tenant is only bound to leave upon the premises such fixtures as belong to the landlord, and I am the more confirmed in my opinion, that this is the proper construction, by finding the words in the first lease "movable articles," as to which there is an express exception. This must mean articles movable by the tenant though they had been affixed to the buildings, for there would have been no occasion to reserve a right to take away mere chattels. I am satisfied that Elliott v. Bishop (13) is directly in point; but even in the absence of such an authority I should be prepared to hold the same opinion. The arbitrator must determine what number of the articles removed come within the denomination of trade fixtures, for such the defendants had liberty to remove. The other point has been determined during the argument.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am now satisfied that the effect of the covenant is to prevent the tenants taking away such of the fixtures as can be called landlord's fixtures attached to the soil, and that the other fixtures, which can be called tenant's fixtures, the defendants had a right to remove. I at first thought otherwise, but I had not the case of Elliott v. Bishop (13) in my mind at that time, and I now think that the defendants must be taken to have a right to take away all such fixtures as the arbitrator

Attorney and Solicitor—Articled Clerk—Service under Fresh Articles—Application to Court—Practice—6 & 7 Vict. c. 73. ss. 14–17.

An articled clerk, having served part only of the five years under his articles, after the expiration of the five years applied to the Court that he might be allowed to enter into fresh articles, and that the time actually served might be counted as part of the necessary time of service. The Court refused to make any order; overruling Ex parte Smith (1) on this point.

John Shering Keddle entered into articles of clerkship, dated the 20th of May 1852, made between him and Francis George Coleridge and Francis James Coleridge, attornies, of Ottery St. Mary, Devon, by which Keddle was bound to serve F. G. Coleridge for five years, and if he died or gave up practice before the expiration of the articles, then to serve as clerk to F. J. Coleridge for the residue of the term. Keddle served F. G. Coleridge from the date of the articles till his death on the 26th of August 1854, and from that time served F. J. Coleridge till the 1st of March 1855, making altogether a service of rather more than two years and nine months. On that day, with his master's consent, he discontinued service, and obtained a commission in the 83rd Regiment, and served in it until the 31st of December 1857; when being then in the West Indies, he was obliged to sell out, owing to ill health. He then went to reside with his father at Bedminster for four years, and afterwards, up to the date of this application, at Uxbridge, living on an allowance from his father. F. J. Coleridge died on the 5th of June 1862, and the articles had not been cancelled.

Philbrick moved, on behalf of Keddle, that the articles might be assigned to another attorney for the residue of the term of five years, or that he might be allowed to serve for that residue under fresh articles without payment of a new stamp duty, and that in either case the term for which he had actually served might be reckoned as part of the necessary term of five years. He referred to section 13. of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, and cited Ex parte Smith (1) and Ex parte De Fivas (2).

[CROMPTON, J.—The contract under the old articles has expired; the applicant does not want the leave of the Court to enter into fresh articles.]

It is necessary to obtain the leave of the Court, in order that the time already actually served may be allowed to count.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—That is asking us to anticipate, by a decision now, what will be properly in the jurisdiction of the Court at a future time. Ex parte Smith (1) must be taken to be overruled on this point: we refused to act upon it on a similar application this Term (3). The applicant must take what course he is advised; we cannot interfere at present. CROMPTON, J.—If we granted this ex parte application, we should be setting aside the functions of the examiners appointed under the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73. ss. 15–17.]

Joseph Rogers was bound by articles on the 10th of July 1860, to serve J. G. Winter, an attorney of Norwich, for five years. He served till the 28th of February 1863, when he was obliged to leave, owing to ill health. On his recovery, a transfer of the articles was executed on the 20th of May 1864 to W. P. Bailment—Action by Bailor—Jus Tertii.

A bailee is not estopped from disputing the title of his bailor, and setting up the jus tertii, where the bailment has been determined by what is equivalent to an eviction by title paramount.

The plaintiff seized goods belonging to R. under a distress for rent of a house alleged to have been demised by the plaintiff to R, and having seized them he delivered them to the defendant, an auctioneer, for the purpose of selling them. When the sale was about to begin R. gave notice to the defendant that he must not sell the goods, or if he did sell them that he must retain the proceeds for him, R., as the distress was void, and as the relation of landlord and tenant did not exist between himself and the plaintiff. This was true, and the distress was void altogether. The defendant did sell the goods, but kept the proceeds for R.:—Held, that he was entitled to set up the jus tertii, and had a good defence to an action by the plaintiff.

The declaration alleged that in consideration that the plaintiff would employ the defendant as his agent to sell and dispose of certain goods for the plaintiff for reward to the defendant, the defendant promised to sell the same, and on request to render an account of the sale of the said goods, and to pay over the monies to the plaintiff. That the plaintiff did employ the defendant, and that all things were performed, &c. Breach, that the defendant did not render an account or pay over the monies arising from the sale to the plaintiff. There were also counts for money had and received, and on an account stated.

Pleas to the first count, first, that the defendant did not promise as alleged; secondly, that the plaintiff did not employ the defendant as his agent, nor did the defendant receive the goods for the purpose and on the terms alleged; thirdly, to the residue of the declaration, never indebted.

At the trial, before Willes, J., at the Surrey Summer Assizes, 1864, it appeared that the plaintiff had seized the goods of one Robbins under a distress for rent of a house alleged to have been demised by the plaintiff to Robbins, and had delivered them to the defendant, an auctioneer, to sell by auction. When the sale was about to begin Robbins served a notice on the defendant that the distress was void, as the relation of landlord and tenant did not exist between the plaintiff and himself, and there was no rent in arrear. By the notice he required Robbins not to sell the goods, or if he had sold them, to retain the proceeds for him. The defendant sold the goods, but refused to pay the proceeds over to the plaintiff, and relied on the right of Robbins. The relation of the plaintiff and Robbins was that of vendor and vendee only.

It was contended, for the plaintiff, that the defendant being a bailee could not be allowed to set up the jus tertii against his bailor, from whom he received the goods, and a verdict was entered for the plaintiff for 44*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*, with leave to the defendant to move to enter the verdict for him.

A rule having been obtained,

Thrupp (Jan. 23) shewed cause.—This action is maintainable, and the verdict is right. An agent can only set up the jus tertii in a case of fraud, and there was no fraud in the present case. The defendant was employed by the plaintiff to sell the goods, and having done so, he has no right to say now that they were the goods of Robbins, and therefore that he refused to pay over the proceeds of the sale.

[BLACKBURN, J.—I cannot see why

(1) Crompton, J., Blackburn, J. and Mellor, J.

Robbins could not proceed against the defendant for taking and converting his goods, if he had refused to let Robbins have them or the proceeds of the sale.]

It is not clear that such an action would be maintainable by Robbins.

[BLACKBURN, J.—The defendant would have sold the goods without any right to do so, and it would be no answer to say that he had been authorized by the plaintiff to sell them.]

But he cannot set up the jus tertii unless there has been some kind of fraud. In Hardman v. Willcock, reported in a note to White v. Bartlett (1), Alderson, J., in delivering the judgment of the Court, said, "There are many authorities which were cited for the plaintiff, which establish, no doubt, that an agent must account to his principal, and cannot set up the jus tertii in an action by his principal against him. The case of Nickolson v. Knowles (2) is a distinct authority, shewing that an agent to receive for the use of another, cannot by notice from a third person be converted into an implied trustee; and that his possession is the possession of his principal. The same principle, which depends on the relation of the parties as agent and principal, was laid down by the Court of King's Bench in Dixon v. Hamond (3); by the Court of Common Pleas in Gosling v. Birnie (4); and by the Court of Exchequer in Roberts v. Ogilby (5). But we think that all these cases are distinguishable from the present, upon the ground that here the jury have found that the plaintiff's possession of the goods arose out of a fraud concerted between him and the insolvent." The doctrine thus laid down has never been contravened. There is a recent case of Sheridan v. the New Quay Company (6), in which the defendants were allowed to set up the jus tertii, but it was expressly upon the ground that they were common carriers, and as such bound to receive the goods. So also in Cheesman v. Exall (7), the defendant was held to be entitled to set up the jus tertii, but Pollock, C.B. distinguished the case from the ordinary class of cases upon the subject, in this respect, that the plaintiff had pledged the property to the defendant fraudulently and to avoid an execution.

[BLACKBURN, J. referred to Load v. Green (8) and White v. Garden (9) as shewing that a contract for the sale of goods obtained by fraud on the part of the purchaser is voidable only at the election of the vendor, and not void.]

There is also a class of cases in which it is laid down that an agent cannot dispute the title of his principal, following the rule that a tenant cannot dispute the title of his landlord. In Wilton v. Dunn (10), which was an action for use and occupation, the defendant pleaded that the occupation was by leave of the plaintiff, who was mortgagor in possession; that the mortgagee who was entitled to the possession during the whole period of occupation, gave notice to the defendant claiming mesne profits; that the defendant until such notice was ready and willing to pay the plaintiff, and that from the time of such notice he was liable to pay the mortgagee. It was decided that the plea was bad, Lord Campbell, C.J. saying, "The plea is new, and I am of opinion that this ingenious experiment should not be sanctioned. It calls on us as a Court of law to do that which we have no power to do. We cannot protect this defendant from the threat of the mortgagee. Had the tenant under compulsion of that threat actually paid the mortgagee what was due, it might have been a defence." He also referred to Hickman v. Machin (11).

Parry, Serj. and Howard, in support of the rule.—The defendant is not liable in this action; the goods belong to Robbins, who has a right to proceed against the defendant if he does not pay over the proceeds of the sale to him. He could maintain an action of trover, or he might waive the tort and bring an action for money had and received. In truth, the money is in the hands of the defendant for Robbins, and is held for him—see Adamson v. Jarvis (12), Farebrother v. Ansley (13), Rodgers v. Maw (14) and Neate v. Harding (15). In Story on Agency, s. 217, the author, when speaking of the rule that an agent is not in general allowed to set up the adverse title of a third person against that of his principal, says, "An exception, however, is allowed where the principal has obtained the goods fraudulently or tortiously from such third person," and he cites Hardman v. Willcock (1), which is on all-fours with the present case. The fraud which was set up only shewed that the plaintiff had no title. They also referred to Betteley v. Reed (16).

BLACKBURN, J. delivered the judgment of the Court.—In this case, which was tried before my Brother Willes, the verdict was directed to be entered for the plaintiff for 44l. 12s. 6d., with leave to move to enter the verdict for the defendant, this Court to have power to amend the pleadings in any manner, and to draw inferences of fact. My Brother Parry obtained a rule nisi accordingly, which was argued before my Lord, my Brother Mellor and myself in last term, when the Court took time to consider their judgment. From the Judge's notes it appears that goods which belonged to one Robbins were seized by the plaintiff under a distress for rent of a house alleged to have been demised by the plaintiff to Robbins; these goods had been removed by the plaintiff, and delivered by him to the defendant to sell as his (the plaintiff's) auctioneer, and the defendant proceeded to sell them in the ordinary way. When the sale was about to begin, Robbins served a notice on the defendant that the distress was void, as the relation of landlord and tenant did not exist between him and the plaintiff, and there was no rent in arrear; and by the notice Robbins required the defendant not to sell the goods, or if he had sold them, to retain the proceeds for him, Robbins. The defendant proceeded to sell the goods, but we think that the inference from the evidence is that he did this only because the notice was served so late that he had not time to make any inquiries before the sale came on. He received the proceeds of the sale, but refused to pay them over to the plaintiff. He did not pay the proceeds to Robbins, but from the evidence of Robbins, who was called as a witness at the trial, we draw the inference of fact that the defendant withheld the proceeds from the plaintiff and defended this action, relying on the right and by the authority of Robbins, and not hostilely to him. It appeared on the trial that the relation between the plaintiff and Robbins was not that of landlord and tenant, but of vendor and vendee, and consequently that the distress was altogether void and tortious. The question, therefore, comes to be whether under such circumstances the defendant can set up the jus tertii or not. And we are of opinion that he can do so; and, consequently, that the rule to enter the verdict for the defendant must be made absolute. We do not question the general rule, that one who has received property from another as his bailee or agent or servant, must restore or account for that property to him from whom he received it; and we agree with what is said by my Brother Martin in Cheesman v. Exall (7), that "there are numerous cases in connexion with wharfs and docks, in which, if the party intrusted with the possession of property were not estopped from denying the title of the person from whom he received it, it would be difficult to transact commercial business." But the bailee has no better title than the bailor; and, consequently, if a person entitled as against the bailor to the property claims it, the bailee has no defence against him—Wilson v. Anderton (17). Such was the position of the defendant in the present case. If Robbins had chosen to sue him in trover, or, waiving the tort, had sued for money had and received, the defendant would have had no defence. He was therefore compelled to yield to Robbins's claim; and it would certainly be a hardship on him if, without any fault of his own, the law left him without any defence against the plaintiff for so yielding. We do not, however, think that such is the law. Several cases were cited on the argument at the bar, and more might have been cited, such as Stonard v. Dunkin (18), Gosling v. Birnie (4) and Hawes v. Watson (19), in which a bailee, who, by attorning to a purchaser of the goods, has, in effect, represented to him that the property has passed to him (though such was not the fact), and has thereby induced him to alter his position and pay the price to his vendor, has been held estopped from denying the property of the person, to whom he has thus attorned, by setting up a title in a third person inconsistent with the representation on which he had induced the plaintiff to act. We in no way question that those cases were rightly decided. But in all these cases the estoppel proceeded on the representation, which was analogous to a warranty of title for good consideration to the purchaser. Now, in the ordinary class of bailments, such as the present, the representation is by the bailor to the bailee that he may safely accept the bailment; and so far as any weight is to be given to the representation, it makes against the estoppel. This is pointed out by Parke, B., in Cheesman v. Exall (7), in the case of a pledge; and is indicated as one of the grounds on which the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas proceeded in Sheridan v. the New Quay Company (6), which was the case of a carrier. The position of an ordinary bailee, where there has been no special contract or misrepresentation on his part, is very analogous to that of a tenant who, having accepted the possession of land from another, is estopped from denying his landlord's title, but whose estoppel ceases when he is evicted by title paramount. This was decided as early as the 44 Eliz., in Shelbury v. Scotsford (20). There the plaintiff sued in assumpsit against the bailee of a horse for the breach of his contract to re-deliver it. The defendant pleaded that J. S., the true owner of the horse, took it from the defendant. After verdict for the defendant, the plaintiff moved in arrest of judgment; but "by Fenner and Yelverton contra; for the matter alleged by the defendant does in law discharge the promise, by reason of the former property of the horse in J. S.; and then it is, as it were, an eviction of the horse out of the defendant's possession, which discharges the promise, as well as an eviction of the lessee for years discharges all rents, bonds and covenants in any sort depending upon the interest." In Wilson v. Anderton (17) Littledale, J. (without referring to Shelbury v. Scotsford (20), but evidently having it in his mind) states the law to the same effect. And accordingly in Hardman v. Willcock (1), in Cheesman v. Exall (7), and in Sheridan v. the New Quay Company (6) a bailee was permitted, under circumstances similar to the present, to set up the jus tertii. It is true that in the first two of these cases the plaintiffs had obtained the goods by a fraud upon the person whose title was set up, whilst in the present case there is nothing in the evidence to shew that the plaintiff, though a wrong-doer, did not honestly believe that he had the right to distrain. But we do not think that this circumstance alters the law on the subject. The position of the bailee is precisely the same, whether his bailor was honestly mistaken as to the rights of the third person, or fraudulently acting in derogation of them. We think that the true ground on which a bailee may set up the jus tertii is that indicated in Shelbury v. Scotsford (20), viz., that the estoppel ceases when the bailment on which it is founded is determined by what is equivalent to an eviction by title paramount. It is not enough that the bailee has become aware of the title of a third person. We agree in what is said in Betteley v. Reed (16), that "to allow a depository of goods or money, who has acknowledged the title of one person, to set up the title of another who makes no claim or has abandoned all claim, would enable the depository to keep for himself that to which he does not pretend to have any title in himself whatsoever." Nor is it enough that an adverse claim is made upon him, so that he may be entitled to relief under an interpleader. We assent to what is said by Pollock, C.B., in Thorne v. Tylbury (21), that a bailee can set up the title of another only "if he defends upon the right and title and by the authority of that person." Thus restricted, we think the doctrine is supported both by principle and authority, and will not be found in practice to produce any inconvenient consequences.

Guarantie, when not continuing after Change in Partners — Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97. s. 4.

The Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 97.) s. 4,—which enacts that no promise for the debt or default of another made to a firm consisting of two or more persons, or to a single person trading under the name of a firm, or for the debt or default of such a firm, shall be binding in respect of anything done after a change in any one or more of the persons constituting the firm, or the person trading under the name of the firm, unless the intention of the parties that such promise shall continue notwithstanding such change, shall appear either by express stipulation, or by necessary implication from the nature of the firm or otherwise,—is only an affirmance of the law of England previous to the statute.

Three persons carried on the business of ship-builders under the name of "G. W. & W. J. Hall." No person of that name had been in the partnership for some time, and the plaintiff and defendant being both aware of the constitution of the partnership, the defendant gave the plaintiff the following guarantee:—"In consideration that you have at my instance and request consented to open an account with the firm of G. W. & W. J. Hall, ship-builders, I hereby guarantee the payment to you of the monies that at any time may become due not exceeding 5,000l."—Held, that the guarantee ceased on the death of one of the partners, as a contrary intention did not appear by express stipulation, or by necessary implication from the nature of the firm or otherwise.

This was an action brought by the plaintiffs to recover from the defendant 5,000l., alleged to be payable under a guarantee; and the following CASE was stated without pleadings.

1. For some years before 1840 George Wilkin Hall and William Joseph Hall, brothers of the defendant, carried on business, in co-partnership, as ship-builders, at Sunderland, under the style and form of "G. W. & W. J. Hall."

2. and 3. On the 25th of October 1840, W. J. Hall died. After his death the business continued to be carried on by the surviving partner together with the widow, Sarah Hall, and the defendant, as executors of the deceased partner, under the name and style of "G. W. & W. J. Hall."

4. On the 18th of December 1856, G. W. Hall died.

5. For some years after the death of W. J. Hall, the surviving partner in the original firm, G. W. Hall, acted as manager of the firm of "G. W. & W. J. Hall," receiving a yearly salary of 400*l.* for his services; and for a few years prior to the death of G. W. Hall he and the defendant had the joint management of the business of the firm. After the death of G. W. Hall, the defendant, together with Sarah Hall, the widow of W. J. Hall, and Elizabeth, widow of G. W. Hall, continued to carry on the business under the same style, and the defendant continued, as manager, to receive a salary.

6. On the 31st of December 1857, the partnership then subsisting between James Hall, the son and sole executor of G. W. Hall, and the defendant and Sarah Hall, the executors of W. J. Hall, was dissolved, and an arrangement made by which the business was to be, for the future, carried on under the style or firm of "G. W. & W. J. Hall," by Sarah Hall and Elizabeth Hall, and their nephew, George S. Moore. The defendant, at the same time, ceased to act as manager of the business. Notice of this newly-arranged partnership and its position was given by circular.

7. In February 1858, G. S. Moore applied to the plaintiffs, who had then opened a branch bank at Sunderland, to give the firm accommodation by allowing them to open an account to be overdrawn to the extent of 5,000*l.*

8. This the plaintiffs consented to do upon receiving the joint and several guarantie of the defendant and G. S. Moore; and accordingly, on the 25th of February 1858, the defendant and G. S. Moore gave to the plaintiffs the following guarantie:

"Sunderland, Feb. 25, 1858.

To Messrs. Backhouse & Co., Bankers.

Gentlemen,—In consideration that you have at our instance and request consented to open an account with the firm of G. W. & W. J. Hall, ship-builders, Monkwearmouth, we and each of us do hereby guarantee the payment to you of the monies that at any time may become due, not exceeding 5,000*l.*, such payment by us not to be made at a shorter date than twelve months from this date.

(Signed)

G. S. Moore,
J. C. Hall.

We request you to become guarantie for us in manner set out.

Elizabeth Hall,
Sarah Hall."

9. In pursuance of this guarantie the plaintiffs from time to time gave accommodation to the firm of G. W. & W. J. Hall, and the firm thereby became indebted to the plaintiffs on a balance of account in a sum which on the 17th of September 1858 exceeded 5,000*l.*

10. On the 5th of July 1858, Elizabeth Hall died. This was known to the defendant at the time, but was not known to the plaintiffs until the year 1862. At the date of the death of E. Hall, the balance of account due from the firm of G. W. & W. J. Hall was 3,236*l.* 6*s.* 9*d.*

11. After the death of E. Hall, the business of the firm of G. W. & W. J. Hall was carried on under that style as before by the surviving partners, S. Hall & G. S. Moore, and the plaintiffs as before kept the accounts of them as continued accounts.

12. On the 2nd of July 1861, the plaintiffs received from the defendant's attorney a letter, giving them notice that the defendant "would not hold himself liable to them after the receipt of this notice, for any monies to be hereafter advanced by them to the firm of G. W. & W. J. Hall."

14. On the 2nd of July 1861, the balance of account due to the plaintiffs exceeded the sum of 5,000*l.* The whole of the advances upon which this balance accrued were made subsequently to the death of Elizabeth Hall.

15. The defendant in no other way, if at all, made himself responsible for that or any other balance unless by virtue of his guarantie of the 25th of February 1858.

16. The firm of G. W. & W. J. Hall stopped payment on the 17th of February 1862.

17. The Court is to be at liberty to draw all inferences of fact which a jury might draw.

18. The question for the consideration of the Court is, whether under the circumstances hereinbefore stated the defendant is liable under his guarantie to pay to the plaintiffs any and what portion of the balance due to the plaintiffs from the firm of G. W. & W. J. Hall on the 2nd of July 1861.

Bovill (Karslake and Hannen with him), for the plaintiffs.—The question turns on the construction of the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97. s. 4, which enacts that "No promise to answer for the debt &c. of a firm consisting of two or more persons shall be binding on the person making the promise in respect of anything done after a change shall have taken place in the persons constituting the firm, unless the intention of the parties, that the promise shall continue to be binding notwithstanding such change, shall appear either by express stipulation, or by necessary implication from the nature of the firm or otherwise." Here the guarantie was given, not for money to be advanced to the individuals trading under the firm, but to the firm of G. W. & W. J. Hall, all parties knowing that this was merely the name of the firm, and that none of the individuals composing it were of that name, and that the firm had been constantly changing. It therefore appears from the nature of the firm and otherwise that the guarantie was intended to be continuing.

[BLACKBURN, J.—It would appear that the statute, as far as the law of England is concerned, has made no difference.]

Lusk (Watkin Williams with him), contra.—Before the statute a guarantie was at an end in case of any change in the firm to whom or on whose behalf it was given—Weston v. Barton (1), Simson v. Cooke (2). Barclay v. Lucas (3), which is a contrary decision, must be taken as overruled, as pointed out by Mansfield, C.J. in Weston v. Barton (1).

[BLACKBURN, J.—In Chitty on Contracts, 473, 7th edit., it is said, "Before the statute 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97. it appears to have been held that when the security is given to a house, e. g. to a banking-house, and not to the members of a firm by name, the surety would still continue liable, notwithstanding a change of partners": for which is cited in the note "Barclay v. Lucas (3); and see Metcalf v. Bruin (4), and, per Curiam, Chapman v. Beckington" (5). And it is added, "Barclay v. Lucas (3) has been doubted; see 1 New Rep. 42; 4 Taunt. 681. But it gives the true principle, viz., that if the words shew an intention that the security should continue, notwithstanding the accession of a new partner, the surety shall be liable."]

The editor of Chitty is mistaken as to Barclay v. Lucas (4), for the bond was there to the plaintiffs as individuals, and not to the firm.

[BLACKBURN, J.—In the notes to Arlington v. Merrick (6) Serjeant Williams cites Barclay v. Lucas (3) as good law; and there is no expression to the contrary in the notes to Mr. Justice Patteson's edition.]

Barclay v. Lucas (3) must be considered to be virtually overruled, as a misapplication of the true principle on which such cases are to be decided, viz., that the intention that the guarantie shall continue must distinctly appear from express stipulation or other expressions in the instrument itself, or from the nature of the firm; see the notes 3 Dougl. 326, citing amongst other cases Strange v. Lee (7).

Bovill, in reply.—In Weston v. Barton (1) and Simson v. Cooke (2) the individual members of the partnership, and not the firm, were named.

[BLACKBURN, J.—In Metcalf v. Bruin (4) it was decided that the guarantie continued, because the intention appeared on the face of the document that the guarantie was to be for faithful service to the company, which was a fluctuating body; and Lord Ellenborough and Grose, J. put it expressly on the intention appearing, which the Lord Chief Justice says was the principle on which Barclay v. Lucas (3) proceeded. Is there anything in the nature of this firm different from that of any other firm, where persons carry on business in the name of a "firm" instead of the names of the actual partners?]

1 Bell's Commentaries, pp. 374–5, (p. 285, 6th edit.) on the law of Scotland as to guaranties, was also cited; and Smith's Mercantile Law, 5th edit. p. 54, n., as to the law of England before the statute.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of opinion that our judgment ought to be for the defendant. The action is brought on a guarantie made in February 1858, and signed by the defendant and another in the following terms.—[The learned Judge read the guarantie.]—At the time it was made the firm of G. W. & W. J. Hall had long ceased to be carried on by the persons of that name, but the business had for very many years been carried on in that name by different persons, and several changes in the actual partners had occurred, and at the time the guarantie was given the firm consisted of two widows and a third person; and all parties knew that. Afterwards one of the three partners died. The defendant was aware of that, but the plaintiffs were not, and the business was still carried on as before; it was not shewn that there was any duty on the defendant to disclose the death to the plaintiffs, nor that the defendant concealed the death; but the plaintiffs not knowing of it had no opportunity of exercising their option of whether they would continue their advances; but this can have no effect on the construction of the guarantie. The amount due at the time of the death has been paid off, but further advances have been made by the plaintiffs, and there is due a sum exceeding the amount guaranteed; and the question is, whether since the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, the guarantie was continuing after the death of Elizabeth Hall, so as to be binding on the defendant to make good these further advances. Before the act passed it had been well established that a guarantie was not a continuing guarantie, so as to remain in force after the death of a member of a firm to or for whom it was given, unless it appeared by the terms of the instrument that it was the intention of the parties that it should so continue. Now, when this intention appeared by express stipulation in the instrument itself from the terms used, as when the firm was named, with the addition "and their successors," there was no difficulty. But when there was no such addition, as in Barclay v. Lucas (3) it has been doubted whether the intention was sufficiently expressed; and on the present occasion it is unnecessary for us to give any decisive opinion on that case, as the two cases are very different. In Metcalf v. Bruin (4) the guarantie was given to trustees for the Globe Insurance Company, a non-corporate body; and the guarantie was for the faithful service to that body, and that the servant would faithfully account and pay over any balance in his hands to the company, or the directors for the time being; and the Court of King's Bench held that it sufficiently appeared to be the intention that the guarantie should be for faithful service to the fluctuating body who should from time to time constitute the company; and on the ground that the intention appeared from necessary implication on the face of the bond and the nature of the business, the plaintiff recovered as on a continuing guarantie. Then comes the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, not apparently altering the English law as settled by decided cases, but intended to make the law of Great Britain uniform: the Scotch law, if it differed, being assimilated to the English by c. 60. of the same session, s. 7. The 4th section of the English Act is as follows.—[The learned Judge read the material parts of the section.]—That does not alter the law, but fixes it at what the decisions had previously said was the law. The enacting part says that the change in a firm shall put an end to a guarantie: that was what decided cases had always said; and the saving clause is simply, that where there is an express stipulation, or as in Metcalf v. Bruin (4) a manifest intention appears, the guarantie shall continue notwithstanding the change, as it is obviously right and just that it should. The question, therefore, is simply, does the intention that the guarantie should continue appear by express stipulation, or by necessary implication from the nature of the firm, or otherwise? Now, there is certainly no express stipulation, and there is nothing in the nature of the firm beyond those incidents common to every partnership—that the partners had changed and might again change. If it was really intended that the guarantie should be a continuing one for the firm, a very few additional words would have shewn that intention. If the defendant was at one time under the impression that he was bound by the guarantie as a continuing guarantie, that can have no effect upon the construction that is to be put upon the contract from its terms, or by necessary implication from the nature of the firm. Although it is, therefore, hard upon the plaintiffs, there must be judgment for the defendant.

 April 28; } bankrupt, v. HUDSON.
 May 5. }

Sale of Goods—Statute of Frauds—Acceptance—Vendor and Vendee—Bankruptcy—Title of Assignees to accept—Possession, Order or Disposition—12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. s. 125.—Stoppage in Transitu.

To make a valid verbal contract for the sale of goods above the value of 10l. where nothing has been given to bind the bargain or by way of part payment binding upon the vendee, there must be an acceptance and actual receipt, and such acceptance must be made with the consent of the vendor; and until such acceptance, the property in the goods is not changed and the vendor may exercise his right to rescind the contract. And if under such circumstances the contract has been rescinded, no act on the part of the vendee, or of his assignees in case of his subsequent bankruptcy, can effect an acceptance so as to change the property in the goods.

Goods purchased under such a contract and sent by the vendor to a railway station, consigned to the order of the vendee, are not, whilst lying at the station, waiting the order of the vendee, and before any order given or other act done by him constituting an acceptance of the goods, in his "possession, order or disposition," with the consent of the true owner, so as, upon his bankruptcy, to give his assignees any right to them under the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. s. 125, notwithstanding the goods were no longer in transitu, and the right of stoppage therefore did not exist.

The following CASE was stated by consent without pleadings.

In this action the plaintiffs seek to recover the sum of 80*l.*, being the value of 48½ quarters of barley.

1. The bankrupt, John Willden the younger, for some time prior to November 1863, carried on business as a corn-merchant at East Dereham, county Norfolk. The defendant is a farmer residing at Castle Acre in the same county.

2. The defendant on the 3rd of November 1863, at the market at King's Lynn, entered into a verbal contract with the bankrupt to sell him 48½ quarters of barley, at 35*s.* per quarter,—as stated in the an-nexed examination of the defendant before the Court of Bankruptcy, the whole of which is to be taken as part of this case,—the price amounting to 84*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*; there was no written contract and no payment on account. The sale was by sample, and the bulk was taken on the 7th of November by the defendant in his own waggons to the goods-shed of the Swaffham Railway Station, and left on the platform there with a delivery-note in his own handwriting in the words following: "Great Eastern Railway. To the Station Master, Swaffham Station. November 7th, 1863. Receive 97 coombs of barley, consigned to the order of Mr. Willden, of Dereham, from Thomas Moore Hudson, Castle Acre, charges."

3. No receipt was given by the railway company for the corn.

4. It is the custom of the trade for the buyer to compare the sample with the bulk as delivered, and if the examination is not satisfactory to strike it, i. e. either refuse to accept it or allow it to remain as the property of the vendor; and notwithstanding the delivery of the bulk by the defendant at the Swaffham station, it was in the power of the bankrupt to strike the corn if it had not proved according to sample on examination by him or on his behalf.

5. On the 9th of November the bankrupt was adjudicated a bankrupt on his own petition filed on that day.

6. No portion of the corn was paid for. On the 11th of November the defendant gave a verbal notice to the station-master at Swaffham not to deliver the corn into the possession of the bankrupt or his assignees, or any other person without his (Hudson's) written consent, but to deliver the same to him or his order, and subsequently on the same day gave a written notice to the station-master to the same effect. The station-master promised the defendant that no one should remove the corn without his instructions.

7. At the time these notices were given the corn was still on the platform of the goods-shed at the station; the bankrupt had given no orders or directions respecting it, nor had he examined it to see whether the bulk corresponded with the sample, nor had he given any notice to the defendant that he accepted or declined the corn.

8. No demurrage was charged by the railway company in respect of the corn. It was the custom of the company to charge demurrage on corn or other goods left at the station for upwards of five days, but not for any shorter period.

9. On the 1st of December the plaintiffs were duly appointed assignees of the bankrupt, and on the same day they gave notice to the railway company that they claimed all the corn which had been left by various persons to the order of the bankrupt at the different stations of the railway.

10. The railway company, on being indemnified by the defendant, delivered the 48½ quarters of barley to him on the 5th of December 1863.

11. The plaintiffs, as such assignees, contend that there was a perfect delivery of the barley to the bankrupt; that the transitus was at an end, and that the property in the corn passed to them as such assignees.

12. They also claim to be entitled to the corn, as being, under the circumstances above stated, in the order and disposition of the bankrupt at the time of his bankruptcy.

13. The defendant contests the above claim altogether.

14. The question for the opinion of the Court is, whether the plaintiffs, under the circumstances above stated, were entitled to the barley.

15. If the Court shall be of that opinion, then the sum of 80*l.*, the value of the barley, is to be paid by the defendant, together with the costs of this action.

16. If the Court shall be of opinion that the plaintiffs were not entitled to the barley, then the plaintiffs are to pay the defendant the costs of this action.

The examination of the defendant was as follows: "I sold to the bankrupt 48½ quarters of barley on the 3rd of November 1863. The sale was at Lynn; the price was 35*s.* per quarter. I undertook to deliver the barley at the Swaffham station at my own expense; when I say I undertook, I mean that it was usual for me to do so. I had several prior dealings with the bankrupt, in which I delivered the corn to the order of the bankrupt to Swaffham station. The delivery-note was in writing. I have not the delivery-note. I sent this corn in my own waggon to the Swaffham station on the 7th of November 1863, with the delivery-note in my own handwriting. Having heard that Mr. Willden had become bankrupt, I verbally and also by writing gave notice to the station-master at Swaffham not to deliver the corn, and claimed to have it returned to me, and it was given up to me on the 5th of December 1863, on my undertaking to indemnify the railway company. I believe it was the bankrupt's practice to have corn which he purchased sent to his order at the railway station, and to forward such corn from the station to the person for whom he purchased. The bankrupt had no warehouse in which he could store it. The value of the corn which I received back from the railway company was about 2*s.* a quarter less when I received it back than when I sold it."

Mellish, for the plaintiffs (April 25).—First, there clearly could be no stoppage in transitu. The goods were delivered by the vendor to the railway company, not as carriers, but as warehousemen for the vendee; and therefore, as far as the vendor and vendee were concerned, the transitus was at an end. Secondly, there was an acceptance within the Statute of Frauds, either by the bankrupt or his assignees. Four days elapsed between the delivery at the station and the demand by the defendant; mere lapse of time is evidence of acceptance. When there has been an acceptance, the evidence required by the statute is complete; and the contract having been good from the first, the case is as if the statute had never passed. This is shewn by Bailey v. Sweeting (1). There is no case in which there had been an actual delivery by the vendor to the vendee, and it has been held that before acceptance the vendor could disaffirm the contract and demand the goods back. Taylor v. Wakefield (2) will be relied upon by the other side; but in that case there had been no delivery; the goods at the time of the bargain were in the hands of the purchaser as bailees. In Morton v. Tibbett (3) the goods had never been seen by the vendee, and the mere subsale was there held evidence of acceptance without more.

[BLACKBURN, J.—Meredith v. Meigh (4) is very like this case, and it was there held that a delivery such as would support a count for goods sold and delivered, the vendee doing nothing, was not evidence of acceptance. In Cusack v. Robinson (5) it was held that the acceptance might be before delivery; but there the vendee had seen and agreed to take the specific goods; in the present case the vendee had only seen the sample.]

In Bushell v. Wheeler (6), after a delivery at the warehouse of the vendee's agent, the mere lapse of time was held evidence of acceptance. Thirdly, if the property in the barley remained in the vendor, then it was in the order and disposition of the bankrupt with the consent of the true owner.

Gray (J. Brown with him), for the defendant.—No doubt the transitus was at an end; the first point, therefore, is not available to the defendant. Secondly, there was no evidence of acceptance; the contract therefore was "not good"; and the property therefore remained in the vendor, and he had a right to demand possession from the railway company.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—Is there any case where the buyer claims performance of the contract, and the seller has been held able to repudiate the contract and say Give me back my goods?]

Taylor v. Wakefield (2) is precisely that case. It is a direct authority that until there is a binding agreement signed, or the other requisites of the statute complied with, either party may recede. Unless the sale be of a specific chattel, no property passes by the mere delivery to the agent of the vendee—Godts v. Rose (7). In Norman v. Phillips (8) timber was sent by railway and arrived at the vendee's station, and the invoice was sent to the vendee, who kept it more than a month, and yet it was held there was no evidence on which the jury ought to find an acceptance. Hunt v. Hecht (9) is a distinct authority that there can be no acceptance unless the vendee has had an opportunity of examining the goods and seeing whether they correspond with the sample or order.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—In the considered judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench all the cases are examined, and the conclusion come to is directly contrary to Hunt v. Hecht (9).]

In Nicholson v. Bower (10) the vendee had actually examined a bulk sample, and found it to correspond, and yet it was held that this did not amount to an acceptance per se.

Gray continued his argument (May 5).—First, there was no valid contract by the Statute of Frauds to pass the property in these goods to the bankrupt. The possession of the carriers at the time of the bankruptcy was the possession of the vendor, the defendant, because there never had been any acceptance at that time to give validity to the contract of sale. The carriers had no power to accept the goods so as to bind the vendee. The case of Bailey v. Sweeting (1) is distinguishable from the present case. There the vendee was the person to make the acknowledgment in writing, and he did so; but here the carriers (the railway company) had no authority to bind the vendee by acceptance at the time of the bankruptcy. They were the agents of the vendor and not of the vendee. Then, further, to constitute a binding acceptance within the statute, there must be a consent of both vendor and vendee at the time of acceptance; but here the consent of the vendor was withdrawn before anything was done which could constitute acceptance by the vendee or the carriers as his agents—Taylor v. Wakefield (2); the reason of which decision is given by Willes, J., at page 152 of 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P., to have been on that ground. Next the corn did not pass to the assignees under the bankruptcy as being in the order and disposition of the bankrupt. By the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. s. 125, "if any bankrupt at the time he becomes bankrupt shall by consent and permission of the true owner thereof have in his possession, order or disposition any goods or chattels whereof he was reputed owner, or," &c., "the Court shall have power to order the same to be sold and disposed of for the benefit of the creditors under the bankruptcy." First, the corn was not in the possession, order or disposition of the bankrupt at the time of his bankruptcy; secondly, if there was any possession of any sort in the bankrupt, it was not such a possession, &c. as is contemplated by the statute; thirdly, there was no such reputation of ownership as to make the bankrupt reputed owner; fourthly, there was no consent of the true owner to the bankrupt's possession, order or disposition of the corn as owner thereof. The bankrupt had no possession, order or disposition at the time of bankruptcy.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—An order was given to the railway company telling them to give possession to the bankrupt.]

But there was no contract upon which the order to give possession was founded.

[BLACKBURN, J.—I am inclined to think there might be a contract in fact.]

But whether there was a contract in fact or not makes no difference in this respect, if it is not rendered valid in law. When the defendant rescinded the contract, it was as if the owner had sent the goods by mistake to be delivered to the bankrupt; there would then be no possession, order or disposition in the bankrupt.

[BLACKBURN, J.—I agree a mistaken consent is no consent. COCKBURN, C.J.—There was no extinction of the contract at the time of the bankruptcy.]

It is as if the goods had been consumed by fire.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—But at the time of the bankruptcy the bankrupt might have gone to the station, and by an order have disposed of the goods. No consent of the owner would have been necessary.]

Such a test is not sufficient to try whether the possession, &c. is a possession under the statute. For if there was any possession, there was no such possession as to satisfy the statute. Mere possession is not enough. Possession of goods sent to the bankrupt "on sale or return" is not an acceptance so as to change the property or make them in the order and disposition of the bankrupt within the old statute of 21 Jac. 1. c. 19.—Gibson v. Bray (11). The observations of Gibbs, C.J. in that case as to what possession would be within that statute are worthy of attention, though he was overruled as to the particular point of his ruling in that case. The same case is reported in Banc, 8 Taunt. 76, and Dallas, J. points out in his judgment that it is a fallacy to say that mere possession of goods by a bankrupt by means whereof a false credit may arise is a sufficient possession, by declaring that the possession of factors, trustees and others is not sufficient; and he says, "The true question is, whether the bankrupt, having the goods in his power, has taken upon himself the order and disposition thereof."

[BLACKBURN, J.—It is properly admitted that the transitus by the railway company was terminated, because they held them at the order or disposition of the bankrupt. Is not such an order or disposition within the statute? SHEE, J.—The order or disposition must be as reputed owner with the consent of the true owner.]

There was no reputation of ownership. The bankrupt never came near and never accepted the corn, and no one but the railway company knew that it was for him. The character of the possession of the railway company may depend upon what may take place subsequently; thus, if the vendee authorizes the vendor to send goods by a railway company, and there is a valid contract, the possession of the railway company is the possession of the vendee; but here, to constitute a valid contract acceptance was wanting, and there was no acceptance by the vendee. Thus in Meredith v. Meigh (4), where goods above 10*l.* in value were verbally ordered to be shipped on board a vessel selected by the vendor, for which a bill of lading was signed and sent to vendees, but the vendees did and said nothing, and the goods perished at sea, the goods were held to be at the loss of the vendor, as there was no acceptance within the statute, and from the judgment of Erle, J., that what would constitute good evidence of a delivery of goods to satisfy a count for goods sold and delivered would not be sufficient to make an acceptance and receipt within the Statute of Frauds. In Hart v. Bush (12), the vendee, under a verbal order, named the wharf to which the goods were to be sent for transmission to him by sea, yet a delivery at that wharf did not constitute an acceptance and receipt within the Statute of Frauds. So here, there was no acceptance and receipt, and therefore no possession by the bankrupt or any one as his agent.

[BLACKBURN, J.—The cases of Hart v. Bush (12) and Meredith v. Meigh (4) mean there may be a receipt or delivery, but yet no acceptance and receipt within the statute.]

But then to make a delivery to a carrier a good delivery, the delivery must have been under a contract, by which the carrier is to receive; but here, there being no contract, there was no delivery or receipt by the carrier for the bankrupt, but a delivery to some one or other who became thereby bailee for the vendor. Next, there must be a consent on the part of the vendor to the vendee holding the goods as the goods of the vendor; but here, as far as there ever was any consent, it was a consent to the vendee holding the goods under the contract as his, the vendee's, goods.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—The intention was, that the goods should be held by the vendee as under the contract, that is, if the contract was carried out, and with a right to have them again if it was not performed.]

In Load v. Green (13), the decision turned on the question whether the true owners of the goods consented to the apparent ownership as such of the bankrupts. The consent there was, the bankrupt should hold them as his own under a contract of sale, which the vendors after the bankruptcy were enabled to annul on the ground of fraud.

[SHERR, J.—A party to be bound must be a party to consent to the property being held so as to give a false appearance.]

In Wilkins v. Bromhead (14), there was a consent to the possession by the bankrupt but not to ownership, and shews that there must be a consent to possession as reputed owners.

[BLACKBURN, J.—There the bankrupt had declared as well as he could do that he was not the owner.]

The meaning of this provision is well explained by Lord Redesdale in Joy v. Campbell (15).

Mellish, in reply.—First, with respect to the Statute of Frauds. Upon a verbal contract and delivery to purchaser or his agent the seller cannot by simple notice require the re-delivery, so as to prevent the purchaser receiving them so as to amount to an acceptance. The cases cited only shew a delivery without any acceptance—Taylor v. Wakefield (2). The carriers were the agents here for the vendee, and held the goods in that character, therefore no notice could prevent an acceptance in fact. The effect of a receipt and acceptance of goods under a contract within the statute is to refer back to the original making of the contract, in fact, and put the rights of the parties on the same footing as if there had been a valid contract from the beginning and the act had never passed, for these facts are only required as corroborative evidence of the contract, therefore it is that the vendor under a parol contract within the statute sues if the carrier loses the goods on their conveyance to their destination and before acceptance by the vendee, but if the goods are merely injured in the carriage before delivery and the vendee accepts them, the vendee sues for the injury. The only question is, whether there has been an acceptance de facto or not, at any time would do—Bailey v. Sweeting (1) which supports the retrospective operation of this contract.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—I should be sorry to extend Bailey v. Sweeting (1) one jot further. BLACKBURN, J.—Suppose the vendor to have an action of trover against the company for non-delivery of goods, can that vested right of action be taken away by a subsequent acceptance by the vendee? COCKBURN, C.J.—We need not go so far; the question is, whether up to the time of acceptance the contract may not be repudiated by either party.]

It cannot. There always is a contract, and the corroborative facts are only required as evidence of its existence.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—The terms of the company's answer and the seller's notice amount to a rescission on the part of the vendor, with consent of the warehouseman. There is no contract till subsequent acceptance.]

Yes, there always was a contract. The rules of pleading are in favour of the plaintiffs. Upon acceptance, there may be an action with reference to a breach of contract committed before acceptance. Take the case of a purchaser not bound, but a vendor bound by a note in writing, when the purchaser does the corroborating act, then the vendor is bound from the first. But the vendee here accepted the goods through the railway company, for by doing nothing for a sufficiently long time he may shew acceptance. The amount of time is a question of degree.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—But here the goods were bought three days before the bankruptcy; surely not long enough to make an acceptance by merely doing nothing.]

In Norman v. Phillips (8) there was no acceptance, because the purchaser refused to take the goods on the day of the arrival of the goods; and the reasons of Alderson, B., that an acceptance within the statute must be such as to preclude the purchaser from objecting to the quality of the goods, was dissented from in Morton v. Tibbett (3). In Hunt v. Hecht (9), which conflicts to a great extent with Morton v. Tibbett (3), something remained to be done before acceptance could take place. Nicholson v. Bower (10) turns on refusal. Then, the assignees might adopt the contract—Scott v. Pettit (16). Lord Alvanley there goes into the question how far the assignees may take possession of goods, though consignors could not come in under the commission; and refers to Ellis v. Hunt (17) to shew that bankruptcy was no countermand of the order, and says that “for the purpose of receiving goods the assignees stand in the place of the bankrupt.”

The possession of the railway company, under the circumstances of this case, is the possession of the bankrupt, and he is therefore apparent owner.

[BLACKBURN, J.—I cannot help feeling a doubt whether the credit of a bankrupt depends upon possession as apparent owner, but still the law is so. MELLOR, J.—The intention was, that he should be true owner, and not that his possession should be as reputed owner. COCKBURN, C.J.—They must be in his order and disposition, with the consent of the true owner, otherwise, the goods being sent, the vendor would lose them, though the bankrupt refused to accept and pay for them. BLACKBURN, J., referring to the fourth paragraph of the case, said, the practice being known, would they be reputed to be his when it was known that the goods were only sent on the 7th or 8th of November?]

But though it was a sale by sample, a person ought not therefore to suppose that the bulk would not agree with the sample. In Gibson v. Bray (11) a distinction was alluded to between the possession of factors and of trustees. He then referred to Meredith v. Meigh (4) and Hart v. Bush (12). If the purchaser orders goods verbally to be sent by the carrier, and afterwards the vendor comes to the carrier and orders him to give them back, the carrier might refuse to do so.

(Gray referred to the case of Scott v. Pettit (16), and said that in that case there was a contract; but that assignees, where there is no contract, cannot take upon themselves to accept.)

COCKBURN, C.J.—This case has been argued with great ability and learning on both sides. Our judgment ought to be for the defendant. The first question raised was, whether the defendant was entitled to stop the goods, as being in transitu. This point was properly given up by the defendant, for clearly the transitus had ceased. The goods had arrived at the place which as between buyer and seller was the place of their destination; therefore the transitus was at an end. Then, at the time the defendant demanded possession of the goods, was the property in him so as to give him the right to get possession? That depends upon whether the Statute of Frauds had been satisfied. But did the delivery by the defendant to the railway company under the arrangement between them in itself make a receipt and acceptance under that statute? I think not. The cases of Hart v. Bush (12) and Hunt v. Hecht (9) are conclusive authorities to shew that a delivery to the railway company was not a receipt and acceptance by the buyer. In the former case brandy had been delivered at a vault to be put on board ship to be conveyed to the place where the buyer carried on business, and it was held, that there was no acceptance of the brandy. Here goods were given to the railway company to be carried to another place to the order of the buyer. The case of Hunt v. Hecht (9) goes a step further, and is binding on us. There the buyer had a right to inspect the articles sold, to see if they were in accordance with the contract, and it was held that there was no acceptance until he had had time to see whether they were so or not. The other point then presents itself, namely, as to whether the assignees of the buyer were entitled to be put in the bankrupt buyer's place for the purpose of accepting the goods, and so to take the case out of the Statute of Frauds. I assume that they would have a right as assignees to perfect a right or interest of the bankrupt inchoate at the time of bankruptcy. If so, was the bankrupt in such a condition as to be able to accept these goods at the time of bankruptcy? and that depends upon the Statute of Frauds. Assuming that there had been no acceptance and receipt by the buyer, I think without acceptance there is no valid contract, that is to say, no contract binding upon either party. It is clear that until acceptance, no property can pass; the property therefore remains in the seller until acceptance, and he had a right to exercise that right of property and did so, and the railway admitted his right. I think this put an end to the contract. Now comes the question whether these goods were left in the order and disposition, and I think the case of Load v. Green (13) quite disposes of that question. I approve of that case. There must be a consent of the seller that the buyer should be considered merely ostensible owner; but here, I think, the consent was to his being vendee.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. This case does not depend upon stoppage in transitu; and if the Statute of Frauds had been satisfied, the goods would have belonged to the purchaser. But there must have been both acceptance and receipt to bind both purchaser and vendor under that statute. The delivery to the railway was on the 7th of November; the goods lie at the station till the 9th, on which day the bankruptcy occurred. The bankrupt never meddled with the goods, but I think there would have been some evidence of acceptance, as in Morton v. Tibbett (3), which establishes that lapse of time is some evidence. But here shortness of time and position of vendee negative such an assumption. Assuming that the contract was not made good by acceptance, according to Meredith v. Meigh (4), if the goods had perished by accident, it would have been the loss of the vendor, because the property had not passed and still remained in him. From the 9th of November to the 1st of December the goods remained the vendor's, and he then demanded them from the company. They did not refuse them, but said they would not part with them without giving him notice. After that, could there be any subsequent acceptance without the consent of the vendor? Bailey v. Sweeting (1) does not affect the present case unless there was an acceptance. If the vendor had permitted the vendee to take them, it might have been an acceptance; but after what happened there could not be an acceptance, because I think it would require the consent of the vendor to the acceptance. Next, was there order or disposition as reputed owner? Load v. Green (13) decides that the true owner as such must consent that the other side should be reputed owner, not being true owner; but here, I think, the vendor only consented that the bankrupt should have them until he should be true owner. On that ground also I think the defendant is entitled to our judgment in his favour.

MELLOR, J.—This case was a sale of goods by sample over the value of 10*l*. The Statute of Frauds says—[The learned Judge read the section]. Now here the goods so sold were sent to the railway station by order of the buyer, and there must be an acceptance of goods so sold. The purchaser, however, did nothing under the contract, and the vendor countermands his prior directions, and the station-master promises that he will not part with them. All this occurs before any act by the vendee to bind the contract; therefore the property did not pass. As to the other point, I agree to what has been said, that possession under the Bankrupt Act applies to different acts from those in the present case.

THE QUEEN, on the prosecution of THE COMMITTEE OF VISITORS OF THE CAMBRIDGESHIRE, ISLE OF ELY, AND BOROUGH OF CAMBRIDGE LUNATIC ASYLUM, appellants, v. THE OVERSEERS OF THE PARISH OF FULBOURN, respondents.

Poor-Rate — County Lunatic Asylum, Rating of—"Purposes of an Asylum"—16 & 17 Vict. c. 97. s. 35.

A county lunatic asylum, though many pauper lunatics not belonging to the county are confined in it, and some patients not paupers, from both of which classes considerable profits are made, is "used for the purposes of an asylum" within the meaning of the 35th section of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 97, and therefore rateable only at the value at which the land on which it is built was assessed at the time it was purchased.

Land cultivated as farm and garden by the lunatics assisted by skilled labourers, the produce beyond that consumed by the inmates of the asylum being sold and a profit realized, is land used for the purposes of an asylum within the meaning of the above section, if the primary object is not the profit but the healthful employment of the lunatics.

1865. } ALEXANDER v. THE NORTH-
April 25. } EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Libel—Justification—Inaccurate Statement.

The plaintiff charged, as a libel upon him, a notice published by the defendants, a railway company, which stated that the plaintiff had been convicted by Justices of an offence against the defendants' by-laws and fined with an alternative of three weeks' imprisonment; the alternative in the conviction was really fourteen days:—Held, that it was a question for the jury whether the statement charged as libellous was or was not substantially true, and that the inaccuracy of the statement did not necessarily make it libellous.

*Declaration—That the defendants falsely and maliciously wrote and printed and published of the plaintiff the words following—"North-Eastern Railway. Caution. J. Alexander," (meaning the plaintiff) "manufacturer and general merchant, Trafalgar Street, Leeds, was charged before the magistrates of Darlington, on the 28th of September, for riding in a train from Leeds for which his ticket was not available and refusing to pay the proper fare. He was convicted in the penalty of 9*l.* 1*s.* 10*d., including costs, or three weeks' imprisonment."

*Plea—That the plaintiff was convicted before two Justices, for that the plaintiff on the 24th of August, having procured a ticket, did therewith travel on the defendants' railway in a carriage attached to a train other than the train for which it was issued, contrary to the defendants' by-law, made under the authority of their act of parliament, and the Justices adjudged the plaintiff for his said offence to forfeit and pay 1*l.*, to be applied according to law, and 8*l.* 1*s.* 10*d.* costs, and if the said sums should not immediately be paid, the Justices ordered that the same should be levied by distress, and in default of distress they adjudged the plaintiff to be imprisoned for the space of a certain time, to wit, three weeks (1), unless the said sum and all costs*

(1) The plea originally stated, that the Justices adjudged the plaintiff to be imprisoned for the space of fourteen days, and the plaintiff demurred to it; on the argument the Court, after hearing Mellish for the defendants, without calling on Holkar for the plaintiff, allowed the defendants to amend the plea as it now stands.

and charges should be sooner paid, which conviction at the time of the doing by the defendants of what is complained of was in full force.

Replication—Setting out the conviction verbatim, which was as stated in the plea, with the exception that the amount of imprisonment adjudged in default of payment or levy by distress was fourteen days, and not three weeks.

Rejoinder—That the conviction is described with substantial and sufficient accuracy and truth, as well in the words of the publishing of which the plaintiff has complained as in the plea, and that the words so far as they differ in their literal meaning from the words of the conviction are not libellous; and that the words so far as they are libellous appear from the allegations in the plea and from the conviction to be and the same in fact are true in substance.

Demurrer and joinder.

Holker, in support of the demurrer.—The replication shews that in point of fact the plea contained no justification, and the rejoinder does no more than reiterate the plea. The notice charged as libellous is not justified by the plea, the amount of penalty and costs being lumped together, and the length of the alternative imprisonment being larger than that really imposed; both these inaccuracies were likely to create a prejudice against the plaintiff, and would lead the public to believe he had been guilty of a graver offence than that with which he had in fact been charged.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—It is a question for the jury whether the libel was in substance true; but we cannot say as a matter of law that the substitution of three weeks for a fortnight makes the statement libellous; the jury will have to say whether the inaccurate statement would have a different effect on the public than the literal truth. BLACKBURN, J.—When the case was before the Court on the former occasion (1), the defendant, by pleading a conviction and a penalty with the alternative of fourteen days' imprisonment, as a justification to the libel stating the alternative as three weeks' imprisonment, asked the Court to say as a matter of law that the difference could not be libellous. The plaintiff now asks us to say that the difference must be libellous. It is not necessarily libellous, therefore the rejoinder is good.]

Secondly, the plea ought to allege that the conviction is still unreversed—Cuddington v. Wilkins (2).

[BLACKBURN, J.—It is perfectly immaterial whether the conviction is still subsisting or not, for if the plaintiff was convicted, the libel is true. MELLOR, J.—The case in Hobart was that a pardon had been granted, which put the plaintiff in the same position as if he had never committed the offence charged. COCKBURN, C.J.—If the conviction has been quashed and the quashing has the effect contended for, it should have been pleaded.]

Mellish, for the defendants, was not heard.

Game—Trespass in Search of—Dead Game—1 & 2 Will. 4. c. 32. s. 30.

The 30th section of 1 & 2 Will. 4. c. 32, which makes it an offence to "commit a trespass by entering or being in the daytime upon any land in search of game," does not apply to a case where the game alleged to be searched for was dead at the time.

The respondent was shooting upon his own land, when a pheasant rose and flew across the fence which divided it from the land of T. After it had crossed the boundary, the respondent fired at and killed it. It fell upon the land of T, and the respondent went over while it lay dead upon the ground and brought it away. Upon an information laid against him for committing a trespass by being upon the land of T. "in search of game," the Justices dismissed the charge, on the ground that the mere act of entering the land for the purpose of picking up the pheasant, which was then dead, was not such a trespass as was contemplated by the act:—Held, distinguishing Osbond v. Meadows, that the Justices were right in refusing to convict.

May 13.* } WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Carrier—Loss of Parcel—Measure of Damages.

In an action against a carrier for the loss of a parcel of goods, the measure of damages is, in general, the market value of the goods at the place and time at which they ought to have been delivered. If there is no market for the sale of such goods at the place, then the jury must ascertain their value by taking the price at the place of manufacture, together with the cost of carriage, and allowing a reasonable sum for importer's profit.

Rice v. Baxendale (1) commented upon.

Declaration against the defendants as carriers for hire from Leeds to Neath, that the plaintiff delivered to the defendants a package of cloth, at Leeds, to be carried to and delivered at Neath within a reasonable time; that the defendants had not delivered within a reasonable time, nor at all, but the package was wholly lost, through the defendants' negligence; claim, 50*l*.

Plea (March 4, 1865)—Payment of 22*l*. into court.

Replication—Damages ultra. Issue thereon.

The plaintiff's particulars were, cost of cloth, giving the items, amounting to 20*l*. 10*s*. 9*d*. Loss by non-delivery, &c., 12*l*. 12*s*.

At the trial, before Blackburn, J., at the Glamorganshire Spring Assizes, it appeared that the plaintiff was a hawker or dealer in cloth, travelling about the counties of Glamorgan and Carmarthen, and that he bought at Leeds and paid 20*l*. for three lots, chiefly of pilot cloth, the invoice price being 20*l*. 10*s*. 9*d*., the 10*s*. 9*d*. being taken off as discount for ready money.

This bale of goods was delivered to the defendants, at Leeds, about the 6th of November 1864, to be carried to Neath, the carriage not being paid (which it was agreed would be about 5*s*.), but on the plaintiff's arrival there a few days after the bale was not to be found. After some delay for inquiries at the defendants' request, the plaintiff's attorney wrote demanding 25*l*.; but receiving no satisfactory answer, after further delay, caused by the defendants, the action was commenced on the 21st of January, and further correspondence then ensued, and ultimately (on March 4) the defendants pleaded payment into court of 22*l*.

After the above facts had been given in evidence, the plaintiff's counsel was about to go into evidence of special damage, but refrained on the learned Judge intimating that, under the circumstances, he thought it likely to imperil the verdict. The only further evidence given was, that the plaintiff said he could not have bought similar goods at Neath for 25*l*.; but it did not appear that there was any wholesale market for cloth at Neath.

The plaintiff's counsel cited among other cases Rice v. Baxendale (1).

The learned Judge left it to the jury to say what was the value of these goods at Neath, where they ought to have been delivered, which would be something more than the cost at Leeds (and the carriage not, however, paid in this case); but he left it to the jury, as men of sense, to say how much more, including interest, which might be given up to the 4th of March, when the plea was pleaded.

The jury found a verdict for 3*l*. beyond the 22*l*. paid into court; and leave was reserved to enter the verdict for the defendants, if the Court should be of opinion there was no evidence on which the jury could reasonably find more than 22*l*. No appeal without leave of the Court.

A rule having been obtained accordingly, J. W. Bowen shewed cause.—There was ample evidence to justify the jury in finding the damages to be 25*l*.

[BLACKBURN, J.—That is further than the plaintiff need go; it is sufficient for the present rule if they might have found anything beyond 22*l*.]

In the first place the plaintiff is entitled to very liberal interest; the goods ought to have been delivered early in November, and owing to the delay caused by the defendants' acts he did not receive the 22*l*. until the 4th of March. A man in the plaintiff's position would have been able to turn his money half a dozen times in the four months.

* At the Sittings after Term.

(1) 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 371; a.c. 7 Hurl. & N. 96.

[BLACKBURN, J.—No doubt the jury were justified in giving interest, but in the most liberal way the interest on 20*l.* could not amount to 5*l.* for between three and four months.]

At 20*l.* per cent. interest would amount to about 1*l.* 7*s.*; the defendants paid into court 1*l.* 9*s.* 3*d.* beyond the cost price. But the question is, in addition to the interest, what was the value of the goods at Neath?

[BLACKBURN, J.—That is the real question.]

The defendants called no witnesses, and the only evidence on the point was that of the plaintiff himself, who said he could not buy the goods at Neath for 25*l.*

[BLACKBURN, J.—That was his evidence, but I think it may be taken that there was no market at all for such goods at Neath.]

There was no direct evidence as to this. But assuming there was no market, the plaintiff was not bound, as the defendants contended, to send to Leeds for the cloth; he was entitled to buy at the nearest place to the place of consignment, and was clearly entitled as damages to the value of the cloth at Neath, as was decided in Rice v. Bazendale (1). The defendants are liable to all damages which are the natural consequence of their default—Hadley v. Bazendale (2), and as they were bound to deliver the cloth at Neath within a reasonable time, they must pay the expense of replacing it there, that is, the value of the cloth there. This value must be arrived at by leaving the matter generally to the jury; it is impossible to lay down any general rule,—see per Wilde, B. in Gee v. the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company (3). So again, in Black v. Bazendale (4), Parke, B. says, the jury may give any damages which are incurred as the reasonable consequences of the defendants' breach of contract. Again, in Wilson v. the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company (5), it was held that the plaintiff could not recover for the loss of profits he might have made by making the cloth (the article that miscarried) into caps, but that he might recover the loss of the season caused by the delay.

[MELLOR, J.—Was there any loss of season or market here?]

Not exactly, but there was the delay, and the course of dealing shews that the plaintiff could have sold several lots of goods during the interval in which the defendants kept him making inquiries. Now, the cost of the cloth was 20*l.* 10*s.* 9*d.*; 20*l.* per cent. on that for four months would be 1*l.* 7*s.* 4*d.*, and that, with 5*s.* only for carriage, amounts to more than 22*l.* Therefore, on the lowest estimate, the defendants have not paid enough into court, which entitles the plaintiff on this rule to keep his verdict.

Grove, Hardinge Giffard, and Ollivant, in support of the rule.—In the first place, all damage for delay is out of the question, as no evidence as to special damage was admitted, and all that really was left to the jury was the question of the value of the goods at Neath. With regard to the interest, even at the rate of 20*l.* per cent., there would not be sufficient to turn the scale in the plaintiff's favour; for as he only paid 20*l.*, he can only have that sum plus the interest on that sum, and the 10*s.* 9*d.* must go as part of the interest.

[BLACKBURN, J.—On no reasonable computation of interest could the amount be possibly made to exceed 22*l.*]

What, then, was the value of the goods? Ex concessis they were worth 20*l.* 10*s.* 9*d.* at Leeds, and the carriage to Neath would be about 5*s.*, therefore the plaintiff could have been put in the same position as if the goods had been delivered by the payment of 20*l.* 10*s.* 9*d.* plus the carriage; but inasmuch as the carriage in the present case was not paid, that element could not be taken into consideration. Now, what rule have the Courts laid down as the measure of damages? In Hadley v. Bazendale (2) it is stated to be that which may be reasonably in the contemplation of the parties at the time of entering into the contract. That rule is applied in several subsequent cases, and the element of profit cannot be taken into consideration—Wilson v. the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company (5) and Gee v. the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company (3). In both those cases the goods were ultimately delivered, and the only question was the damage for delay, and it was held that loss of profit could not be taken into consideration, but loss by deterioration might. But in both those cases the question was the amount of special damage. Here no special damage was shewn, or claimed, or left to the jury. Here all that the parties contemplated at the time of entering into the contract was the value of the goods. The plaintiff, if he had chosen, might have bought fresh goods at Leeds at once, and the measure of damages is simply the value of the goods. It may be admitted, as decided by the Court of Exchequer in Rice v. Baxendale (1), that the goods would be worth more at the place of consignment than at Leeds; but all that case decides is that the value was something more, and that the plaintiff was entitled to that, but it is impossible to say from the case how much more; and it certainly was not the value at which similar goods could have been purchased at Maidstone, the place of consignment, for the Court directed the verdict for 3*l.*, whereas it was expressly found in the case that the plaintiff could not have procured goods of a like quality at Maidstone at less than 4*l.* 14*s.* 6*d.* beyond the sum paid into court, which was 10*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.*, the price the plaintiffs had paid at Leeds, the place at which the goods were purchased, and from which they were sent.

(2) 9 Exch. Rep. 341; s.c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 179.

(5) 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 232; s.c. 9 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 632.

[BLACKBURN, J.—The judgments of both Pollock, C.B. and Bramwell, B. put the value at Maidstone as the measure of damages; for the latter says, if the Judge had had his attention called to it, he would in all probability have found that it was something more.]

It seems difficult to say how the Court arrived at the 3*l.* The amount of damage which would have been caused by delay in sending for fresh goods from Leeds was given as 3*l.*; but the counsel for the defendants shews that this could not be recovered, because that would in effect be giving damages for loss of profits on re-sale, which was the only loss the delay could have caused. Then, all that the Chief Baron says is, "The only rule we can lay down is, that where goods are sent from A. to B. and are lost, the party entitled to them is entitled to the value at B. It is clear the goods are worth more at Maidstone than at Leeds. Let the verdict be entered for 3*l.*" But it does not appear how this 3*l.* was arrived at. Bramwell, B., not differing from the rest of the Court, shews how this value is to be calculated, viz., not by ascertaining the accidental value at Maidstone, but by finding for what the goods could be got to Maidstone; and that, as in the present case, would be the cost at Leeds plus the carriage.

[BLACKBURN, J.—I confess I do not understand that statement of the learned Judge.]

What the learned Judge seems to mean is, that the measure of damages is not the value at which the goods may be purchased in a shop at Maidstone, for that would include the shopman's profit, but the value at which any one else going to that shopman's market could get the goods to Maidstone, and that would be simply the price at the place of manufacture plus the carriage.

[MELLOR, J.—Supposing the goods manufactured at Leeds were in stock at Neath and you proceeded to buy them there, what you would have to pay to replace the lost goods at Neath would include all these elements; the price at Leeds, the cost of transit to Neath, and the importer's profit at Neath; because no one would import them for the purpose of sale unless he could see his way, not only to repay himself the cost price and cost of transit, but to a reasonable profit to himself. Now, as the goods cannot be replaced at Neath, has not the plaintiff a right to say, the jury must give the price at Leeds, the cost of carriage, and something in respect of the importer's profit?]

The cost at Leeds and the carriage, no doubt; but importer's profit introduces an element of uncertainty, with regard to which carriers cannot be supposed to contract; and at this point the authority of Rice v. Baxendale (1) stops; the value at Maidstone, says the whole Court, is something more than at Leeds; and Bramwell, B., that value is the value at which the goods can be got to Maidstone; and the rest of the Court suggest no other mode of ascertaining the value.

[BLACKBURN, J.—The element of uncertainty arises in ordinary cases. If there is a bale of cotton to be sent to Liverpool and it is lost, the value is at once regulated by the market price. But if the bale is lost on its way to a place where there is no market then you cannot say what is the actual market value at the time, and you are obliged to ascertain it as best you can, by taking into account all the things that are settled by what Sir Robert Peel called the "higgling" of the market. But in Liverpool the importer's profit from America would be taken into account, because no man would import from New Orleans to Liverpool merely to be repaid his costs out of pocket.]

Then the carrier is to be liable for all the fluctuations of the market, which the use of the telegraph now makes daily.

[BLACKBURN, J.—If cotton goods are lost at Manchester, and a telegram came which doubled the price, the carriers should pay that price.]

That would get rid of the rule laid down in Hadley v. Baxendale (2), and the other cases, and the carrier would be liable to all the uncertainties of the market, which are matters of speculation with the tradesman, but about which the carrier can know nothing. The rule must be that the consignee can only recover the actual value of the goods. Any element of profit at once leaves the carrier at the mercy of a jury. The importer's profit may be nothing. He may be at a dead loss.

[BLACKBURN, J.—That would be in favour of the carrier. If at the time the carrier lost, the goods owing to a falling market were of less value, he pays less; but if, owing to the rise of the market, the goods were of greater value, then he must pay more.]

No doubt, if the "market value" at the place, in the widest sense is to be the measure of damage; but in Rice v. Baxendale (6), Bramwell, B. says "What is the loss? It is the value of the goods at Maidstone," and Martin, B. adds, "The loss is the sum at which the goods could be replaced at Maidstone, and the proper mode of replacing them is to purchase them, not of a tradesman, but of the manufacturer."

[BLACKBURN, J.—The judgment of the Court goes further than that, because in the result they do give the plaintiff something more than the cost price at Leeds.]

If importer's profits are to be taken into consideration some evidence ought to have been given, on which the jury could arrive at a reasonable conclusion. Not an atom of evidence was given in the present case.

[MELLOR, J.—The very nature of the case shews that no evidence could be given.—BLACKBURN, J.—In such case the jury must exercise their common sense, as tradesmen and men of business.]

BLACKBURN, J.—In this case we are all of opinion that the rule should be discharged. The leave reserved, there being 22*l.* paid into court, was to enter the verdict for the defendants, if there was no evidence on which the jury could reasonably find more than 22*l.* It appears that the goods originally cost at Leeds, cash down, 20*l.*, the price in the invoice being 20*l.* 10*s.* 9*d.* They were then sent to Neath, where they ought to have arrived early in November, but they were lost, and I think it has been pretty well agreed in the course of this discussion, that the rule laid down in Rice v. Baxendale (1), and as it seems to me, by all the Court there, applies in the present case, that the measure of damages, setting all special damage aside—and no question of special damage was left to the jury—the natural and fair measure of damages would be the value of the goods at the place and time at which they ought to have been delivered. Now, as we have been stating in the course of the argument, the value of the goods at the place of importation consists of that which would be the market value, if there is a market price at that place which regulates what the value would be, and shews what it is. If there is no market at that place,—if from the smallness of the place or the scarcity of the particular goods and other things there is no market price,—the parties have not the means of settling what it would be; but the real value at the time and place would have to be ascertained as a matter of fact by the jury, taking into consideration those circumstances which would otherwise, in the higgling of the market, have shewn the market value. Neath was a place where there was no market, and the jury were therefore to take into consideration those elements. I think it is very clear where there is an actual market, and the goods are actually sold at the market-price, that price is regulated by the importer, not simply by his own costs and charges, but by the average costs and charges, together with the average importer's profit. I cannot doubt that the value of cotton in Liverpool, upon an average, exceeds the value of cotton in the Southern States of America together with the freight and costs and charges; otherwise no one would import it. Importer's profit, therefore, does become an element in the market-price, and, where there is no market, reasonable importer's profit must be taken into account. Then, what is the reasonable importer's profit? No evidence, from the nature of the thing, can well be given, and the jury are to say what they think is fair and reasonable under ordinary circumstances. Here they were an intelligent Swansea jury, and they were all of a class who would know pretty well what were the importer's profits of persons who brought goods from a manufacturing district to a town in Wales. The railway company had paid into court a sum calculated at something less than 10% per cent. on the cost price, to cover interest and everything else. The question reserved is, could the jury find more than 10% per cent. on the cost price? The jury have found 25% damages. I think they were very liberal in doing so, but I cannot take upon myself to say they were wrong.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. After considerable hesitation it appears to me that it is impossible to lay down the rule that the value at Neath, in the absence of any market-price at Neath, must mean the price paid at Leeds plus the freight. There is another element, as I think, which must be taken into consideration, and it is the importer's profit; that is to say, no man brings goods to Neath for the purpose of selling them, without adding to the actual cost something in respect that they are goods which he is dealing in, or about to deal in at Neath, and are not goods being sold at Leeds. This is what I understand, even from my Brother Bramwell's view in the case of Rice v. Baxendale (1), which has been so much relied upon; and I do not think that his opinion is inconsistent with what I am now saying. I think there must be some error in the report of what is attributed to my Brother Bramwell, because there is an apparent inconsistency. He says, "If the Judge's attention had been called to the point, he would have said that the value to the plaintiff at Maidstone would be something more than the value at the place of delivery in law, at Leeds." It is not very clearly expressed in the report, but I think my Brother Bramwell must have acceded to the view that there was something that must be added beyond the mere cost of freight. I am unable to say what it ought to be. The defendants' counsel have contended that there ought to be some evidence on which any estimate we are to form is to be based. I do not see what evidence can be given, and I am afraid, although it leads to some uncertainty, we cannot escape from it, and cannot confine the value at Neath to the mere price at Leeds plus the freight. If so, then the additional quantum must be assessed by the jury. I am bound to say I agree, they seem to have dealt here, as juries generally do with railway companies, with a liberal hand, and have given more than I think was right; but we are not inquiring whether the verdict was right on that ground. The difference between the sum paid into court and the sum the jury have given, would not have induced the Court to grant a rule on the ground of excess of damages; but the question is, to see whether the verdict ought to be entered for the defendants or stand for the plaintiff; and I cannot see that, on the finding of the jury, we can say that the verdict ought to be entered for the defendants by rejecting every other element of computation than the mere cost at Leeds plus the freight.

SHEE, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think when a carrier fails to deliver the goods, which have been intrusted to him to carry for reward, at the time at which they ought to have been delivered, then the person to whom they belong is entitled, within a reasonable time after the failure, to go and purchase similar goods at the place where the railway company or carrier contracted to deliver. If there had been a regular market-price for such goods at that place, then it is clear the plaintiff has sustained no damage beyond the cost which he necessarily incurred in supplying himself with other goods of the same kind. If the place at which the goods ought to have been delivered is a place where there is plenty of such commodities, but none except charged with a profit beyond their prime cost and the cost of their carriage, then the damage he sustains is this higher profit cost to him, though this price be more than the price at which the goods would have stood to him if they had been received at the proper time and place. On the other hand, if there be no market of any kind, no place where the goods can be bought, or no dealer to say what they can be bought for at the place, then we are driven to give a reasonable construction to the words in which the rule is laid down in Hadley v. Bazendale (2), and to judge what damages naturally arise from the breach of such a contract according to the usual course of things, and must ascertain what would be the probable cost, calculating reasonable profits, at which the plaintiff would have been enabled to buy the things he has lost at the place where they ought to have been delivered, that not being a place of manufacture, but a place at which there were dealers who sold goods of that kind at a fair, proper profit on the prime cost at the place of manufacture, and the cost of the carriage. It seems to me it was quite right, on the question of damages, to give the jury direction that they ought to consider what would be the damage arising naturally, that is, according to the usual course of things, upon such a breach of contract; and they might, therefore, very fairly give such damages as they thought the person with whom the contract had been broken would have sustained if there had been the means of purchasing the things at the place of destination, but saddled with something for the profit price.

May 8. } OF HEALTH OF HASTINGS.

Local Board of Health—Purchase of Land—Provisional Order of Secretary of State—11 & 12 Vict. c. 63. and 21 & 22 Vict. c. 98.

A provisional order of a Secretary of State empowering a local board to put in force the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, with respect to the purchase of land, has no validity until it has been confirmed by act of parliament, and cannot be brought up by certiorari in order that it may be quashed.

Rule calling upon the Hastings Local Board of Health to shew cause why a writ of certiorari should not issue to remove into this Court the provisional order of the Secretary of State, and all proceedings connected therewith, empowering the Hastings Local Board of Health to put in force the powers of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, with respect to the purchase of land otherwise than by agreement, as to certain lands of Charles Hay Frewen, as having been made without jurisdiction, first, because for purposes not authorized by the act; secondly, because made as to lands which were not sufficiently or properly defined, and the description and quantities of which in the said order mentioned agreed neither with those mentioned in the advertisements nor with those mentioned in the notice to Mr. Frewen, and because the said order was bad, for it was impossible to say how much or what land was intended to be taken.

Lush (J. Brown and Hance with him) shewed cause against the rule.—It will not be necessary to discuss the grounds of the rule, for this Court has no power to interfere, as the order which it is sought to have quashed has no validity at present. By the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63. s. 73, local boards of health may by agreement purchase premises for the purpose of widening, &c. any street. The statute is amended by the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 98, and section 75. provides for the purchase of land by the local board. Notices are to be published and served; the local board is to have power to petition the Secretary of State, who is to take the petition into consideration, and may either dismiss it or direct an inquiry, and may afterwards by provisional order empower the local board to put in force the powers of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, with respect to the taking of land otherwise than by agreement. But by the 6th clause of the same section, "no provisional order so made shall be of any validity, unless the same has been confirmed by act of parliament; and it shall be lawful for the Secretary of State as soon as conveniently may be to obtain such confirmation, and the act confirming such order shall be deemed to be a public act of parliament." The order may be made good if an act is passed, but at present there is no validity in it whatever. Section 77, by the 6th clause, shews that either of the Houses of Parliament may be petitioned against the bill, and that if there be such a petition, the bill may be referred to a Select Committee, and the petitioner shall be allowed to appear and oppose as in the case of private bills.—(He was then stopped.)

Field and A. Wills, in support of the rule.—It can never have been intended that where the provisional order is clearly bad, it should be necessary to go before a Select Committee. Parliament would start with the notion that the order was good, and this Court ought to interfere to prevent what is really an abuse by the local board of the powers given by their act.

COCKBURN, C.J.—The Secretary of State is not exercising any judicial function; his order is only like a report, and decides nothing. The bill would be referred to a Select Committee if there is any opposition to it. It was evidently the intention of the legislature to apply the powers of parliament to cases which would not justify the extravagant outlay which takes place in regard to private bills, and to substitute this proceeding by the Secretary of State with the object of guiding and assisting the legislature. The order has no validity whatever till the act is passed, and we should be usurping functions which do not belong to us if we stepped in for the purpose of quashing this order. Such an interference would be beyond our proper sphere of action.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion; the 75th section, by clause 6, and the 77th section, by clause 6, shew clearly that the order has no validity whatever until it has been confirmed by act of parliament.

MELLOR, J.—I am also of opinion that we ought not to interfere. The legislature has instituted these proceedings with a view to economy, and we must take care that we do not interfere with the duties of the Secretary of State, by quashing an order which at present has no validity at all.

Rule discharged.

—How raised—Rateable Value.

By section 181. of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120. all liabilities which, under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112, are chargeable upon the rates authorized to be levied under such latter act, are to be raised by the Metropolitan Board of Works in like manner as the expenses of such Board in the execution of that act.

*Before the passing of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120. the Commissioners of Sewers, acting under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112, had borrowed money, of which 67,000*l.* had been expended on drainage works for the benefit of the Surrey and Kent Sewerage District formed under the powers given to the Commissioners. The district comprised parts of nineteen parishes, and in one of them (C.) 519*l.* had been expended on works locally situate there, and the whole benefit derived amounted to 1,074*l.* 6*s.* 10*d.—Held, nevertheless, that the proper mode of raising the money to defray the liabilities of the Commissioners of Sewers was to apportion the amount of such liabilities among the different parishes in the sewerage district, according to the rateable value of the property in each, and then to make a rate for such proportion upon C. and the other parishes respectively.

Costs—County Court Act, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61. s. 11.—Recovery under Voluntary Reference after Issue joined but before Trial.

*Where a cause is referred to arbitration, by consent of the parties, after issue joined, the costs of the cause to abide the event of the award, and the arbitrator finds all the issues for the plaintiff, and awards that a sum not exceeding 20*l.* is due from the defendant to the plaintiff in respect of the breaches of contract alleged in the declaration, the plaintiff "recovers" that sum within the meaning of the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61. s. 11, and is deprived of costs by that section.—So held by the Court of Queen's Bench after conference with the Judges of the Courts of Common Pleas and Exchequer.*

By a Judge's order, made by consent of the parties, after issue joined, this cause was referred to an arbitrator, who was to have all the powers as to certifying and amending pleadings of a Judge at Nisi Prius; the costs of the cause to abide the result of the award, the costs of the reference and award to be in the discretion of the arbitrator.

The arbitrator awarded as follows: "I find each of the several issues joined for the plaintiff, and I find and award that the plaintiff has sustained damages by reason of the breaches of contract alleged in the declaration, to the amount of 20*s.*, which sum I order and award the defendants to pay to the plaintiff. And I further award and order that the plaintiff and defendants do each bear their own costs of the reference, and that the defendants pay the costs of this award."

On this award, the order of reference having been made a rule of court, the Master proceeded to tax the plaintiff his costs of the cause.

Quain thereupon obtained a rule, calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why the Master should not review his taxation, on the ground that the plaintiff "had recovered a sum not exceeding 20*l.*," and was therefore deprived of costs by the County Court Act, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61. s. 11, which enacts that if in any action of debt, &c. the plaintiff shall recover a sum not exceeding 20*l.*, the plaintiff shall have judgment to recover such sum only, and no costs.

J. Brown (Hilary Term, Jan. 31) shewed cause.

Quain was heard in support of his rule.

The course of argument sufficiently appears from the judgment of the Court. The case of Parr v. Lillicrap (1) was cited in addition to the cases noticed in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court (2) was (May 8) delivered by—

MELLOR, J.—In this case a rule had been obtained by Mr. Quain, calling upon the plaintiff to shew cause why the Master should not be at liberty to review his taxation of costs. An action having been commenced, and issue joined therein, by order of a Judge, and by consent of the parties, the cause was referred, and it was ordered "that the costs of the cause should abide the event of the award, and that the costs of the reference should be in the discretion of the arbitrator." By the award the arbitrator found that the plaintiff had sustained damages by reason of the breaches of contract alleged in the declaration to the amount of 20*s.*; this amount he ordered the defendants to pay to the plaintiff, and directed that each party should bear their own costs of the reference.

Upon this award, the Master taxed the plaintiff's costs of suit, the event of the award being in his favour. The defendants objected that the plaintiff, having recovered a sum not exceeding 20*l.*, was not entitled to costs by virtue of the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61. s. 11.

On shewing cause against the rule, it was contended that that section did not apply to an arbitration by consent of parties before trial, wherein the costs were ordered to abide the event of the award, and he argued that the word "recover" in the County Court Act meant recover by the verdict of a jury. Several cases were cited, in which Judges have in general terms suggested, that there does exist a distinction in this respect between cases in which there has been a verdict subject to a reference and cases in which the reference was by consent before verdict. It is important in considering this question to distinguish between the cases which have been decided upon the construction of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 24. s. 2, which in terms applies only to cases in which there has been "the verdict of a jury," and cases decided upon the County Court Act, and similar acts, in which there are no such words.

The case mainly relied upon by Mr. Brown was that of Frean v. Sargent (3), in which an action of slander had been referred after issue and before trial, by agreement of the parties, in which it was stipulated "that the costs of the cause should abide the event of the award"; and the arbitrator having found in favour of the plaintiff with 20*s.* damages, the Master had taxed the plaintiff's costs of suit, upon which the Court of Exchequer refused a rule to review the Master's taxation, saying, "that in actions referred by agreement of parties before trial, the agreement regulates the right to costs." In that case Bramwell, B., although he concurred in refusing the rule, did so expressly on the ground that "it did not appear that that case came within any of the statutes taking away the plaintiff's general right to costs given by the Statute of Gloucester."

The case of Robertson v. Sterne (4) was relied upon by each of the learned gentlemen who appeared on the rule, Mr. Brown contending that it established a clear distinction between cases of compulsory reference, and cases of reference by agreement or consent of parties; and there is no doubt that the Court, in giving judgment in that case, appears to have considered that the statutes, which deprive the plaintiff of costs in certain events, did not apply to references by consent before trial. Mr. Quain, on the other hand, contended that that case was in reality in favour of his rule, inasmuch as it established that in a reference under the compulsory clauses of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, where there was no verdict of a jury, nor any power to enter a verdict, the plaintiff, having recovered less than 20*l.*, although the costs were ordered to abide the event of the award, was held to be deprived of them by the operation of the London Small Debts Act, 15 & 16 Vict. c. lxxvii. s. 120, in which the words are "shall recover a sum not exceeding 20*l.*"

In the case of Smith v. Edge (5), in which a verdict had been entered, subject to a reference, and in which some members of the Court of Exchequer are reported to have used expressions countenancing the distinction between actions referred before trial and actions in which a verdict has been taken subject to a reference, the case of Robertson v. Sterne (4) was cited, and Bramwell, B., in adopting the reasoning of the Court of Common Pleas, so far as it related to the main question there decided, viz., that the London Small Debts Act did deprive the plaintiff in that case of costs, expressly dissented from the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas, so far as "it intimated a difference between submission by consent and submission by compulsion," and after reviewing the cases of Frean v. Sargent (3) and Jones v. Jones (6) is reported to have said, "I think that the general rule that ought to govern all these cases applies here, and that rule is, that wherever the plaintiff is entitled to judgment in the action and gets his damages in the action, and the case is such that if there had been no reference, the plaintiff would, by virtue of the County Court Act, have lost his costs in the cause, so does he equally lose them when there is a reference which fixes the amount, unless he has succeeded in getting the necessary certificate."

We are of opinion that the above statement of Bramwell, B. truly expresses the rule which ought to be applied to the case before us. We think that it is impolitic to make a distinction which would greatly discourage references by consent, and we cannot perceive any substantial difference between an order made compulsorily and one made by consent. The meaning of the words "costs of the action to abide the event of the award" must receive the same construction in each case; and when it is once established that the word "recover" in the County Court Act, as in the London Small Debts Act, is satisfied by a recovery in the action, without the verdict of a jury—Boulding v. Tyler (7), the result seems naturally to follow that in each case, the plaintiff not having recovered in the action 20*l.*, is deprived of his costs by virtue of the provisions of the County Court Act and other similar statutes.

Our impression during the argument was strong in favour of making the rule absolute; but we abstained from delivering judgment with the intention of consulting the Judges of the other Courts upon the subject. We have since had the opportunity of conferring with the Judges of the Courts of Common Pleas and Exchequer, who concur with us that this rule should be made absolute.

Highway—Turnpike-Road—Repairs out of Parish Highway Rate—4 & 5 Vict. c. 59.—Retrospective Order.

The 4 & 5 Vict. c. 59. (which makes it lawful for Justices in petty sessions, upon information that the trust funds are insufficient for the repairs of a turnpike-road within a parish, to examine the state of the funds of the trust, and to inquire into the state of the repairs of the road, and if they think necessary and expedient to order payment to be made out of the highway rate to the trustees of the road, the money to be wholly laid out on the actual repairs of the turnpike-road) —does not enable Justices to make an order towards the payment of repairs already done.

Where by the private turnpike act the funds are to be applied, in the first instance, to the payment of interest and reduction of the principal sum borrowed, and after that to the repairs of the road, and the funds have not been applied to the repair at all, such case is within the 4 & 5 Vict. c. 59.

{ THE QUEEN, on the prosecution of THE MAYOR, ALDERMEN AND BURGESSES OF SOUTHAMPTON, v. THE SOUTHAMPTON HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS.

Costs, Security for—Increase of Security, when allowed.

A rule of court having been made, directing that legal proceedings might be taken in the name of a corporation against certain Commissioners by certain ratepayers interested in the matter, on their giving security to indemnify the corporation against costs, two of the ratepayers entered into a bond in the usual amount of 200*l.*; a mandamus having accordingly issued against the Commissioners, and the case having been taken by writ of error to the House of Lords, and the bond of indemnity being therefore of insufficient amount to cover the expenses incurred, the Court made absolute a rule to increase the amount to such sum as the coroner and attorney of the court should think reasonable.

This was a rule, calling on three ratepayers of the borough of Southampton to shew cause why the indemnity given by two of them should not be increased to an amount reasonably sufficient to cover the expenses as to which this indemnity was given, and that the matter be referred to the coroner and attorney of the Court for that purpose.

It appeared that by a rule of court, of the 26th of July 1859, the three ratepayers being interested in the matter, were to be at liberty to use the name of the corporation in taking such legal proceedings against the Commissioners of Southampton Harbour as they might be advised, on giving to the corporation an indemnity to the satisfaction of the coroner and attorney of the Court.

The then coroner accordingly directed a bond to be entered into in the penal sum of 200*l.* by two of the three ratepayers, conditioned to indemnify the corporation against all costs to be incurred by them relating to any proceedings taken in the name of the corporation against the Commissioners, the coroner saying that 200*l.*

was the sum usually fixed, and refusing to increase the amount.

A mandamus accordingly issued, with the corporation as prosecutors against the Commissioners, and judgment was obtained in this court in favour of the Crown, but was reversed in the Exchequer Chamber, and a writ of error is now pending in the House of Lords; the expenses of the prosecutors already incurred exceeded 200*l.*

Mellish and Archibald shewed cause, and contended that it was contrary to practice to increase the security.

Bullar was not heard in support of the rule.

The COURT (1) were of opinion that it was but reasonable that either the litigation should be stopped, or that the parties interested should enter into fresh security; and that the rule should be made absolute that the security be increased to such sum as the coroner and attorney of the Court shall think reasonable.

Rule absolute accordingly.

SPECIAL CASE.

Railway—Superfluous Lands—Owners of Land adjoining thereto—8 Vict. c. 18. s. 127. (Lands Clauses Consolidation Act.)

By the 216th and 217th sections of a local act for making a railway (containing similar provisions with those in the 127th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act), lands acquired by the company under the provisions of the act, but which would not be required for the purposes thereof, were to be sold within ten years after the passing of the act, and if they were not so sold, they were to vest in and become the property of the owners of the lands adjoining thereto, in proportion to the extent of their lands respectively adjoining the same:—Held, that this applied to all land acquired under the provisions of the act, for the purpose of making the railway, and not used for that purpose, whether the land were actually in the possession of the company or in the occupation of their tenants.

In the year 1861, the plaintiff brought an action to recover the possession of lands which, under the act, would become vested in him as the owner of adjoining land. In 1863, the company, in promoting another private act, got a clause inserted, to the effect that the respective periods limited for the sale of superfluous lands were to be extended for five years from the passing of the act. The vested interest of the plaintiff, if he had any at all, had vested in him in the year 1854:—Held, that the clause so inserted in the year 1863 had no operation upon the claim of the plaintiff.

Held, also, that the proper way to apportion the superfluous lands among the owners of the land adjoining thereto, was by drawing a line from the point where the boundaries of two adjoining owners meet, to the nearest point of the land actually used by the company.

This was a SPECIAL CASE stated by consent of the parties in an action of ejectment, tried at the Surrey Summer Assizes, 1861, and in which a verdict was ordered to be entered for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of this Court.

1. The plaintiff was at the commencement of this action and still is the surviving trustee of a marriage settlement, made on the 5th of June 1844, in contemplation of the marriage of Mrs. Susannah Hawkins with the Rev. Thomas Ainsworth, which subsequently took place; and by the said settlement the legal estate in the lands which are coloured green in the accompanying plan marked No. 1. (1), (which is made to scale, and is to form part of this case), and of which the said Mrs. Hawkins was then and had for many years previously been the owner in fee simple, was duly conveyed in fee to the plaintiff and two other trustees (since deceased) upon the trusts therein mentioned.

2. The defendants, the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company, appeared and defended for the whole, as did also the other defendants, Charles Joseph Corbett, Charles Walker, John Haworth and William Nathaniel Wright, who were severally at the time of the bringing of this action occupiers of the lands and the buildings sought to be recovered in the present action, the lands being coloured pink on the said plan (1), and the buildings thereon being shaded, and they severally derive their title through the railway company.

3. The plaintiff, as owner of the adjoining lands marked green on the said plan (1), under the provisions contained in the 216th and 217th sections of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 92. (passed on the 29th of July 1844), entitled 'An Act for making a Railway from the London and Croydon Railway at Croydon to Epsom,' sought to recover possession of the lands and buildings mentioned in the writ of ejectment, as being superfluous lands adjoining the plaintiff's, unsold within the prescribed period of ten years after the passing of the said act, and therefore forfeited to the plaintiff as such adjoining owner.

4. By the 5 Will. 4. c. 10, the London and Croydon Railway Company was incorporated for the purpose of making a railway from Croydon to join the London and Greenwich Railway near London.

(1) See this plan at the end of the judgment.

5. By the above-mentioned act of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 92, the Croydon and Epsom Railway Company was incorporated for the purpose of making a railway from the London and Croydon Railway at Croydon to Epsom.

6. By the 131st section of the last-mentioned act, it is enacted that, subject to the provisions of the act, it should be lawful for the company to agree with the owners of the lands which they were thereby authorized to enter into and take for the purposes of the railway, for the absolute purchase for a consideration in money of any such lands, or such parts thereof as they should think proper, and of all subsisting leases therein, and of all rents, charges, annuities, mortgages or incumbrances affecting any such lands, and all commonable or other rights to which such lands might be subject, and all other estates or interests in such lands of what kind soever.

7. By the 216th section it is enacted, for the purpose of making provision respecting the sale of lands acquired by the company under the provisions of this act, but which shall not be required for the purposes thereof, that the company shall sell all such superfluous lands in such manner as they may deem most advantageous, and convey the same to the purchasers thereof by deed under the common seal of the company, and a receipt under such common seal shall be a sufficient discharge to the purchaser of any such lands for the purchase-money in such receipt expressed to be received, and such sales and conveyances shall take place within ten years after the passing of this act.

8. And by the 217th section of the same act it is further enacted, that if the company do not sell such superfluous lands within the period aforesaid, then such lands remaining unsold at the expiration of such period shall thereupon vest in and become the property of the owners of the lands adjoining thereto, in proportion to the extent of their lands respectively adjoining the same.

9. By the 227th section it is enacted that, subject to the provisions and restrictions in the said act contained, it should be lawful for the company to make, and maintain the said railway and works on the line and upon the lands delineated and described on the plan and in the books of reference thereafter mentioned, and in the schedule thereto, and for that purpose to enter upon, take and use such of the lands so delineated and described as should be necessary for making and constructing the said railway and works.

10. By the 228th section it is recited that plans and sections of the railway shewing the line and levels thereof, and also a book of reference containing the names of the owners, lessees and occupiers or reputed owners, lessees and occupiers of the lands through which the same was intended to pass, had been deposited with the clerk of the peace of the said county of Surrey.

11. By the 230th section it is enacted that true copies of such plans and book of reference, or of any correction thereof, or extracts therefrom, certified by such clerk of the peace, should be received in all courts of justice or elsewhere as evidence of the contents thereof.

12. By the 231st section it is enacted that the company, in making the railway, should have power to deviate from the line delineated on the plan so deposited, provided that no such deviation should extend to a greater distance than the limits of deviation delineated on the said plans, nor to a greater extent in passing through a town than 10 yards, or elsewhere to a greater extent than 100 yards from the said line, nor should such deviation extend into the lands or property of any person whose name is not mentioned in the said book of reference, without the previous consent in writing of such person, unless the name of such person should have been omitted by mistake; and the fact that such omission proceeded from mistake should have been certified in manner thereinbefore provided for in cases of unintentional errors in the said book of reference.

13. By the 234th section it is enacted that the company should not take or injure any property of the following kinds, except such as should be specified in the schedule to this act, without the consent in writing of the owners and occupiers thereof, unless the omission in such schedule be certified according to the provisions thereinbefore contained to have proceeded from mistake (that is to say), any house or building erected on or before the 30th of November 1843, or any ground on or before that day inclosed or set apart and used as a garden, orchard, nursery-ground, yard, paddock, plantation, planted walk or avenue to a house.

14. In addition to the said plan (1), another plan, marked No. 2, which accompanies this case, was also put in evidence.

15. The said plan No. 2. is a tracing of a portion of the plan deposited with the clerk of the peace under the 227th and 228th sections, and which was also put in evidence at the trial of this cause, and the numbers mentioned therein refer to the numbers and description of the property mentioned in the said book of reference.

16. The Nos. 51, 52, 53, 54, 60, 61, 62. and 63. on the said plan No. 2, comprise the portion coloured pink on the plan No. 1. (1), as well as the portion of the line of railway adjoining.

17. The Nos. 55. and 59. on the said plan No. 2, comprise the parts coloured green on the plan No. 1. (1).

19. The Schedule 1. referred to in the 227th and 234th sections of the said act, 7 & 8 Vict. c. xcii., contains a description of the property numbered 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 61. and 62, similar in all respects to that contained in the said book of reference, with the exception of their not being numbered; such schedule does not contain No. 63, the same being pasture land. And the schedule only contains lands of the particular description enumerated in the said 234th section of the said act.

20. The red lines on the said plan No. 2. denote the limits of deviation mentioned in the said 231st section of the said act, and the whole of the property claimed, as well as part of the plaintiff's, is within them.

21. By the 7 & 8 Vict. c. xcvi. (6th of August 1844) the powers of the London and Croydon Railway Company were extended. By section 26. of the last-mentioned act, power was given to them to purchase the Croydon and Epsom Railway.

22. By the 9 & 10 Vict. c. cclxxxiii. (27th July 1846) reciting these acts amongst others, and that in pursuance of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. xcvi. the London and Croydon Railway Company had purchased the Croydon and Epsom line the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway was incorporated.

23. By sections 1. and 5. of the last-mentioned act, the London and Epsom companies were dissolved, and the powers, privileges, rights, lands, &c. granted to them were vested in the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company.

24. By section 21. the regulations and restrictions in the acts of the dissolved companies were made binding on the said London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company.

25. In support of the plaintiff's case at the trial, the following witnesses amongst others being sworn on behalf of the plaintiff deposed as follows:

26. Thomas Fowler Wood was called on the part of the plaintiff, and proved that before and at the time of the passing of the Croydon and Epsom Railway Act he was the owner of Nos. 51, 52, 53, 54. and 60, the last number being a public footpath, shewn on the said other plan.

27. That the triangular piece at the east end of the plan No. 1. (1), coloured pink and marked A, was no part of his property, and that he whilst such owner received the following notice:

"In pursuance of the provisions contained in a certain act of parliament passed in the session holden in the 7th and 8th years of the reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria, intituled 'An Act for making a Railway from the London and Croydon Railway at Croydon to Epsom,' I do hereby, on behalf of the Croydon and Epsom Railway Company, give you notice that a certain piece of orchard land, containing by estimation 3 roods and 15 perches or thereabouts, and being parcel of a larger piece of orchard land situate in the parish of Croydon, in the county of Surrey, now or late in the occupation of Samuel Harris, distinguished in the map or plan and book of reference deposited in the office of the clerk of the peace for the county of Surrey, and referred to by the said act with the No. 51, and delineated in the plan hereunto annexed, and therein coloured red, will be wanted and required by the said company for the purposes of the said act, and that it is the intention of the said company to contract for, and they are now willing to treat and agree for the purchase thereof, and of all subsisting leases, terms, estates and interests therein. And further, that you are hereby required on or before the expiration of one calendar month next after this notice, to deliver or cause to be delivered at the office of the said company, being the London and Croydon Railway office, London Bridge Terminus, Southwark, a statement in writing of the particulars of the estate, share, interest or charge which you claim to be entitled to, or to be authorized to receive satisfaction and compensation for, and of the injury or damage sustained by you, and of the amount of the sum of money which you may demand or be willing to receive in satisfaction and compensation for the value of such lands and premises, and such estate, share, interest or charge, and for such injury or damage respectively. Dated the 16th day of January 1845.

R. J. Young,

Secretary to the said company.

To Messrs. Thomas F. Wood and Samuel Harris, and to all and every person and persons whom it may concern."

And of part of which land, viz. Nos. 51, 52, 53, and 54, Samuel Harris was the tenant or occupier. The adjoining property occupied by Morley, viz. Nos. 61, 62, and 63, belonged to Mr. Wright, since dead.

28. He stated further, that there was a transfer and conveyance executed by him to the Croydon and Epsom Railway Company of the whole of the said land, Nos. 51, 52, 53, 54, and 60; that he in 1846 received the purchase-money and left the conveyance with his solicitor, Mr. Drummond, of Croydon, and had not since seen it or had possession of the land.

29. This deed was called for by the plaintiff pursuant to usual notice to produce given to the defendants in that behalf, but was not produced by them, and the receipt of such notice to produce was admitted by the defendants.

30. He further stated that the railway was made upon part of the property taken from him by the railway; that he had recently been over the property, when he found the hedges and other boundaries the same as when the lands were his, except so far as the same had been altered by the severance and alteration that was caused by making the said railway over a portion of the property.

NEW SERIES, 34.—Q.B.

31. Giles Long proved that he knew the land adjoining and close to Pitlake Bridge, on the Croydon and Epsom line of railway, and, on the plan No. 1. (1) being produced to him, stated that the land marked green represented the part he then held as yearly tenant under Mrs. Ainsworth, and had done so for rather more than twenty-one years; that Mrs. Ainsworth was formerly Mrs. Hawkins, the widow of the Rev. John Richard Hawkins; that she was Mrs. Susannah Hawkins, and subsequently married Mr. Ainsworth; that he knew the adjoining property coloured pink, and that it was in the occupation of Mr. Samuel Harris, for many years before the making of the railway, and after him it was occupied by Mr. Wright; and after Mr. Wright the defendant Mr. Corbett occupied one of two cottages (originally forming one house) thereon, and another person occupied the other cottage; there was a kitchen-garden, flower-garden, and fish-pond belonging to the house occupied by the defendant Corbett, and about three acres and a half of meadow land, of a part of which Corbett has been in occupation about four years and up to the present time; that he saw the railway men, when the railway was being made upon that land, conveying ballast from the pond and its vicinity (being the part occupied by Samuel Harris, and part of the said land coloured pink,) to the railway, and making the railway; that the triangular piece was not held by Harris; that there is at the west end a piece of land between the ground in question and the road bank, which is used as a road from the Croydon parish road to his house and the property occupied by Corbett and others; that after passing Corbett's premises, there is a vacant piece of ground, formerly part of the said old parish road, and running down to and stopped many years ago by the railway; it has become grassed over, and the part near the railway used as a wood-yard by Morley, and afterwards by West.

32. Thomas West was called, and proved that he rented a portion of the land coloured pink, consisting of a house with a cottage attached, with meadow and garden, and had done so for thirteen years next prior to Christmas 1860, but not the cottage and lands Nos. 61, 62, and 63, which were occupied by Morley under an agreement, which was not produced, and that he underlet the house, meadow and garden land to William Morton Wright, who underlet to the defendant Corbett, and that he underlet the cottage attached to another person ; that when he first went there the railway was being made, but was not finished. He proved further, that during all that time he paid his rent to the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company.

33. John Morley proved that he occupied one of the cottages and the rest of Wright's property on the said plan No. 1. (1), and which adjoins Wood's property, and being Nos. 61, 62. and 63. in the said plan No. 2, and a book of reference under leases from Wright, which were then produced by him, for twenty-one years from 1836 to 1857; that he paid rent to Wright during such period until the making of the railway, and after that to Henry Anscombe, on behalf of the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company, and continued to do so to the end of his term.

34. Henry Anscombe, superintendent at the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway terminus, and formerly travelling inspector of such company, proved the receipt of rent from the two last witnesses, West and Morley, for their holdings during the last four or five years, and the payment of it to the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company.

35. George Robinson proved that he had been a servant for ten years of the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company, and that he occupied the cottage formerly let to the witness Morley, and had done so for two years; he took the cottage from one Brown, who was in the said company's employ, and that his rent for such cottage was deducted by the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company from his wages every fortnight. He added, that the nature of his employment did not render it convenient that he should occupy that cottage more than any other.

36. It was proved at the said trial that after the determination of Morley's lease the said London, Brighton and South Coast Company was duly rated for the house so occupied by Robinson, and that they paid the rates.

(1) See this plan at the end of the judgment.

37. The catalogue or particulars, with plans and conditions marked W, which accompany and form part of this case, were put in evidence by the plaintiff; those particulars are headed "London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company, surplus estates, freehold and copyhold. Francis Fuller & Co. have received instructions from the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company to sell by auction at the Mart, opposite the Bank of England, on Wednesday, the 22nd of June 1859, in lots, several portions of their surplus properties, comprising exceedingly valuable and highly important estates adjoining or near to the following stations on their line of railway."

38. The following description will be found therein of lot 2.

"Lot 2, near the West Croydon Station." This lot comprises 4 a. 0 r. 34 p. of very valuable freehold building land, with a considerable frontage to a road near the Derby Arms, and adjoining the high road from Croydon to Mitcham.

"On this property is a small brick-built dwelling-house, with slated roof, containing six living rooms, standing in a good garden, with a wood-yard adjoining; and also an old-fashioned family residence, brick built, containing six sleeping-rooms, two bow parlours, kitchen, washhouse, cellars, and other offices; there are also a two-stall stable, coachhouse and yards, and adjoining the house is a superior kitchen-garden with excellent fruit-trees, a flower garden, fish-pond, and about three acres and a half of superior meadow land.

"This property is within five minutes walk of the West Croydon Station.

"The fixtures belonging to the tenant will have to be paid for by valuation.

"The title to this lot will commence as to part with a conveyance, dated the 11th of February 1846, and as to the other part with a conveyance, dated the 26th of February 1846."

The catalogue or particulars contain conditions of the sale, the 4th of which is as follows :

IV. The vendors will within twenty-one days after the sale deliver to each purchaser an abstract of the title to the lot or lots purchased, such abstract commencing with the deed, surrender, admission, or other document stated in the particulars of each lot, and no earlier title or evidence of any earlier title shall upon any ground or pretence whatever be required, and it shall be assumed that every such deed, surrender, admission and other document well and effectually conveyed or passed the property, estate and interest purporting to be thereby conveyed or passed, free from all incumbrances, claims and demands, and it shall be assumed without proof, question or inquiry that the vendors and the persons in whom the legal estate or the property is now vested have done and performed all acts and things necessary or proper to be done and performed to enable or authorize them to sell, convey, surrender and assure the lot or lots to the purchaser or purchasers thereof respectively, and the purchaser or purchasers shall not make any objection or requisition on account of the vendors being accountable to the Crown under any bond for payment of duties on passengers or otherwise, or on the ground of any judgment, rule, decree or order registered against the vendors and appearing to be unsatisfied (if any such there be), or on account of any claim for compensation or other claim against the vendors with respect to any part of the property or otherwise (if any such there be), or on account of any liability of the vendors on any account whatsoever, and it shall not be necessary for the vendors to furnish any evidence of the identity of any of the lots with the property described in the abstracted documents, and if the respective purchasers or their solicitors shall not within ten days after the delivery of the abstract, state in writing to Messrs. G. Faithfull & Son, of Ship Street, Brighton, the vendor's solicitors, some valid objection to the title not precluded by these conditions, the purchaser shall be considered as accepting the title, and all objections not delivered within that time shall be considered as waived, time being in this respect the essence of the contract."

39. Among the said plans above referred to in the said particulars, there is one marked X. appertaining to and descriptive of lot 2, and headed as follows:

"London, Brighton and South Coast Railway.

"Plan of land in the parish of Croydon,
"To be sold by auction June 1859."

40. The part coloured pink thereon represents the 4 a. 0 r. 34 p. to be put up to auction, and is bounded on the one side by the London, Croydon and Epsom Railway, and on the opposite side by land belonging to Mrs. Ainsworth, on another side by the high road from Croydon to Mitcham, being land not belonging to the plaintiff or the defendants, and on the remaining side by land belonging to Messrs. Thomas and James Turner; Pitlake Bridge is also marked thereon.

41. James Scott, for three years deputy-chairman of the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company, and for one year director, proved that the said Francis Fuller was usually their auctioneer, to sell when they had property to sell, and that he had done so since he (witness) had been at the board, and that he knew as a director that there was a sale of surplus lands in 1859, and that he knew of the catalogue marked W. being published in 1859; that it was the province of their solicitor, Mr. Faithfull, to settle the conditions, and that he was employed by the company for that purpose in the preparation of the sale; that the sale was on the 22nd day of June 1859; that the said catalogue or particulars marked W. were used at the sale; that he called at Mr. Fuller's on the subject of the sale and saw a catalogue there, and that some of the lots were withdrawn before the sale.

42. George Faithfull, solicitor of the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company, proved that the said conditions of sale mentioned in the said particulars were prepared at his office; that he had been solicitor to the company for more than ten years; that he received the draft of the said conditions of sale from Mr. Fuller, and Mr. Fuller sent him the said particulars of the sale marked W; that he settled the conditions of sale and sent them to Mr. Fuller; that he attended the sale as solicitor for the company on the 22nd of June 1859; that the property was put up for sale; that there were bidders; that the purchasers prepared the drafts of the purchase-deeds, which were sent to him for perusal on behalf of the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company; that he charged the company for settling them, and received money on behalf of the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company for lands then put up for sale at the auction mart, and paid it over to the company; that the said particulars marked W. were used at the sale.

43. Copies of the said several acts, plans, particulars and books of reference accompanying and are to be taken as part of this case.

The question for the opinion of the Court was—

Whether upon the facts above stated the plaintiff was entitled to recover all or any, and if any, what portion of the lands coloured pink on plan No. 1.

If the Court should be of opinion in the affirmative, then the verdict was to stand in respect of the whole, or of such portion, and judgment was to be entered up for the same with costs, including costs of and incident to this case, to be borne and paid by the defendants.

If the Court should be of a contrary opinion, then the said verdict was to be set aside and a nonsuit entered in lieu thereof, with the costs of and incidental to this case to be borne and paid by the plaintiff.

The Court was to have power to draw all inferences of fact which a jury might draw.

The case was argued by—

Lush (Baylis and Murphy with him), for the plaintiff, and by Bovill, for the defendants.

The arguments were based upon the facts set out in the case, and the different sections referred to therein, and are sufficiently disclosed by the judgment.

BLACKBURN, J.—I think, in this case, as the matter has been considered a good deal while the argument has proceeded, we need not take further time to consider; but that we ought to say that we think the plaintiff is entitled to judgment; I will presently point out the manner in which he is entitled to recover, and what quantity of land he is entitled to recover.

The first point is this: by the Croydon and Epsom Act, passed in the year 1844, it was enacted (and provisions have since been adopted in the Lands Clauses Act which are precisely similar, and which are, indeed, almost identical in words, but I take them from the local act), by the 216th section, that, "for the purpose of making provision respecting the sale of lands acquired by the company under the provisions of this act, but which shall not be required for the purposes thereof, the company shall sell all such superfluous lands," and that "such sales and conveyances shall take place within ten years after the passing of this act." Now, that act was passed on the 29th of July 1844, so that the ten years there mentioned, so far as that act is concerned, ended in July 1854, because it says that such sales shall take place within ten years after the passing of the act. Then by section 217. it further enacts "that if the company do not sell such lands within the period aforesaid," that is, before July 1854, "then such lands remaining unsold at the expiration of such period, shall thereupon vest in and become the property of the owners of the lands adjoining thereto in proportion to the extent of their lands respectively adjoining the same." Now the plaintiff is the owner of some lands adjoining the quantity of land marked pink (1). The first question is, whether, on the case, he has shewn that the pink land does come within that which is pointed out in these two sections, the 216th and the 217th,—whether it was land "acquired by the company under the provisions of this act," and "not required for the purposes thereof." Now, as to this, we have to take ourselves back to the time of the trial and the verdict in the year 1861, and we have this proved at that time: In the first place, by an act of parliament which has been referred to, the Croydon and Epsom Railway had become vested in the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company, and by that act it was enacted, that the clauses of the Croydon and Epsom Act should be read and construed as if the London, Brighton and South Coast Company had been substituted for the Croydon and Epsom. Therefore we have to look at it, in the year 1861, exactly as if the London, Brighton and South Coast Company had been the company who had obtained the act, instead of the Croydon and Epsom. Then we find that evidence was given that as to a portion of the pink land the former owner had received notice to treat from the company, and that after he had executed the conveyance (which was not produced) he had been paid the price for it. The portion of land which he had thus divested himself of, had, from that time, been adopted by the company, or by the company's servants, and was up to the time of the trial in the occupation of the company's tenants.

Then we come to other lands, that is, to the parcels 61, 62 and 63, which had belonged to different proprietors, but which, being contiguous, form part of the same thing; and as to those it appears that at the time the company had them they were in the tenancy of a person called "Morley," who held them for a term of years, which would expire in the year 1857. Now Morley was not turned out; it does not appear affirmatively whether the company had given him notice or not; Morley was not turned out, but continued in the occupation; but it also appears that the company had acquired the reversion in some way, because Morley paid them rent, and they received rent up to 1857, when Morley's interest in the land ceased under the lease, and from that time to the time of the trial the company had received rent from Morley, he continuing on as tenant from year to year of the company. That was strong evidence as against the company that, somehow or other, they had acquired the reversion of the land over Morley, although it does not appear that they had acquired the interest that Morley had, because he seems to have enjoyed it up to the year 1837. In the year 1854, therefore, they had acquired the reversion of the land, but they had not yet turned out the tenant.

Now, I think, Mr. Bovill's argument was this. He said that under the 216th section, where provision is made for the sale of lands acquired by the company, "under the provisions of this act, but which shall not be required for the purposes thereof," the construction of that was to be limited to lands which had been acquired, not in the way of reversion, but it must be such immediate possession as that the company might enter into possession and use them; and, consequently the effect of the existing outstanding tenancy in Morley prevented those being lands acquired by the company, and he was unwilling to admit, what I thought was the case (and I think so still), that the same reasoning would apply if there had been a tenant from year to year, and the company had not given any notice to quit. Mr. Bovill said that that was not the same position. I think it is.

Now, I think, the point turns on what is the meaning of "lands acquired by the company under the provisions of this act." I think, when you look at what it was intended by the act of parliament that the company should acquire, it is this: The company, upon giving compensation, applied to take lands and to force people to sell. And whenever they acquired those lands under the provisions of the act for the purposes of making the railway, or for executing their undertaking, which may be by the general Lands Clauses Act, whatever they acquire in that way should be subject to this condition, that, if they do not use it for the purposes of the line within the prescribed period (in this case ten years), there is a condition by which the land is to go to the proprietors of the adjoining lands "in proportion to the extent of their lands respectively adjoining thereto." That is the scheme of the act, the object being that where lands are taken from proprietors by compulsion of law, for the purpose of having particular works executed, if they are not executed, then they shall, first, be offered to the persons from whom they were taken, and if they will not have them, then to the owners of the adjoining lands. All that applies as much to the reversion, or other partial interest in land which the company had acquired by force, as to the actual fee simple in actual possession. I cannot see, in the reason of the thing, where the distinction is between the reversion that may be acquired, where a company hold on, and the absolute fee simple of the lands required by the company under the provisions of the act; and I see nothing in Mr. Bovill's argument to affect it. Then, it appearing that the company were in possession, and actually enjoying it by receiving the rents from agricultural tenants, who were not using it for the purposes of the railway, but as ordinary inhabitants of cottages—agricultural tenants—and paying rent, it is clear that, de facto, it had never been applied to the purposes of the company—the company having overstayed their time, possibly thinking that the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act, giving them ten years from the time when the execution of the works expired, which would be fifteen years—possibly thinking that that applied here,—instead of this ten years only, they waited too long before they began to sell.

But then they advertised them as “surplus lands,” and that, certainly, is strong evidence that they were in fact surplus lands.

Now the whole of the facts, and everything connected with the case, being completely within the knowledge of the company, if these lands had been appropriated to any of the purposes of the act, so that they ought not to be called “superfluous lands,” that was a fact within the knowledge of the company, the defendants; the defendants were required to prove that if it had been so, when there had been made a prima facie case to the contrary, if they had evidence to displace it, but they did not do that.

The same applies to all the lands which shall be acquired for the purposes of the railway, and which shall be superfluous. Now Mr. Bovill says, and says truly, that the green (the plaintiff's land) does not abut on and adjoin to plot 61. and plot 62. (1) That is true. If we were looking at whether it was adjoining the other land at the time that land was originally acquired, it would be true; on that ground it would not be adjoining; but what the act says is, “the owners of the lands adjoining thereto,” that is, at that period when the land is to be vested in those owners, and at that time, in 1861 (being the same as if we had determined it in 1854), the whole piece of the pink was taken as one piece of ground acquired by the railway, no matter who was the owner, because by the provisions of the act it had become, as absolutely as if it had been sold, vested in the owners of the adjoining lands respectively.

Then we come to the next question. We have hitherto been speaking of this upon the state of the law as it was in the year 1861, when this verdict was found, but in the year 1863 the railway company, promoting a private act, got a clause inserted, the effect of which was this: “The respective periods by the several acts relating to the company limited for the sale of their superfluous lands, are hereby respectively extended for five years from the passing of this act, and those several acts shall be read and construed as if that period had been fixed by each of those acts for that purpose.” Now that section, it is contended on the part of the defendants, has this effect: that we are to suppose that the legislature intended to say that these acts of parliament shall be all read now as if they had been framed in this way, and with these words interpolated into them, “the vested interest which the plaintiff had, if he had acquired any interest at all.” Now the vested interest, if the plaintiff has acquired any at all, was in consequence of the period having elapsed some years before, and more than that, namely, the vested interest that he so acquired in the verdict, he having been only prevented from being put in possession of it in consequence of the law's delay, and which is to be defeated and set aside by this ex parte legislation in a private act of parliament, without his being a party before them, and by construing the words in this way. I hope, for the sake of the London and Brighton Railway, that they never intended when they brought in that clause that it should have that effect. If they had intended that it should have such an effect, and had admitted it, the legislature certainly never would have passed it, and it would have been an ineffectual attempt; but they have not used words to express that meaning at all. It is always a rule in legislation of all sorts, and particularly in private legislation, that the words in an enactment shall not be construed retrospectively as affecting vested interests unless you clearly shew that such was the intention of the legislature. Now, here the words are, “the respective periods by the several acts relating to the said company limited for the sale of their surplus lands are hereby respectively extended.” I think the meaning of those words, even if they were open to that principle, but even without the aid of that principle that I have been referring to, plainly is, that where there is an existing time—a still existing time limited at the moment—existing, so that if the period is not yet exhausted so as to give the other party a vested right, but is running and current, is a period still limited and incapable of being extended. I do not think those words are words which we ought to strain in order to make them retrospective, and so defeat vested interests, when they can be construed to mean that where the party has got his vested interest, and has even actually recovered that vested interest, the effect of that should be undone and give the company a right to recover back lands which have been recovered from them, and which, but for the law's delay, would have vested in the plaintiff. I cannot think that the legislature ever intended that.

Therefore, it comes round to the question which we began with, and which is most difficult, for certainly there is very great difficulty about it, and that is as to construing the provisions of the act of parliament so as to see what is meant by "owners of the lands adjoining,"—the land is to become the property of the "owners of the lands adjoining thereto in proportion to the extent of their lands respectively adjoining the same."

Now comes the question, what does that mean? We have the question raised, looking at the east end of this plan (1) in this way: It appears that the plaintiff's land, shaded on this plan "green," continues by a line that is not quite parallel with the London, Croydon and Epsom Railway, but which is not far from parallel to it, and runs along until it meets the land of Mr. Turner. There the land of Mr. Turner is the boundary of the plot of land occupied by the company and acquired by the company under the provisions of the act, but not used; they are "superfluous lands." The boundary at Mr. Turner's land goes off; it is not perpendicular, but slants off. Now Mr. Turner's land adjoins to the pink plot, and, in one sense, as much so as the green land adjoins it. Now, how is the act to be construed? One view, which was suggested by Mr. Lush, was that these different owners were to be made tenants in common, and to have the piece apportioned among them. I do not think that is the true construction, and for this reason: we know with regard to railways, that their limits of deviation run parallel to the proposed line for a great many miles, and very likely all along, from one terminus to another, where there are those limits of deviation; and where lands are acquired for the purposes of the railway, it will be found that they contain a strip outside of the railway which would be superfluous, which was acquired by the company.

Now, to say that the whole of the owners of all the contiguous lands from Croydon to Brighton—as was suggested when it was first put,—to hold that they should all take as tenants in common, would be extremely inconvenient, and it is certainly very unlikely that the legislature ever intended it to be so. Then we find that the legislature have not used words pointing to that, but they say the property is to vest in the proprietors of the lands adjoining, "in proportion to the extent of their lands respectively adjoining the same," it being perfectly plain that the true intent of the legislature was, that the owner of each parcel of land adjoining should have a proportion of the adjoining lands: that is, "adjoining" for that purpose.

Then we come to the question: how are we to say in what proportion and extent the lands are to be said to be "adjoining the same"?

I think it must be in proportion to the extent of the adjoining lands, that is, in proportion to the extent of the land adjoining the railway. And then comes this, further, that if it is to be taken merely as the limit of the frontage, then it would follow that you are to make a rule-of-three sum, and, if so, it is clear. Take the length of the fence along the green line, and then the length of the fence along Turner's land, down there; but then that would not be carrying it to the fence of Mr. Turner, which is in a sloping direction. That would give Mr. Turner, whose estate is in a slanting direction, a larger proportion than it would give to the plaintiff, whose fence is straight along the railway. That cannot be the intention of the legislature. I think the true meaning must be this: I admit the words are not by any means artificially used, but they rather lead to the conclusion that when the thing was originally proposed the framers of the act were not very clear as to what would be the working of the matter—I think the true meaning is this: that when you take the line of the railway as being made the boundary of the deviation from it—which would be, generally speaking, pretty nearly parallel to the railway—when you find the words “owners of the lands adjoining,” the meaning must be this, that you must go to the point where the two adjoining owners’ boundaries meet. In that case it would be that point where the green and pink and white meet—where the “19” has been marked; and taking it from that point you draw a straight line to the nearest point of the works of the company — of the land actually used by the company for their works — and then the land that on Mr. Turner’s side would be Mr. Turner’s, and that on the plaintiff’s side would be the plaintiff’s. The plaintiff is not entitled to recover anything that belongs to Mr. Turner. He must recover, in ejectment, on the strength of his own title; and therefore what the plaintiff is entitled to recover on the eastern boundary would be up to the straight line drawn from the point where his land and Mr. Turner’s meet, to the nearest point of the land used by the company for the purposes of the railway. That is pretty nearly the same as a line drawn perpendicular on the railway, but not quite the same,—it would not come very far from what I see is the actually existing fence. The effect of that is, that there would be a little corner at the top given to Mr. Turner, and a little corner at the bottom which would be cut off and given to the plaintiff. Probably if the parties fight, they had better draw a straight line down; but if they are wise, they will follow the fence and leave a few yards, on either side, as a set-off. If the parties cannot agree but will fight, then I think the sheriff must determine the position, and put a line on the eastern side to a line drawn to the nearest point of the railway company’s works to the nearest point of the land used by the railway for the purposes of the act, which will be very nearly the same as the fence, not quite.

There is one thing, further, on the western boundary, which we have still to continue. There there was, at first, no doubt, an extremely puzzling question, arising from the term “adjoining,” which we had to determine, whether the high road there was “adjoining land” within the meaning of the act, so as to give it to the proprietor of the soil of the road. No doubt it is the property of some one in fee, though of very little use unless there happen to be minerals there. But when we come to look at it, it does appear that the adjoining part is marked “formerly road,” that portion of the land being occupied, as appears by the case, by the tenants of the pink, and that has, in fact, become part of what was the land which the company was enjoying; probably it would not become theirs by prescription, as the twenty years has not expired, but whilst it remained in their possession, they, as tenants, had encroached upon it for the benefit of the landlord, that is, the railway, it being really part of what the railway had acquired with the rest, according to the same principle, I suppose, although we give no opinion upon that. Supposing the road to be considered as being actually adjoining, the owner’s land, drawing down the line from the corner of it to the nearest point of the railway, no doubt would include part of that which was formerly road, but it also includes the whole of the pink, and the plaintiff not having claimed more than the whole of the pink by his writ of ejectment, it is not necessary now for us to decide how much of the yellow he might claim.

Consequently, for these reasons, we think the plaintiff is entitled to our judgment in this case; and the ground upon which the sheriff will have to give possession will be this: he will have to give the plaintiff possession of the whole of the pink on the west side, and on the east side down to a straight line drawn from the corner where Mr. Turner’s land and the plaintiff’s intersect, and to the corner — the nearest point of the land acquired by the company and used by them for the purposes of their act. That is not very far from where the letter “I” appears on the railway. As to that matter, of course a surveyor had better apply it on the spot.

SHEE, J.—I am of the same opinion (2).
Judgment for the plaintiff.

Use and Occupation—Parties—Occupation under Contract with Agent—Principal and Agent—Auctioneer.

The corporation of Oxford, to whom certain open land belonged, were in the habit of allowing annual races to be held upon part of it, under the management of a committee. Before the races, the plaintiff, an auctioneer, issued an advertisement—"Oxford Races. The ground for booths, &c. will be let by auction by Mr. J. F. (the plaintiff), on Monday next. Conditions for letting standings for booths, &c. The highest bidder to be the taker, and he shall, immediately the lot is knocked down, give the number of feet required, and pay for the same immediately after the letting." The defendant was the highest bidder for a lot of the land, and took possession of and occupied it during the races, without having previously paid for it. The plaintiff having brought an action in his own name for the hire of the land,—Held, (Shee, J. dubitante) that there was evidence on which the jury might find that the contract was with the plaintiff himself.

Declaration for money payable by the defendant to the plaintiff for the hire of land let by him to the defendant.

Plea, never indebted.

At the trial, before Shee, J., at the Sitings in London after Michaelmas Term, 1864, it appeared that the action was brought to recover 27l. as the price at which a plot of ground on Port Meadow, at Oxford, was taken by the defendant, on a letting by auction by the plaintiff as auctioneer.

Port Meadow is a large open common, the property of the corporation of the city of Oxford; and for some years a race committee, formed partly of members of the corporation, have been permitted the use of part of the land for the annual races. No formal proof whatever of title in the corporation, or of any binding legal permission to the race committee, was given in evidence; but the plaintiff proved that he acted in the matter, as in former years, by direction of the race committee.

Handbills were circulated as follows;—

"Oxford Races. Thursday and Friday, August 18 and 19, 1864. The ground for booths, stalls, &c. will be let by auction, by Mr. J. Fisher (the plaintiff), on Monday next, August 15th, on Port Meadow, at eleven o'clock."

The auction accordingly took place on the Monday, and before the sale the following conditions, among others, were read;—

"Conditions for letting standings for booths, &c. on Port Meadow during the races, 1864. By Mr. John Fisher, August 15th, 1864.

"1. The highest bidder to be the taker.

"5. The ground will be let at per foot frontage, commencing near the grand stand, and the taker shall, immediately the lot is knocked down, give the number of feet required, and pay for the same immediately after the letting.

"6. The takers of the respective lots to fill in all the holes and make good any damage done to the ground, and to get cleared away by Saturday next."

The defendant was the highest bidder for lot 4, which was knocked down to him at 30s. per foot, and he took eighteen feet, making 27l. The defendant, who was a freeman of the city, was well known to the plaintiff, and had taken and paid for land in the same way on former occasions; and the plaintiff did not insist on immediate payment. The defendant occupied part of the land himself, and sublet the rest, during the whole of the races, and on being applied to by the plaintiff, on more than one occasion during the races, promised to pay him the 27l.

On this evidence, the learned Judge directed a nonsuit, on the ground that the plaintiff had shewn no title to the land, and could not maintain an action for use and occupation.

A rule having been afterwards obtained for a new trial, on the ground that there was evidence to support the plaintiff's right to sue,—

*The defendant shewed cause in person.—*The only point he urged was that as a freeman he had a right to occupy the ground without paying for it.

H. James, in support of the rule.—The defence now set up is of course untenable. The action is for the hire of land let by the plaintiff to the defendant; possibly what the defendant had was a mere licence, and ought to have been by deed; but after enjoyment that objection cannot be set up—The King v. All Saints, Derby (1). The point, however, on which the learned Judge was understood to proceed at the trial was, that use and occupation would not lie at the suit of the plaintiff, who let as auctioneer; and from what passed on moving the rule, Evans v. Evans (2) seems to have been the authority on which he acted. But Evans v. Evans (2) is no authority that an auctioneer or other agent cannot maintain an action for use and occupation if the contract were with him. Gurney, B., who tried the cause, held that he could, as there was an express contract between him and the defendant; and it was only on the latter point that the Court held the direction wrong, as the real principal's name appeared on the conditions of sale.

In some cases the auctioneer's right to sue has been put upon his possession and lien for the price—Robinson v. Rutter (3) and Holmes v. Tutton (4). But the rights and liabilities arise from the contract. An auctioneer is personally liable on the contract like any other agent, if he do not disclose his principal at the time of the contract—Franklyn v. Lamond (5).

[BLACKBURN, J. — That case certainly seems to be an authority that the auctioneer is personally liable on the contract, and therefore, e converso, has a right to sue.]

It may be said, that a contract for letting land is not like a mere sale of a chattel; but the case of Churchward v. Ford (6) shews that the action for use and occupation depends on the contract between the parties and not on the title; Sloper v. Saunders (7) is to the same effect. In Sykes v. Giles (8),

Lord Abinger, C.B., speaking of an auctioneer, says, "The rule of law is, that the agent who makes the contract may bring an action on the contract in respect of his privity, and the principal in respect of his interest." In the present case, no doubt the plaintiff was known, like any other auctioneer, to be acting for some one else, but it would be difficult to say who his principals were; the contract, as evidenced by the conditions, was to take the land of him and pay him for it.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of opinion that the rule must be absolute for a new trial, on the ground that there was evidence on which the jury might have found for the plaintiff. The defence the defendant now sets up is, that, although he agreed to pay for the permission to occupy the land, he had title superior to those who let him the land. But it is not open to the defendant, after having entered on the land under an agreement, to dispute the title of those with whom he agreed, until he has restored possession. At the trial, however, the nonsuit proceeded on the ground that the plaintiff was not the proper person to sue; and that was a good ground, for though the defendant had made himself liable to the plaintiff's employers, the plaintiff could not sue the defendant unless he has made himself liable to the plaintiff personally. It may be said that the fact of the plaintiff appearing as auctioneer was evidence that he was only an agent; and, no doubt, where an agent makes a contract, stating who his principal is, the principal and not the agent is the person generally the party to the contract, if the agent have the authority he alleges; but, on the other hand, an agent may, and often does, make himself personally a party to the contract, if the form of the contract be such as to amount to saying, "Although I am agent only, nevertheless I contract for myself." And although the principal may in some cases take advantage of such a contract, the agent, being the contracting party, is clearly liable, and can therefore sue upon it—Higgins v. Senior (9). Now, here, the plaintiff says, "I, as auctioneer, that is, as agent, let land, and I contract that, on the price agreed being paid to me, the person paying the price shall have the enjoyment of the land." The agreement was not reduced to writing; but that is the effect of the conditions of the auction and what took place at the auction. It may be that it was known that the plaintiff was not acting for himself, but under the directions of the race, or some other, committee; but that is immaterial for the present purpose, if a contract may be made with an agent notwithstanding he is known to be an agent. There were numerous reasons why the contract should be made by and with the plaintiff himself; and at all events there was evidence for the jury that the contract was with him.

In Franklyn v. Lamond (5) the Court of Common Pleas held, that auctioneers selling railway shares as auctioneers, but without naming the owners of them, and making the money payable at their office, made themselves personally liable for the fulfilment of the contract; and that case is therefore an authority that a contract made by a bidding at a sale, when the principal is undisclosed, is evidence of a contract between the highest bidder and the auctioneer personally; and we have, therefore, authority for saying that in the present case there was evidence for the jury that the contract was with the plaintiff, the auctioneer, personally. Then the contract being with the plaintiff personally, may that be answered in an action for use and occupation by shewing that the plaintiff had no title? In general a defendant would be estopped from denying the title of the person from whom he took the land.

In Evans v. Evans (2) it was not held that the auctioneer could not maintain an action for use and occupation, but it appeared on the face of the conditions that the auctioneer was letting for David Jones, whose name appeared on the conditions of sale as approving them; the auctioneer therefore was no more than an agent or servant, and prima facie when the name of the principal is disclosed, the principal and not the agent makes the contract. It was objected at the trial that there must be a nonsuit, as the plaintiffs, who let as auctioneers, could not maintain an action for use and occupation; but the Judge overruled this objection, on the ground that there was an express contract between the plaintiffs and the defendant, and he told the jury that prima facie the contract was with the auctioneers; but that was held wrong by the Court, but only under the particular form of the conditions of sale and the other facts of the case. Patteson, J. says, "The question here does not turn upon the objection raised as ground of nonsuit. The question is, by whose permission did the occupation take place, and by whom was the contract made? That is in general a matter to go to the jury; but if the question depends upon the construction to be put upon a document which is in evidence, then it rests with the Court. Here the conditions of sale constitute the only document, and upon that I can see no doubt. If the plaintiffs let for themselves, why is David Jones's name added? The plaintiffs would in that case have been the persons to sign. The document does not say by whom the premises are let. It is true that the rent is to be paid into the hands of 'Messrs. Evans & Thomas (the plaintiffs), auctioneers;' but this amounts only to an authority given by Jones to pay into their hands; indeed it is more than authority, it is an express direction. This was not put to the jury by the learned Judge. He has therefore not explained to them the proper construction of the document." And Coleridge, J. says, "At first I thought that the fact was properly left to the jury. But as it was to be determined by the construction of a document, the effect of that document should have been properly explained to them by the Judge. Here the letting was professedly by the plaintiffs as auctioneers, and Jones signed the conditions. As to the contract by the defendant, there was clearly a misdirection."

In the present case there is no named principal; but the question is, whether the defendant had occupied by permission of the plaintiff by reason of the contract by which the defendant agreed to pay the plaintiff, and the plaintiff agreed that the defendant should have the enjoyment of the land. That question ought to have been left to the jury, and there must therefore be a new trial.

MELLOB, J.—I am of the same opinion. There was evidence on which the jury might have found that the plaintiff was entitled to recover. In fact the land belonged to the corporation, and the race committee were permitted to use it for the purposes of the racea. But the plaintiff advertised the letting by him as auctioneer; and by the conditions the highest bidder was to pay at once on the hammer falling, and there was no statement in the handbill or conditions of sale, nor was there any evidence that the plaintiff was acting for any particular persons; and there were abundant reasons, from the nature of the land and the peculiar title, that the contract should be with the auctioneer, and that he should be made the person to whom the money should be paid on the letting. The defendant clearly had no merits; he had had what he contracted for. The defendant's own case now is, that he had himself an interest in the land; that defence was clearly not open to him. I think there was evidence that the defendant did hold by permission of the plaintiff although he was only auctioneer. The permission was enjoyed by the defendant under the express contract made by his bidding at the auction, and the question for the jury was, whether the contract was between him and the plaintiff.

SHEE, J.—The declaration is in terms for the hire of land; but I cannot distinguish this case from the ordinary case of use and occupation, and I do not understand that either of my learned Brothers thinks there is any distinction. The question is, whether the plaintiff let as agent or as landlord. The plaintiff himself said, "I have been employed on former occasions as well as on this by the race committee"; and it is perfectly clear that he was not letting the land on his own account, but as agent of others. Though I perfectly agree with the rest of the Court that a contract may be made with an agent personally though he be known to be acting as agent, I doubt whether that principle applies here. In Evans v. Evans (2), it was perfectly clear that the finding of the jury under the direction given by the Judge was not supported by the facts. In that case the plaintiffs, as auctioneers, had let the land to the defendant under conditions in which the rent was to be paid into the hands of the auctioneers; but these conditions were signed at the foot as affirmed by David Jones, who was the tenant of the land at the time of the auction. Jones was at the time indebted to the plaintiffs, and the Judge having ruled that there was an express contract between the plaintiffs and the defendant, the jury found on the facts that the plaintiffs let on their own account as creditors under an arrangement with Jones, and not as agents; but the Court were of opinion that the Judge was wrong, as the conditions themselves shewed the contract of letting to be made by the plaintiffs as agents only of Jones. Patteson, J. says, "The question of fact is, by whose permission did the occupation take place, and by whom was the contract made?" That is, was the letting on behalf of Jones or on the plaintiffs' own account? It is true that in the present case it did not appear for whom the plaintiff was acting; but it was only as auctioneer that he let. My learned Brothers think that the omission of all mention of the principal's name in the conditions may make this a contract of letting by the plaintiff himself. I confess I do not see this so clearly.

Parochial Assessments—Union Assessment Committee Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 103), ss. 14, 16, 17, 26, 37, and 39.—New Valuation—Costs.

An assessment committee, under 25 & 26 Vict. c. 103. having given notice to the overseers of a parish to return a valuation list (under s. 14.) of their parish in ten days, proceeded before the lapse of three months from their appointment to appoint a valuer, to make a valuation of the parish. Afterwards, and after the three months, the overseers returned a valuation list, which was deemed unsatisfactory by the committee and guardians, and the valuer was directed to complete his valuation, which exceeded by more than one-sixth the amount of the valuation returned by the parish:—Held, that the expense of this valuation by the person appointed by the committee could not be charged against the parish under section 39, nor as compensation under section 37.

Limitations, Statute of—Mines—Damage by Working.

If by the act of A. an injury is occasioned to the foundations of the house of B, of which B. has not at the time any knowledge, but which afterwards exhibits itself by creating actual mischief to B.'s house, B. is not prevented by the Statute of Limitations from maintaining an action for damages, though more than six years have elapsed since the doing of the act which was in reality (though unknown at the time) the origin of the mischief, for the cause of action really accrued when the actual damage first exhibited itself.

Declaration, by Bonomi and his wife, that certain messuages and buildings situate in the parish of West Auckland, in the county of Durham, were in the occupation of William Parkin as tenant thereof, the reversion of and in the said premises then and still being in and belonging to the plaintiff, Bonomi, in right of his wife; that the plaintiffs, in right of the said Caroline, were entitled to have the said messuages and buildings supported by the mines, earth and soil underground, contiguous and near to and under the said messuages and buildings; that the defendant, well knowing the premises, wrongfully, carelessly, negligently and improperly, and without leaving any proper or sufficient support in that behalf, worked certain coal-mines underground, contiguous and near to and under the said messuages and buildings, and dug for and got and took away coals, earth and soil out of the said mines, and wrongfully and unjustly kept and continued the said messuages and buildings, and caused them to be and remain without any proper or reasonable or sufficient support, for a long space of time, whereby and by reason of the premises the foundations of the said messuages and buildings became and were greatly weakened and injured, and the walls of the said messuages and buildings became and were cracked and injured, and the ground on which the said messuages and buildings stood subsided and cracked, swagged and gave way; and by means of the premises the plaintiffs were injured in their reversionary estate and interest in the said message, &c.

Pleas—first, not guilty; secondly, that the messuages and buildings were not in the occupation of Parkin as tenant; thirdly, that the reversion was not in the plaintiffs as alleged; fourthly, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to have the messuages and buildings supported by the mines, earth and soil underground, contiguous, near to and under them; fifthly, that the alleged causes of action did not accrue within six years before action; sixthly, that the defendant did what was complained of by the plaintiffs' leave. Issues thereon.

At the trial of the cause, at the Summer Assizes for Durham, in 1856, a verdict was taken for the plaintiffs in this and four other actions between other plaintiffs and the same defendant, subject to a reference to Mr. Hindmarch; the referee to state a case for the opinion of the Court. Mr. Hindmarch, having heard counsel and witnesses, subsequently stated the following

CASE.

The messuages and buildings in the declaration mentioned are situated on the north side of the village of West Auckland, in the county of Durham, and they consist of a dwelling-house and outbuilding contiguous to each other, which are now and have for some time past been used as an inn called the Crown Inn, and a yard immediately behind the dwelling-house and buildings. The dwelling-house and other buildings are all ancient, and they had been in existence for more than forty years before they sustained the injuries complained of in the declaration, and immediately before sustaining these injuries they were in good repair. The said messuages and buildings, the land on which they stand and the yard behind them, were, on the 23rd of September 1835, conveyed to the female plaintiff, then unmarried, in fee simple; and on her marriage with the other plaintiff, which took place on the 27th of December 1837, the plaintiffs became and have ever since continued to be seised of the said messuages, buildings, yard and land, as of fee, in right of the female plaintiff. In the year 1848 the said messuages and buildings and yard were let by the plaintiffs to W. Parkin, who has continued ever since that time to occupy the same as tenant thereof to the plaintiffs, the reversion in fee being in them. The messuages and buildings and the land upon which they stand were, at all times before those messuages and buildings sustained the injuries complained of in the declaration, firmly supported by the mines, earth and soil underground, and as well by those under the lands contiguous and near to, as by those under the said messuages, buildings and land of the plaintiffs. The defendant and some other persons, for several years before and until the month of June 1853, were lessees of West Auckland Colliery, consisting, amongst others, of the colliery lying under all the lands surrounding and immediately adjoining the plaintiffs' said dwelling-house, buildings and land. The defendant and his co-lessees held a large part of these mines under a lease for years granted by the late Bishop of Durham, to whom that part of the mines belonged in right of his see; another part of the mines under a lease for years granted by Sir W. Eden, to whom that part of the mines belonged; the residue of the mines worked by the defendant and his co-lessees were chiefly under small parcels of land, and they worked those parts of the mines generally by special agreements made with the owners of the coal from time to time, but, in at least one case, they worked the coal without consent of the owner of it. The defendant and his co-lessees worked the coal-mines under the plaintiffs' said dwelling-house and buildings and land, and also under all the lands surrounding and adjoining to the plaintiffs' dwelling-house, buildings and land, and had nearly finished their workings under all those lands on the 20th of May 1850; but the residue, being only a small portion of the workings of the mines in that district, and near to the said village of West Auckland, was executed and completed after that time, and within the term of six years next before the commencement of this action. There was not any evidence given before the arbitrator that the plaintiffs in any way assented to the coal under their said dwelling-house, buildings and land being worked by the defendant and his co-lessees. The coal under the plaintiffs' said house, buildings and land, and under the land surrounding and adjoining the house, buildings and land of the plaintiffs, was of a quality called "cleety," being liable, upon exposure to the air, gradually to become disintegrated and fall to pieces.

The defendant and his co-lessees worked the coal-mines under, contiguous and near to the plaintiffs' house, buildings and land in the usual manner, taking away a portion of the coal, and leaving the residue standing as pillars to support the roof of the mines. The pillars of coal thus left standing unworked by the defendant and his co-lessees in many places would have been amply sufficient to support the roof, and bear the ordinary superincumbent weight and pressure upon them, if all the other parts of the defendant's mines had been worked in the same manner. In several other places the pillars of coal which the defendant and his co-lessees had left standing and unworked were of smaller dimensions than those above mentioned. Those smaller pillars would have been sufficient to support the roof and sustain all the superincumbent weight for many years to come, if the roof of the defendant's mine in all other parts had been properly supported; but owing to the peculiar properties of the coal already mentioned, these last-mentioned pillars would not have permanently supported the parts of the roof which were above them, and they would ultimately have given way, and let down those parts of the roof which were supported by the weak pillars; but it is impossible to determine whether such partial falls in the roof would or would not have caused any injury to the plaintiffs' house and buildings. In working those parts of the mines, where pillars of coal were left standing unworked for the purpose of supporting the roof as above mentioned, the defendant and his co-lessees were not guilty of any negligence or improper working, except in leaving a portion of the pillars too small, having regard to the nature of the coal as above mentioned.

Before the year 1842 the then lessees of the colliery had, in working the mines under lands to the northward of the plaintiffs' house and buildings, commencing at a point at about 165 yards from that house and buildings, first worked a portion of the coal, leaving pillars in the usual manner, and afterwards, and before the year just mentioned, worked away the whole of the pillars, which is a mode of working amongst miners called "working the broken." The effect of the removal of those pillars was to let down the whole of the roof of that district of the mine, and produce what is called a "goaf." The place in which the mines were thus worked is called the "North Goaf." The defendant and his co-lessees, in the year 1846 and 1847, worked a part of their mines under lands called "The Batts," to the north-east of the plaintiffs' house and buildings, and after working the coal in the usual manner they, during those two years, worked and removed the pillars of coal which had been previously left unworked, and in consequence the roof of that part of the mine fell down. Those parts of the workings in which the pillars were so worked away by the defendant and his co-lessees are called respectively "Batts Goaf" and "South Batts Goaf." Batts Goaf is about 254 yards, and South Batts Goaf about 386 yards from the plaintiffs' property. None of the workings which have already been mentioned could alone have caused, or did in fact cause, any part of the damage complained of by the plaintiffs in this action; but the working of those three goaves did nevertheless render the plaintiffs' house, buildings and land more liable to be injured by the thrust which was produced by the defendant and his co-lessees working "Simpson's Goaf," as hereinafter mentioned; but neither of the three goaves firstly above mentioned produced any thrust such as is hereinafter mentioned. In the year 1848 the defendant and his co-lessees purchased the coal under about four and a half acres of land belonging to Daniel Simpson, and they worked the coal during that and the following year. After working this coal in the usual manner, the defendant and his co-lessees, in the year 1849, worked and removed the pillars of coal which they had previously left unworked, under about two acres of Daniel Simpson's land, and thus formed what is called "Simpson's Goaf," which is about 280 yards from the plaintiffs' property. The removal of pillars of coal in Simpson's Goaf was completed before the latter end of the year 1849, since which time there has not been any working in Simpson's Goaf.

After the year 1849 the roof of that part of the mine commenced to fall, and during the year 1850 the roof and the strata of stone, earth, and other material above that part of the mine fell down, and subsided to such an extent and in such a manner as to produce what is, amongst miners, called "a thrust," and ultimately also the injurious consequences resulting from "a thrust." The "thrust" thus produced by this working of the coal under Simpson's land, or, in other words, by the working of Simpson's Goaf, was similar to other thrusts in its effect upon surrounding lands in its vicinity, and, consequently, those effects slowly and gradually extended to the lands surrounding Simpson's Goaf, under which the coal had been worked, leaving pillars for the support of the roof of the mines under those lands. As the thrust in its progress arrived at any land under which the coal had been worked, the earth and materials above the pillars of coal were dislocated or disturbed to such an extent as to throw down or crush the pillars of coal which had been left to support the roof of the mine, and then the roof of the mine fell and the superincumbent strata, and also the soil on the surface subsided gradually, but irregularly. The houses and other buildings upon the lands which were thus disturbed and let down were extensively injured, and houses and buildings in the immediate vicinity of Simpson's Goaf were thus injured during the year 1850, and the defendant and his co-lessees repaired or paid for the repair of those houses and buildings. The plaintiffs' house and buildings were not injured before the year 1854, but during the course of that year the thrust and its injurious effects began to operate upon the plaintiffs' land and the surrounding lands, and the pillars of coal underneath all these lands were thrown down or crushed, and, consequently, the surface of the land, the foundations of the plaintiffs' house and buildings, and the various strata of stone and other materials between the surface and the coal-mine were disturbed, and subsided in such a manner as, in the month of December 1854, to cause a portion of the damage to the plaintiffs' house and buildings complained of in the declaration. Since the year 1854 the plaintiffs' land had been further disturbed, and has further subsided, in consequence of the continued operation of the thrust above mentioned, and the plaintiffs' house and buildings had in consequence received further damage between that year and the commencement of this action on the 20th of May 1856.

Before the disturbance and subsidence first commenced in December 1854, the plaintiffs did not know, and had no reason to suspect, that the thrust which was the cause of such disturbance and subsidence was in operation or in existence, nor had they any knowledge of the way in which the defendant and his co-lessees had worked the mines under Simpson's land so as to create Simpson's Goaf, and to produce the thrust above mentioned. Since the commencement of the action further subsidence and disturbance of the plaintiffs' land and the foundation of their house and buildings have been occasioned by the thrust, and the house and buildings have in consequence been further injured. The injuries to the plaintiffs' house and buildings above mentioned, and as well those sustained before as since the commencement of the action, are very considerable, and they have much diminished the value of the house and buildings. The thrust produced by the working of Simpson's Goaf by the defendant and his co-lessees, as above mentioned, has been the cause, and the sole cause, of all the damage complained of in the declaration, and all the other damage above mentioned. After the commencement of the thrust the defendant and his co-lessees did not take any steps to arrest the further progress of it, or to prevent it from extending to the plaintiffs' property; and the pillars of coal under the lands surrounding the plaintiffs' land were inadequate alone to withstand the pressure thrown upon them by the thrust. If the coal-mines under the lands surrounding the plaintiffs' house and buildings had been left unworked to a sufficient distance from the house and buildings, they would not have sustained any of the damage complained of in the declaration. The defendant and his co-lessees, after they had worked the mines under the lands surrounding the plaintiffs' house and buildings, might have supported the roof at those parts of the mines in such a manner as to have prevented the damage complained of in the declaration; but the expense of so doing would have been very great, and would in the whole have amounted to a much larger sum than the value of the property injured. The thrust produced by working Simpson's Goaf as above mentioned is still in operation, and will in all probability continue in operation for a considerable time to come, and in all probability the house and buildings of the plaintiffs will sustain further injury, and the plaintiffs will sustain further damage, by reason of the thrust and its injurious effects upon their house, buildings and land. In the month of June 1853 the defendant and his co-lessees ceased to work the mines, and transferred all their terms and interest in them to Messrs. H. W. F. Bolchow and J. Vaughan (who had agreed to be made parties to the reference), and they ever since that time have been and still are in possession of the above-mentioned mines, and they have been and now are working coals in some parts of the mines at a considerable distance from the plaintiffs' property. By the deed of assignment which transferred the colliery from the defendant and his co-lessees to Messrs. Bolchow and Vaughan those gentlemen covenanted with the defendant and his co-lessees to indemnify them against all claims for damage occasioned by the past or future working of the mines. The acts which occasioned the damage and injuries above mentioned were all of them done without the plaintiffs' leave.

The arbitrator then found that the messuages and buildings in the declaration mentioned were in the occupation of W. Parkin, as tenant thereof, as in the declaration alleged; that the reversion of and in the said messuages and buildings did belong to the plaintiffs, as in the declaration alleged. With respect to the issue upon the defendant's fourth plea, so far as that issue involves any question of fact, that the plaintiffs were entitled to have the said messuages and buildings supported by the mines underground contiguous and near to and under the said messuages and buildings, as in the declaration alleged.

The questions for the opinion of the Court were, first, whether the facts above stated entitled the plaintiffs to a verdict on the issue joined on the first plea, as to all or any and which of the causes of action mentioned in the declaration. If the plaintiffs were so entitled as to all or any of such causes of action, the verdict was to be entered for them on that issue accordingly, otherwise for the defendant.

Secondly, whether the facts above stated entitle the plaintiffs or the defendant to a verdict on the issue joined on the fourth plea, and the verdict on that issue was to be entered as the Court should direct.

Thirdly, whether the facts above stated entitled the plaintiffs to a verdict on the issue joined on the fifth plea as to all or any and which of the causes of action in the declaration mentioned. If the plaintiffs were so entitled as to all or any of such causes of action, the verdict was to be entered for them on that issue accordingly, otherwise for the defendant.

The verdict was to be entered for the plaintiffs on each of the other issues.

If the verdict was to be entered for the plaintiffs upon the issues joined on the first, fourth and fifth pleas, another question for the opinion of the Court was, fourthly, whether the defendant was responsible for all the damages which had been sustained by the plaintiffs by reason of the injuries to their said messuages and buildings above described, or for any and what part of that damage; and whether he was responsible in any and what respect for the probable future damage which might be occasioned in manner above described, or for damage occasioned by the diminution in value of the said messuages and buildings by reason of their insecure state and condition, or the injuries which would probably be hereafter occasioned by the further progress of the thrust as above mentioned.

In the Court of Queen's Bench, judgment was given for the defendant, on the ground that the cause of action had accrued more than six years before action brought (1); but this judgment was reversed in the Exchequer Chamber (2), and this appeal was then brought.

The Judges were summoned, and Pollock, C.B., Wightman, J., Williams, J., Blackburn, J., Byles, J. and Wilde, B. attended.

Sir F. Kelly and Mr. Phipson, for the plaintiff in error, contended that the injury occurred and the right of action was complete when the supports were taken away. They cited—

Sir F. Kelly, in reply.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (LORD WESTBURY) moved that the following question be put to the Judges: "A. B. is the owner of a house, C. D. is the owner of a mine under the house and under the surrounding land; C. D. works the mine, and in so doing leaves insufficient support to the house. The house is not damaged, nor is the enjoyment of it prejudiced until some time after the workings have ceased. Can A. B. bring an action at any time within six years after the mischief happened, or must he bring it within six years after the workings rendered the support insufficient?"

The LORD CHIEF BARON, in the name of the learned Judges, answered, "I am desired by my learned Brothers to deliver our unanimous opinion in answer to your Lordships' question. We are all of opinion that A. B. may bring an action at any time within six years after the mischief done, and we are of that opinion for the reasons given in the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber" (3).

The LORD CHANCELLOR expressed the thanks of their Lordships to the learned Judges, and then observed that no important doubt could be entertained upon the question. It was clear both upon principle and authority, that when the mischief actually occurred the cause of action arose, and the action might then be maintained. The decision in Nicklin v. Williams (4) was beyond all question. Some of the dicta there uttered might not be necessary for the decision of the case, but the case itself was a decisive authority. The judgment here ought to be affirmed.

LORD BROUGHAM concurred.

LORD CRANWORTH was of the same opinion. It had been supposed that the right of the party whose land was interfered with was a right to what was called "the pillars," or the support. His real right was to the ordinary enjoyment of his land, and till that was interfered with he had no cause of complaint. The case of slanderous words might furnish an illustration here. Suppose a slander to be uttered, not actionable in itself, but under which special damage afterwards arose to somebody; the person complaining could bring no action till he had actually suffered the damage. The words of the Statute of Limitations did not permit actions to be brought for words beyond a period of six years after the words spoken; but it was that express statutory provision which alone prevented that case from furnishing a clear analogy to the present case.

LORD WENSLEYDALE concurred. The right in this case was the right to the enjoyment of the property, and there was an obligation cast on the owner of the neighbouring property not to interrupt that enjoyment.

LORD CHELMSFORD was of the same opinion.

Judgment of the Exchequer Chamber affirmed.

Habeas Corpus — Extradition — 6 & 7 Vict. c. 76. s. 1. — Forgery — America.

By section 1. of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 76, provision is made for the committal in this country, with a view to being delivered up to justice in the United States of America, of persons charged with the crime of murder, forgery, &c. By a statute of the State of New York, "Every person who, with intent to defraud, shall make any false entry . . . in any book of account kept by any monied corporation within this State . . . shall, upon conviction, be adjudged guilty of forgery in the third degree." A requisition was made by the Government of the United States for the extradition from this country of a person who was charged with committing the offence of forgery under the above statute:—Held, that inasmuch as the offence committed did not amount to forgery by the law of England and of the United States (the two contracting parties to the Treaty of Extradition referred to in the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 76. s. 1), the person charged was not liable to be given up by this country.

May 12. } COWPER v. FLETCHER.

Landlord and Tenant—Joint-Tenants—Distress—Estoppel.

One or two joint-tenants may demise his or their portion to another, so as to create the relationship of landlord and tenant between them, with a right to distrain in respect of rent in arrear. Thus, three co-executors may agree that one shall hold land, devised to them in trust, at a fixed rent, and if the rent falls into arrear, he may be distrained upon in respect of it.

Semble, also, that when he has taken possession and has paid rent, he would be estopped from denying their right to distrain.

Trespass for breaking and entering a timber-yard, office and stabling of the plaintiff, and taking away fixtures, goods and chattels of the plaintiff, and keeping him out of possession thereof, until he paid the defendant a sum of money in order to regain possession of them, whereby &c.

There were also counts for money had and received, and on accounts stated.

The defendant pleaded not guilty to the first count, and never indebted to the residue of the declaration.

The particulars delivered in the action shewed that it was brought in respect of a distress which had been put in by the defendant for rent alleged to be due from the plaintiff (James Cowper) to Joseph Cowper and John Scholes Hague; the plaintiff having been compelled to pay 87*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.*, the amount of rent claimed, and 4*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.*, the amount of the expenses.

At the trial, which took place before Mellor, J., at the last Spring Assizes, holden at Manchester, it appeared that, under the will of William Cowper, of Oldham, in the county of Lancaster, all his real and personal estates were devised to his brothers, Joseph and James Cowper, and John Scholes Hague, in trust to pay a legacy of 100*l.*, and, subject thereto, upon trust to pay and divide the residue unto and equally amongst the grandchildren of his late brother Thomas, and his said brothers, Joseph and James, and his sister, in equal shares and proportions as tenants in common. He also appointed his said brothers Joseph and James and John Scholes Hague executors of his will. Among other property left by the testator, were a timber-yard and premises at Oldham. The plaintiff was entitled to one-ninth part of the property left, and he and the other two executors divided the personalty among the persons entitled to it; but with regard to the real estate, it was determined that it should be let to a tenant.

On the 18th of October 1855 the plaintiff sent the following proposal to his co-executors:

"To the Executors of the late William Cowper, deceased.

"Gentlemen,—I having entered upon the slate-trade, and having had the offer of a yard for a timber-yard, but before accepting the same, I wish to make some proposal to you. That I will take all the slate and timber belonging to you at the yard and at the stations at Oldham at a valuation, to be made by one person, if we can agree upon one, and if not, then each party to appoint one, and they to appoint an umpire before they commence; the said valuer or valuers are then empowered also to fix the annual rent I shall pay for the timber-yard, office and stabling, and for a term of years to be fixed upon between us. That I will receive the rents of the cottages and houses at Oldham, free of expense to you, and see that they are kept in repair as you request. The amount of the value to be secured to your satisfaction, or paid in a month from the delivery of the valuation. I must have an answer in a few days from this date or I shall consider this offer is rejected.

"Yours, &c.,

"Oldham, October 18th, 1855."

The following document was afterwards signed by all three executors:

"We, the undersigned, executors of the late Mr. William Cowper deceased, do hereby agree to the proposal of Mr. James Cowper, hereunto annexed, on condition that the slate in transitu, and also all the plant, moving stock and effects belonging to the deceased's trades (excepting the grey mare), be included therein, and taken by the said James Cowper on the terms contained in his said proposal, and that he do take the timber-yard, office and stabling as a yearly tenant. And it is hereby further agreed between all parties undersigned that the valuation referred to in the said proposal shall be made by a person to be nominated by the undersigned John Scholes Hague, the decision of which person in the premises shall be final and binding upon all parties, the payment of the amount of the valuation to be made or secured as in the said proposal is mentioned.

"Dated this 1st day of November 1855.

(Signed) "Joseph Cowper,

"James Cowper,

"John Scholes Hague."

The plaintiff entered into possession, and in November 1862, 270*l.* was due from him for a year and a half's rent, whereupon a distress was put in, and the following letter was written by the plaintiff:

December 6, 1862.

"I write to you under a very painful case, but I presume you are aware of the proceedings. I only beg of you to be kind enough to accept of me 180*l.* on Tuesday, and let the other half year be paid in May, that is, 180*l.* when due. I have paid this morning 105*l.* before I was aware of these proceedings, and I really can't pay any more at present, and if you be so unkind as to sell for it, I am ruined, for there is no money to buy anything here. I really beg of you to write to Mr. Littler to be so kind as to accept the 180*l.* I have been doing all I could to get my money in for you. Mr. Littler has wrote to Mr. Robinson to-day to hear his reply to what I now have stated to you, hoping you will not see me put into distress at this time; money is very bad to get in; things is very bad here. I wish you to see Mr. Robinson before he writes to Mr. Littler; we are in great distress, and hopes you all will be satisfied with my request."

The rent was subsequently paid; but in May 1863 it became again necessary to press for payment, and the plaintiff then wrote the following letter:

Oldham, May 23, 1863.

"H. T. Robinson, Esq.—Dear Sir,—I saw Mr. J. S. Hague on Saturday night, and he advised me to write to you to see if you could not come to some better agreement with me than selling me up for this half-year's rent, as I really can't pay it at present; if you could put it in a shape to suit both sides it perhaps would be better for both. I am in a fair way for doing something for myself, I hope. I have been sadly deceived with all I have had about me, and I now have in debts about 300*l.*, but I can't get it at present. If they will be kind enough to wait about two or three months it would suit me, but I will leave it to you to arrange. I can find a sufficient bondsman for the rent."

The plaintiff subsequently became bankrupt, and the rent was paid by his assignees; but he got into possession again, and in May 1864, another distress was put in upon his goods in order to get the rent then in arrear. The plaintiff paid the amount claimed in order to get rid of the distress, and then commenced this action against the defendant, who, as the bailiff of John Scholes Hague and Joseph Cowper, had levied the distress.

The verdict was entered for the defendant; and leave was given to the plaintiff to move to set it aside, and enter the verdict for himself instead.

Brett moved for and obtained a rule accordingly, on the ground that, although Joseph Cowper and J. S. Hague might by agreement with the plaintiff, their co-tenant, give him as against them exclusive possession of the joint property, yet that the agreement did not create such a tenancy as carried with it a right to distrain.

R. G. Williams shewed cause against the rule.—The letters which passed between the defendant and the plaintiff, and the distress which was submitted to by him, conclude the case, and shew that the plaintiff was a tenant, unless it is impossible that two of three joint-tenants should stand in the relationship of landlords to a third. If a man takes land from others, goes into possession, and pays rent for it, there is enough to shew that he is a tenant. But, further, it is laid down in 1 Bac. Abr. 5. that, "If one joint-tenant or tenant in common makes a lease for years of his part to his companion, this is good; for this only gives him a right of taking the whole profits, where before he had but a right to the moiety thereof; and he may contract with his companion for that purpose, as well as he may with any stranger." And he refers, among other authorities, to Co. Litt. 186 a. The same passage occurs at p. 496, where a reference is given to Pleadal's case (1), where the case was, "That a man seised of lands in fee took a lease by indenture of the herbage and pannage of the same land. It was the opinion of the whole Court that the same was no estoppel to him to claim the soil or the freehold; and it was said by Plowden and agreed by the Court, that if the father and son be joint-tenants for a hundred years, and the son takes a lease of his father for fifteen years, to begin, &c., the same shall conclude the son to claim the whole or parcel of it by survivor."

[MELLOR, J.—The co-executors assume that they have power to demise to the plaintiff, and instead of disputing their right, he assents to it and becomes their tenant. I think that the parol agreement is stronger than the one in the correspondence. BLACKBURN, J. referred to James v. Portman (2), where Popham held that one joint-tenant might make a lease to the other, although he cannot infeoff, for a lease is but a contract; but Fenner doubted whether one joint-tenant could make a lease to the other, but said that "by the contract he had excluded himself from the profits," so that it seemed to be left uncertain whether there could be a lease or not.]

That view is adopted by Bacon as being correct. But, further, the plaintiff is estopped from saying that he is not tenant, that there was no demise to him, and that there is no right to distrain, inasmuch as he has assented to the demise and has paid rent.

Brett, in support of the rule.—Before the lease was granted all the executors were in possession of each and every part. There is no doubt that they intended that there should be an agreement, and it may be that two joint-tenants may make an agreement with another; but it is submitted that, under the circumstances, it could not operate so as to give a right to the defendants to distrain. While the agreement lasted the plaintiff had the reversion.

[BLACKBURN, J.—May it not operate as a severance, and the defendants have power to distrain for the severed part?]

They retire and let the plaintiff have the sole and exclusive possession of the whole. In point of law he was in possession of the whole.

[BLACKBURN, J.—Upon referring to the Year Book, 11 Hen. 6. fol. 33, I find that it does not throw much light upon the matter, as the decision turns upon a pleading point; but it is quite clear what construction Lord Coke put upon it—see Co. Litt., book 3, note to section 288, where he says, "And one joyntenant may let his part for yeares or at will to his companion;" and he then refers to the Year Book.]

Suppose a stranger was to enter upon the land, it is probable that the plaintiff might bring an action; but if the co-executors had entered, could it have been maintained that they had no right to do so? As regards the rest of the world they continued to be in possession. Again, the only persons who could authorize a distress would be the two defendants, and the plaintiff as well, so that he would be supposed to be authorizing a distress upon himself. It is submitted that the doctrine of estoppel does not apply in any way to such a case, when the law does not sanction the distress.

BLACKBURN, J.—I think that this rule must be discharged. The point which is really raised is this, that the action has been brought in respect of the distress put in by the defendants, who have justified under a plea of not guilty by statute 11 Geo. 2. c. 19. s. 21, and therefore a defence is made out if there was any rent in arrear for which a distress might be made. We have to determine whether, when the cause was tried before my Brother Mellor, there was evidence that there was some lease from the defendants and some rent in arrear. Now, the facts which were proved were a little peculiar, but there is enough to shew that a sufficient relationship of landlord and tenant existed to justify a distress. Under the will of the testator the plaintiff and the two defendants were co-executors, and were also joint-tenants of this property, and it appears by the agreement that the plaintiff wrote to the executors, who, to speak literally, were himself and the defendants, and offered to take a lease of the timber-yard, office and stabling, and then that he joined with them in the writing upon which are the words, "We, the undersigned, executors of the late William Cowper," and underneath are the names of all three of them.—[The learned Judge read the agreement.]—This is not the actual agreement under which the distress was afterwards made; but it throws light upon what occurred afterwards when a parol agreement was entered into and the plaintiff took the property at a rent, and when he afterwards submitted to a distress, evidently supposing that he was the tenant. It is now set up that this cannot operate as a lease, and that there was no rent in arrear under such lease for which a distress might be legally made; but I think that it is clear that the parties were agreeing for a lease, and that we ought to give effect to it in this way, that the two defendants who were seised of two-thirds of the land agreed to let to the plaintiff those two-thirds, and allowed him to have the exclusive possession of the remaining third, which was in him.—Lord Coke says, see Co. Litt. 186, a, "And where two joyntenants be, the one of them may make the other his baylife of his moiety, and have an action of account against him. And one joyntenant may let his part for yeares or at will to his companion." I can only understand by these words that he meant an ordinary lease with the incident of distress attached to it, and it would amount to making a severance of estate, and there would be a reversion and rent in arrear, with a right of distress. If this be not so then it must come to this, that the parties have agreed together that the plaintiff should retire from the possession of his part, and that they should demise the whole to him; and I venture to think that during the continuance of such possession he would be estopped from saying that he was not tenant, and the case in Leonard seems to shew that the validity of the distress might be supported on both grounds, but I would rather prefer to rest my judgment upon the first.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. At the trial my impression was, that the transaction would operate as an estoppel; when the motion was made by Mr. Brett, we thought that we ought to look for some authority upon the subject, and the rule was granted in order that the matter might be inquired into. Although, certainly, we have not met with any great amount of authority, I do not think that any more could be found; and we have really heard the case argued upon the law as laid down in the books. I now prefer to give my judgment upon the first ground taken by my Brother Blackburn, and I think it unnecessary to decide upon the question of estoppel, in which I do not feel much confidence. I think that the rule should be discharged.

SHEE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The authority of Lord Coke is quite sufficient for us. The difficulties which have been suggested by Mr. Brett did appear to exist, but ever since the opinion was expressed by Lord Coke, it does not seem to have ever been disputed that one jointtenant could let his part to the other, and that if he did so he would be entitled to distrain.

Nuisance—Canal Company.

A canal company were empowered by an act of parliament to take the water of certain brooks and use it for the purposes of their canal; the water in one of the brooks at the time the act passed was pure, but it afterwards became polluted by drains, &c. before it reached the canal, and it was then penned back in the canal, and became a public nuisance:—Held, that the company were liable to be indicted for the nuisance, as there was nothing in the act compelling them to take the water, or authorizing them to use it so as to create a nuisance.

The King v. Pease (1) distinguished.

SPECIAL CASE.

1. An indictment was found on the 10th of August 1864, at the assizes held at Leeds for the West Riding of Yorkshire, against the Company of Proprietors of the Bradford Navigation and Jeremiah Crowther and Samuel Dixon, for a public nuisance, by collecting, impounding and keeping exposed on the 1st of July 1864, and thence continuously until the 10th of August 1864, in a canal, commonly called the Bradford Canal, at Bradford, large quantities of foul liquid, filth, sewage and polluted water, near dwelling-houses and public streets and common highways, whereby noisome and unwholesome smells and stench arose, and the air thereby was corrupted and infected.

(1) 4 B. & Ad. 80; s.c. 2 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 26.

2. This indictment having been removed by certiorari into the Court of Queen's Bench, came on for trial at the Spring Assizes, at Leeds, in March 1865, before Martin, B., when a verdict for the Crown was, by consent of the parties, returned, subject to the following CASE for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench.

3. The Company of Proprietors of the Bradford Navigation (hereafter called "the company") were incorporated by an act of 11 Geo. 3. passed in the year 1770 (to be found at p. 723 of the Acts for that year), intituled 'An act for making a navigable cut or canal from Bradford to join the Leeds and Liverpool canal at Windhill, in the township of Idle, in the county of York.' By this act it was recited and enacted as follows (p. 723): "Whereas an act was made in the last session of parliament for making and maintaining a navigable cut or canal from Leeds Bridge, in the county of York, to the North Lady's Walk in Liverpool, in the county palatine of Lancaster, and from thence to the river Mersey: and whereas the making a navigable cut or canal from the town of Bradford, through the several townships, parishes or hamlets of Bradford, Bolton and Idle, to join and communicate with the said canal navigation from Leeds to Liverpool, at Windhill aforesaid, for the navigation of boats and other vessels with heavy burthens, will open a short, easy and commodious communication between the said town of Bradford and the said canal navigation, which will be of great advantage to the trade carried on there and at the places adjacent, and will also tend to the improvement of the lands near the same, the relief of the poor and preservation of the public roads, and moreover be of great public utility: and whereas the persons hereinafter mentioned are desirous, at their own proper costs and charges, to begin, carry on and complete the said proposed navigable cut or canal. Wherefore, for obtaining and perfecting the good ends and purposes aforesaid, be it enacted by, &c., that Mary Hodgson and (several other persons named in the act), together with such person or persons as they or the major part of them at any public meeting shall nominate and appoint under their hands and seals, shall be united into a company for the better carrying on, making, completing and maintaining the said navigable cut or canal according to the rules, orders and directions hereinafter expressed and laid down, and shall for that purpose be one body politic and corporate by the name of the Company of Proprietors of the Bradford Navigation, and by that name shall have perpetual succession and a common seal, and by that name shall sue and be sued, and also shall and may have power and authority to purchase lands for the use of the said navigation without incurring any of the penalties or forfeitures of the Statute of Mortmain; and the said company of proprietors shall be and are hereby empowered, as soon as 6,000*l.* shall have been subscribed by themselves, their deputies, agents, officers, workmen, servants and assigns, to make and complete a cut or canal navigable and passable for boats, barges and other vessels, from or near a certain bridge in Bradford aforesaid, called Hoppy Bridge, through the said township of Bradford, and through the said townships of Bolton and Idle, to join to and communicate with the said canal navigation from Leeds to Liverpool, at Windhill aforesaid, in such course and direction as is delineated in the map or plan hereafter mentioned, or within the space of twenty-four yards from the same, and to supply the said cut or canal, while the same shall be making and when made, with water from such springs, soughs, brooks, drains, streams, and watercourses as shall be found in making the said cut or canal, and from such springs, brooks, soughs, streams, drains, and watercourses running into a brook, called Bowling Mill Beck, as shall be found within the distance of 2,000 yards of Hoppy Bridge aforesaid, except such water as may supply any house or houses by pipes, and also to make such reservoirs as shall be found necessary for the purposes of the said cut or canal within the said distance, for the more convenient supplying the said canal with water and for the purposes aforesaid, as also for the making, using, completing, extending and maintaining of such trenches, passages, gutters and watercourses, soughs and drains as shall be proper and necessary to convey water into, out of or under the said cut or canal, according to the tenor or purport of this act, and the said company of proprietors and their agents, servants and workmen are hereby authorized and empowered in, upon and through the lands and grounds of or belonging to all bodies politic, corporate or collegiate whatsoever, to enter, and to bore, dig, cut, trench, &c., and to alter, divert and change the courses of any brooks or watercourses lying within 300 yards of Hoppy Bridge aforesaid, that may in any manner hinder, damage or obstruct the said cut or canal, and to carry, divert and convey such brooks or watercourses through and over the grounds adjoining to or near the course of the said cut or canal, and to make such banks between the same, where necessary, as will be sufficient for a road and towing-path, and to separate such brooks or watercourses from the said cut or canal, and also to make, build, erect and set up in or upon the said intended cut or canal, or upon the lands adjoining or near the same, such and so many bridges, tunnels, aqueducts, sluices, locks, weirs, pens, water-tanks, reservoirs, drains, wharfs, quays, landing-places, loading-places, weigh-beams, cranes and other works and conveniences as and when they the said proprietors shall think requisite and convenient for the purposes of the said navigation, and also to alter, repair, amend, widen or enlarge the said works of or belonging thereto, and also to place, lay, work and manufacture the said materials on the grounds near to the place or places where the said works, or any of them, shall be or are intended to be made, erected, repaired or done, and also to make, maintain, repair and alter any fences or passages over, under or through the said cut or canal, or the tunnels, aqueducts, soughs, trenches, passages, gutters, watercourses and sluices respectively which shall communicate therewith, and also to make, set up and appoint such roads, towing-paths, banks and ways convenient for towing, hauling or drawing of boats, barges or other vessels passing in, through or upon the said cut or canal as they the said proprietors shall think convenient, and to construct, erect and keep in repair any piers, arches and other works in, upon and across any rivers or brooks for the making, using, maintaining and repairing the said cut or canal and towing-paths on the sides thereof, and also to construct, erect, make and do all matters and things which they shall think it convenient and necessary for the making, effecting, preserving, improving, completing and using the said navigation, in pursuance and within the true intent and meaning of this act, they the said proprietors doing as little damage as may be in the execution of the several powers to them hereby granted, and making satisfaction in manner hereinafter mentioned to the owners and proprietors of such lands, tenements or hereditaments, waters, watercourses, brooks or rivers respectively as shall be changed, altered, taken, used, diverted or prejudiced for all damages to be by them sustained in or by the execution of all or any of the powers of this act, and this act shall be sufficient to indemnify the said company of proprietors, and their servants, agents and workmen and all other persons whatsoever, for what they, or any of them, shall do by virtue of the powers hereby granted, subject to such provisions and restrictions as are hereinafter mentioned."

4. Power is then given (p. 742) to the company to make and alter from time to time their by-laws, and impose fines for non-compliance with them. "And be it further enacted (p. 745), that in consideration of the great charges and expenses the said company of proprietors will be at in making, maintaining and supplying with water the said cut or canal, and in making and maintaining all the other works hereby authorized to be made and erected, it shall and may be lawful to and for the said company of proprietors from time to time, and at all times hereafter, to ask, demand, take and recover, to and for their own proper use and behoof, for tonnage and wharfage for all clay, brick, stones, coal, manure, dung, compost, ashes, timber, goods, wares, merchandise and commodities whatsoever which shall be navigated, carried or conveyed upon or through the said cut or canal, such rates and duties as the said company of proprietors shall think fit, not exceeding the sum of 6*d.* for every ton of any kind of clay, brick, stone, coal, lime, dung and manure, and not exceeding 9*d.* for every ton of timber, goods, wares, merchandise or other commodities which shall be navigated, carried or conveyed upon or through the said cut or canal, and so in proportion for a greater or lesser quantity than a ton, which said rates and duties shall be paid to such person or persons, at such place or places near to the said cut or canal, in such manner and under such regulations as the said company of proprietors shall direct or appoint; and in case of denial or neglect of payment of any such rate or duty, or any part thereof, on demand to such person or persons as aforesaid, the said company of proprietors may sue for the same by action of debt or upon the case in any Court of Record, or the person or persons to whom the said tolls ought to have been paid may and he and they is and are hereby empowered to seize and detain any such boat or vessel or goods for or in respect whereof any rates or duties ought to be paid, or any part of such goods, and detain the same until payment thereof, together with the reasonable charges for such seizure and detainer ; and if the same shall not be redeemed in five days after the taking thereof, the same may be appraised and sold, as the law directs, in case of a distress for rent. And be it also further enacted and declared, that the said rates, tolls and duties shall at all times hereafter be exempt from the payment of any taxes, rates, assessments or impositions whatsoever, any law or statute to the contrary notwithstanding, other than such taxes, rates and assessments as the said land shall be used for the purpose of the said navigation would have been subject to if this act had not been made. Provided also, and be it further enacted, that if any goods whatsoever which shall be so navigated, carried or conveyed shall remain upon any wharf or wharfs belonging to the said company of proprietors for above the space of twenty-four hours, then and in such case the company of proprietors shall be entitled to and receive such allowance over and above the tonnage rates hereinbefore limited as shall be agreed upon between the said company of proprietors, or their agent or agents, and the owner or owners of such goods : Provided always, and be it further enacted, that all persons whatsoever shall have free liberty, with boats and other vessels, to use the navigable cut, canal and sluices, to be made by virtue of this act, for the purpose of conveying coal, stone, timber, and other goods, wares, merchandises and commodities whatsoever to or from the said cut or canal, trenches or passages, and also to navigate upon the same respectively with any boats or vessels not exceeding fourteen feet in breadth, and to use the said wharfs or quays for loading and unloading coals and other goods, and the said towing-paths for hauling and drawing such boats or vessels, upon payment of such rates and duties as shall be demanded by the said company of proprietors, not exceeding the rates herein mentioned."

5. After the passing of this act, a canal (hereafter called "the canal") was constructed by the company, which was opened for traffic in the year 1774, and has to the present time been used by the public for navigation. It extends from the place called Hoppy Bridge, in the town of Bradford, to Windhill, in the township of Calverly, about three miles, where it joins the Leeds and Liverpool Canal.

6. The head of the canal at Hoppy Bridge forms a basin, into which the supplies of water in the manner hereafter described were brought for the purpose of the navigation. The length of the canal from this basin to the first lock, called Spinkwell Lock, is about three-fourths of a mile, passing through the townships of Bradford and Bolton, down a valley near the course of the Bradford Beck, between Manningham Lane, which runs at a distance of about 600 yards from the canal on the left, and the Eccleshill and Bradford turnpike-road, which runs at a distance of about 500 yards from the canal on the right.

7. At the time when the canal was first constructed, buildings and public streets, forming part of the town of Bradford as it then existed, lay near the basin and head of the canal. The lands and districts along the course of the canal from the basin to Spinkwell Lock, before and at the time mentioned in the indictment, were occupied by a number of suburban residences of families who dwell in and around Manningham Lane aforesaid and the said Eccleshill and Bradford turnpike-road and Otley and Dudley Hill high road ; but when the canal was first constructed, and from that time till about thirty years next before the time mentioned in the indictment, the lands and neighbouring districts so occupied in and near Manningham Lane and the Eccleshill and Bradford turnpike-road and the Otley Hill and Dudley Hill high road, were almost entirely open fields, with very few houses or buildings thereon.

8. During the summer of 1864, and at the time to which the indictment refers, the part of the canal from Hoppy Bridge to Spinkwell Lock aforesaid, was in so foul and polluted a state (caused as hereafter described) that the smell and stench arising from the liquid sewage and polluted water in the canal became a public nuisance to the inhabitants of the above-mentioned streets of the town of Bradford, and of the said districts, buildings and suburban residences, and to the persons passing along the streets and highways aforesaid.

9. The principal and largest stream of water flowing through Bradford, and in the neighbourhood of the course of the canal, is called the Bradford Beck, which at the time of and since the passing of the said act passed away from Thornton Manor on the west of and above the town of Bradford, and ran down through the town, turning to the north at the town of Bradford towards Windhill and Shipley, and entering the River Aire about four miles below Bradford.

10. The brook called Bowling Mill Beck rises on the south side of Bradford, and flowing past Bowling Mill, in the township of Bowling, enters the Bradford Beck about 350 yards above the place called Hoppy Bridge and the floodgates hereinafter mentioned.

11. A brook called Low Beck falls into the Bowling Mill Beck from the west, about 800 yards above the point where the Bowling Mill Beck enters the Bradford Beck.

12. Before and at the time of the passing of the said act, two soughs or drains emptied themselves into the Bowling Mill Beck, below the point where the Low Beck falls into the Bowling Mill Beck as above mentioned. These soughs are artificial drains, one from the Low Moor Colliery and the other from the Bowling Colliery.

13. The brook called Low Beck and the two colliery soughs run, and continue to run, into the Bowling Mill Beck, within the distance of 2,000 yards of Hoppy Bridge.

14. A stream of water called the East Brook, or Tomshawfoot Beck, flowing from the east side of the town of Bradford, enters the Bradford Beck 150 yards above the place called Hoppy Bridge.

15. Another stream of water called Chillow Dean Beck, flowing from the north and west, also enters the Bradford Beck at a point about two miles above where the Bowling Mill Beck flows into the Bradford Beck.

16. Other tributary streams, besides those above mentioned, also flow into the Bradford Beck above the town of Bradford and the points where the Tomshawfoot Beck and the Bowling Mill Beck enter.

17. The supply of water to the canal before and at the time mentioned in the indictment was derived from the Bradford Beck, at a point in its course about fifty yards from the basin of the canal and below the junctions with that beck of the Bowling Mill Beck and the other streams above referred to. The bed of the Bradford Beck at this point is several feet below the level of the bed of the basin of the canal.

18. In constructing the canal in 1773 and 1774, water for the supply of the canal was derived from the Bowling Mill Beck, the same being diverted from that beck by means of a dam across it at Cuckoo Bridge, and carried by means of a drain through a place in Bradford called Hall Ings to Hoppy Bridge, under which the water was carried into the basin of the canal.

19. In constructing the canal the company found it necessary for better supplying the canal with water, and for the further improvement of the navigation, to divert into the canal part of the water flowing in Bradford Beck, by erecting dam stones across the beck at the point above mentioned, at about fifty yards from the basin of the canal, and making a culvert above them out of the same beck into the canal basin as a feeder.

20. After the canal was supplied with water from the Bradford Beck, in manner aforesaid, drains were from time to time made by the owners of corn and paper mills on the Bradford Beck, lower down the stream; and to prevent all disputes with such owners respecting the water taken from them for the purposes of the navigation, the company purchased these mills. In the year 1802 an act of parliament was passed for vesting the mills so purchased and other property in the company, discharged from all claims of the Crown in respect of any forfeiture incurred under or by virtue of the laws of mortmain.

21. In 1796 the company placed a clough in the dam across the Bradford Beck where the water was taken into the canal basin.

22. In the year 1798 the company erected a new weir and floodgates across the Bradford Beck, in lieu of the old weir at the head of the navigation, and have maintained and continued the same there ever since.

23. By means first of the said dam stones and culvert, and afterwards of the said floodgates and culvert, water has been diverted from the Bradford Beck into the basin of the canal for the purpose of supplying the canal with water for the navigation thereof up to the present time.

24. After the making of the said floodgates, but at what period of time is not known, the supply of water to the canal by means of the drain from Bowling Mill Beck, as above described, was discontinued, and since then the supply of water to the head of the canal has been mainly derived from the Bradford Beck by means of the said floodgates and culvert.

25. In the year 1842 an act of parliament was passed, entitled 'An act for better supplying with water, the town and neighbourhood of Bradford, in the West Riding of the county of York,' by which the Bradford Waterworks Company thereby incorporated was invested with certain powers for the purpose of better supplying the town and neighbourhood of Bradford with water.

26. By the 274th section of this act it was enacted as follows: "That nothing herein, or in the schedule to this act annexed contained shall extend or be deemed or construed to extend to authorize or empower the company to alter, direct, change the course of, or make use of the water flowing in a certain brook called Chillow Dean Brook, or any of the springs, watercourses, brooks or streams of water arising or flowing through any other brooks or streams of water towards and unto the Bradford Canal Navigation, or the mills called Frizzinghall Mills belonging thereto, or either of them, so as to prevent the same springs, watercourses, brooks or streams of water respectively, or any of them, from arising and flowing in and supplying the said navigation and mills with water, in as full, ample and beneficial a manner as heretofore accustomed. Provided always, that it shall be lawful for the company to make and maintain a new channel or watercourse for conveying the Chillow Dean Beck along the side of and past a reservoir intended to be made at or near to Hedge Side Farm, as marked and described in the plan deposited with the clerk of the peace."

27. In the year 1850 another act of parliament was passed, called "The Bradford Improvement Act, 1850," by which the mayor, aldermen and burgesses of the borough of Bradford were invested with powers for draining and otherwise improving the said borough.

28. By the 32nd and 33rd sections of the last-mentioned act it was enacted as follows: "That it shall be lawful for the council from time to time, as they may think fit, to cleanse the Bradford Brook, the Bowling Brook and any other brook, rivulet or stream of water within the said borough, and from time to time to drain any stagnant pool of water, and remove all filth within the said borough as the council may think fit, and the said council, their officers and servants, may from time to time enter into and upon any premises in the day-time to do all necessary acts for the purposes aforesaid, so that the same may be executed with all convenient despatch, and without injuring or endangering the foundation or wall of any erections or buildings already built and erected, or to be lawfully built and erected, adjoining to or over any such brook, rivulet or stream: provided always, that nothing in this act contained shall authorize or empower the said council to injure the Bradford Canal Navigation, or to divert any of the streams, brooks or rivulets which supply with water the Bradford Canal Navigation, or the mills called Frizzinghall Mills, belonging to the Company of Proprietors of the Bradford Canal Navigation, or to injure or interfere with any of the locks towing-paths, bridges, banks or any other works of or belonging to the said navigation, without the consent in writing of the said company of proprietors, under their common seal first had and obtained. That it shall be lawful for the council from time to time, as they may think fit, to construct and provide upon any land belonging to or to become vested in the mayor, aldermen and burgesses, by virtue of this act, such cesspools or other receptacles as may be necessary for the purpose of collecting and depositing the sewage water and refuse from the drains and sewers and other places within the limits of this act, and to provide and lay such pipes, pumps and apparatus in such manner and in such places as may be necessary for the collecting and distributing the same for sale or otherwise to any persons who may from time to time agree with the said council to take the same by sale or otherwise."

29. The Bradford Brook and Bowling Brook, mentioned in the last-mentioned act, are the Bradford Beck and the Bowling Mill Beck before mentioned.

30. In the year 1854 the Bradford Waterworks Company were incorporated by another act passed in that year, and in this latter act a clause was introduced to the same tenor and effect as the said 274th section of the act of 1842.

31. At the time when the canal was first supplied with the water from the Bradford Beck, and for many years afterwards, the water of the canal was pure and free from the pollution before described; but within the last thirty or forty years the town of Bradford has been greatly extended and increased in size above the point where the supply of water to the canal from the Bradford Beck as above described has been so obtained, and for many years last past a great number of the drains and sewers of the town of Bradford have run and emptied themselves into the Bradford and Bowling Mill Becks in their course through the town above that point, and large quantities of filth and sewage refuse and other foul and polluted matter have been emptied and discharged into those becks above the same point from the drains, sewers, privies, mills, dye-houses and factories of the town, by reason whereof, for many years before and at the time mentioned in the indictment, the water in the Bradford Beck, before being diverted into the canal in the manner before described, was greatly fouled and polluted, and at all times there were collected into the waters and channels of the Bradford and Bowling Mill Becks above the said floodgates very large quantities of foul and feculent matter, which ran down the channel as in an open sewer, or under the streets and buildings, and thus reached the floodgates, where the water in the foul and polluted state above described was diverted into the basin of the canal in the manner hereinbefore described. It was by reason of the water so diverted into the canal being in such a foul and polluted state that the canal was at the time mentioned in the indictment in so foul and polluted a state that the smell and stench arising from it became a public nuisance.

32. The residue of the water in the Bradford Beck not diverted into the basin of the canal as aforesaid flows down the course of that beck below the floodgates in the foul and polluted state in which it reaches the floodgates, the course of the beck below the floodgates being near to the course of the canal; and running like the canal itself between Manningham Lane aforesaid on the left, and the said Eccleshall and Bradford turnpike road and Dudley Hill high road on the right.

33. The fall in the course of the Bradford Beck from the floodgates for a distance equal to the length of the upper level of the canal between the basin and the first lock is such as would enable the contents of the beck, if not diverted into the canal as before described, to run off through that distance in a much less time than it takes the contents, diverted as aforesaid, to pass down the same distance of the channel of the canal; the effect is that a large quantity of the foul and feculent matter above described flows into the basin and channel of the canal, and is there deposited, and forms a thick bed at the sides and bottom of them, and is from time to time stirred up by the passage of the vessels navigating the canal.

34. More than thirty drains flow directly into the Bradford Canal, between the basin at Hoppy Bridge and Spinkwell Lock, which discharge hot water, and the refuse from cottage dwellings, vitriol works, grease works, dye works, stables, and privies into the channel of and liquid contained in the canal.

35. No reservoirs for the purposes of the said cut or canal have, under the powers of the said act of 1770, ever been constructed by the company for the more convenient supplying the canal with water.

36. The area drained by the brooks, soughs, and tributaries running into the Bowling Mill Beck within the distance of 2,000 yards of Hoppy Bridge, is about 1,330 statute acres, and the area drained by the Tomshawfoot Beck and its tributaries, within the same distance of Hoppy Bridge, is about 1,100 statute acres.

37. Before and at the time mentioned in the indictment the defendants Jeremiah Crowther and Samuel Dixon were the lessees under the company of the canal and works thereto belonging, under an indenture of demise dated the 30th of July 1864.

39. Under the circumstances and facts of the above case the promoters of the prosecution of the indictment against the defendants above named contend that the defendants are criminally liable for causing or continuing a public nuisance.

The question for the opinion of the Court is, whether, under the circumstances and facts above stated, the defendants are criminally liable for such nuisance. If the Court shall be of opinion that they are, the verdict returned for the Crown is to stand; but if the Court shall be of opinion that they are not, a verdict of not guilty is to be entered for the defendants.

Mellish (Field and Maule with him), for the prosecution.—There is no power in the act of Geo. 3. to take the water of the Bradford Beck; but the company have enjoyed the use for sixty years. Assuming, however, that there is an authority, at most it is only permissive; and there is no duty imposed or power given to do the very thing which is the nuisance; and this distinguishes the case from that of The King v. Pease (1). The company are just in the position of a private individual, who, being himself a riparian proprietor, obtains the leave of others to divert the stream and make a reservoir to supply his mill, and then some one wilfully or wrongfully fouls the stream; surely the owner of the reservoir would be liable if it became a nuisance by reason of the foulness of the water. The King v. Pedley (2) is an authority that the company, as the owners, would be liable, as well as the lessees, as occupiers.

[BLACKBURN, J.—The use of the canal need not necessarily involve a nuisance, though it be a probable consequence; and Rich v. Basterfield (3) is therefore an authority against the liability of the company.]

If the owner of property let it in such a state as to be a nuisance, he is liable as well as the occupier—Todd v. Flight (4).

Manisty (Kemplay with him), for the defendants.—The defendants have a right to the water of the beck.

[BLACKBURN, J.—That may be, but they are not obliged to take it; if the act obliged them to take it, there might be something in the argument. CROMPTON, J.—In The King v. Pease (1) the legislature contemplated the very act which was itself a nuisance.]

The later acts of parliament set out in the case expressly recognize the right of the canal company to use the waters of the different becks in their present state. They simply continue to do what they have done for sixty years, and leave matters as they were; and it is the persons who foul the water and so actively create the nuisance who are liable to be indicted for the nuisance. At all events, the company are not liable.

Mellish having intimated that he should be content with a verdict against the two lessees, this point was not further argued, and he was not heard in reply.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that our judgment must be for the prosecution. The existence of the nuisance caused by the state of the water, as accumulated in the defendant's canal, is admitted; and the question is, whether the lessees, who are undoubtedly entitled either under the act or otherwise to take water and apply it to the purposes of their canal, are criminally liable for taking and accumulating in their canal water made foul (and so becoming a nuisance) not by their own act, but by the act of others from whom they receive it already polluted. It was not contested by Mr. Manisty, that if the water was taken by private individuals and used as in the present case, they would be responsible criminally and civilly for a nuisance so caused; but he says the present defendants are not liable because they take it by virtue of an act of parliament. Now, conceding that the company, or their lessees, do take this water by virtue of the powers of the act of parliament, that seems to me to afford no answer to the present indictment. The case does not come within the ruling in The King v. Pease (1); there the nuisance, which formed the subject of the indictment, was the very thing contemplated by the legislature in conferring the powers on the company; and, therefore, although what happened amounted to a nuisance, and would have been actionable or indictable without those powers, yet, inasmuch as the legislature authorized it, the criminal or unlawful character of the act was taken away. But that is very distinguishable from the present case. On the facts here, it must be taken that the thing actually done was never in the contemplation of the legislature. All parties, no doubt, contemplated that it should be lawful for the company, or their lessees, to take the water of certain becks and accumulate it in their reservoirs or locks for the purposes of their canal; but it was contemplated that the water should be taken in its then comparative state of purity. And I am clearly of opinion that when statutory powers are conferred, under circumstances in which the powers may be exercised without in themselves causing any nuisance, and new and unforeseen circumstances render the exercise of the powers impossible without a breach of the law, those powers cannot be exercised without rendering the parties liable. Here, the exercise of the powers previously conferred became a nuisance owing to the altered state of circumstances. Water no longer pure, but fouled by the previous discharge into it of filthy matter, is taken and used by the defendants in a condition in which they cannot use it without creating a nuisance. It seems to follow, as a necessary consequence, that they cannot legally use it at all. The case is very different when certain duties are to be performed under legislative enactment and the performance involves a nuisance; it may be that the persons on whom the duties are imposed would not be liable for the consequences; but that is not the case here. The powers granted are for the benefit of the public, no doubt; but the duty or authority is to do an act in itself lawful, and it can only be co-extensive with the ability to exercise it without infringing the general law. Mr. Manisty put the case as if the defendants would be indictable if they did not take the water; but they cannot, because they have power to take the water, be therefore bound to take it at all times, without regard to their own interests and the interests of the public, when it cannot be taken without creating a nuisance and committing a legal offence. The defendants are authorized to do certain acts consistent with the general law, and these powers can only be exercised within the limits prescribed by that general law.

CROMPTON, J.—I am of the same opinion. The indictment charges the defendants with a public nuisance, by collecting and keeping exposed in their canal foul and polluted water. It is quite clear that the lessees did take the water of the becks, did collect it and bring it into a particular part of their canal, and that a collection of filth was left in the place, so as to be more stagnant than it would have been if left in the beck, and so as to make an undoubted nuisance. They are clearly liable, unless they were authorized by some statute to commit the nuisance. But it is equally clear that no such power can be shewn. We must take it that the lessees would be protected if the company themselves would have been. But the principle is the same whether a power only be conferred or a duty imposed; we must look to see what the intention of the legislature was. Here the authority is to take water; but that does not involve of necessity bringing feculent matter and allowing it to accumulate in their canal so as to be a nuisance. The judgment in The King v. Pease (1) proceeded on the ground that the very act of nuisance was authorized by the legislature. In the course of the argument (5) the case of The King v. Sir J. Morris (6) was cited, in which a local act enabled proprietors of lands, &c. to make railways through such lands and across and along any roads to communicate with another railway; and Parke, J. observed, that supposing this clause to be taken alone, it must at least be understood with the limitation, that when a railway was laid upon another road, sufficient space must be left, independently of it, for the public to pass. And then in the principal case (5) after referring to the clauses of the special act, Parke, J., delivering the judgment of the Court, says, "The legislature must be presumed to have known that the railway would be adjacent for a mile to the public highways, and consequently that travellers upon the highway would be in all probability incommoded by the passage of locomotive engines along the railroad. That being presumed, there is nothing unreasonable or inconsistent in supposing that the legislature intended that the part of the public which should use the highway should sustain some inconvenience for the sake of the greater good to be obtained by the rest of the public by the use of the railroad." But in the present case it is admitted that the legislature never intended or contemplated anything of the kind which has happened; but a new state of facts has arisen since. The legislature may have authorized the taking of water, but did not intend to legitimate a nuisance arising from taking the water in a state in which it was not at the time the act of parliament was passed. Suppose a company had power given them to erect necessities, no one could say that that power alone would extend to enable them to create a nuisance by the erection. So, here, there is a power to make a reservoir, but none to accumulate filth, which was not a necessary consequence; indeed the filth may be got rid of; and it is not found that it was necessary for the purpose of the navigation to take the water of this particular beck.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is admitted that there is no precise authority in point, but we must have recourse to general principles. Now, it is very clear that those who maintain their property so as to be a public nuisance are indictable; and, so far as the occupiers are concerned, they have maintained and kept their canal in such a state as to be a public nuisance. The question is, whether anything is shewn which prevents their being indictable for so maintaining it. Assume the defendants had power to take the water from Bradford Beck, which in itself was pure, but had been made very foul by the accumulation of filth poured into it by others, and that the defendants took it in this filthy condition,—what answer is that to an indictment for the nuisance? If the act of parliament enjoined or compelled them to take the water of the beck, and others had converted it into a sewer, possibly the case of The King v. Pease (1) would be an authority in the defendants' favour; but the fact is, that assuming the defendants to take the water under the provisions of the legislature, these enactments at most are only permissive; the defendants may use the water in a pure state or leave it alone; but there is nothing to authorize them to take the water with the filth in it so as to create a nuisance. It may be very inconvenient if from the want of pure water the defendants' supply runs short; but that can afford no justification for their creating a nuisance; and the principle of the common law must apply, unless an express statutory authorization be shewn, that parties keeping their premises so as to be a nuisance are liable to be indicted for it.

SHEE, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is admitted that the canal in its present state is a nuisance; and the question is, whether there is anything in the acts of parliament which exempts the lessees, or those under whom they act, and renders them irresponsible for the consequences of having created a nuisance. Assuming the act authorizes them to take the water of Bradford Beck, when the act passed the water was sufficiently pure not to be a nuisance; so that the authority to take it in its then state does not authorize their using it in its present state. The case of The King v. Pease (1) is clearly distinguishable; there the act authorized the nuisance, viz. the use of locomotive steam-engines in the way and place they were used. But if a mode of using locomotives had been afterwards discovered creating a greater nuisance than the mode used when the act passed, the act would not have authorized or extended to make legal this new mode of use.

1865. } HERNULEWICZ AND OTHERS
June 2. } v. JAY.

Debtor and Creditor—Bankruptcy Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 134), s. 192.—Deed of Inspectorship—Inequality.

A deed of inspectorship, purporting to be made under section 192. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, contained the following clause: "Provided always, that in case any dividend shall be declared before all the creditors shall have executed or assented to these presents, or before the amount of dividends payable on all their respective debts shall have been ascertained, the said inspectors shall retain sufficient sums for the purpose of paying a like rateable dividend to any creditor or creditors who shall not have assented to or executed the same, or the amount of dividend payable on whose debts shall not have been ascertained, and shall afterwards pay or cause to be paid such dividend to such creditor or creditors, upon his or their request in writing," &c. By the deed the dividends were made payable unconditionally, and no necessity was imposed upon assenting creditors of making a demand in writing for the payment of their dividends:—Held, that no such inequality was created by the above clause between the two classes of creditors, as would make the deed invalid.

Declaration on a bill of exchange drawn by the plaintiffs and accepted by the defendant.

Plea—That after the acceptance by the defendant of the bill of exchange, and after the coming into operation of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, the defendant being a contractor, and unable to pay and discharge his debts and liabilities, on the 14th of November 1864 entered into a deed of inspectorship made between himself of the first part, W. Lee and M. Marshall (the inspectors) of the second part, and the several persons, companies and co-partnership firms, who were creditors of the defendant, or who would be entitled to prove under an adjudication of bankruptcy filed on the day of the date thereof, thereafter called the creditors, of the third part. The plea then set out the deed at length, which, after reciting that the defendant was unable to pay his debts in full, and that he had proposed to his creditors to provide for a gradual liquidation of their debts by the carrying on of his business, with a view of winding up the same, and the collection and realization of his personal estate and effects (the defendant's estate consisting only of a large railway contract which he had in hand, and of certain household furniture, which latter, subject to certain limitations, he was to be allowed to retain), under the inspection of the parties thereto of the second part—Witnessed that, in pursuance of the said agreement, and in consideration of the covenants and stipulations thereafter contained, by and on the part of the debtor to be observed and performed, the said creditors did respectively give and grant unto the said debtor free, full and absolute liberty and licence thenceforth to collect, get in and realize, and dispose of all his estate under the inspection and subject to the approbation, direction and control of the said inspectors, &c. Then followed covenants between the parties relative to the mode of carrying out the said arrangement, and the deed proceeded: "And it is hereby agreed and declared that all monies which shall arise or be produced from the said estate in the course of the collection and realization hereby contemplated, shall, after payment thereof of all costs of and incidental to such collection and realization, be applied by or under the direction of the said inspectors or inspector in the first place in payment of the costs of and incidental to the investigation of the affairs of the said debtor with a view to this arrangement, and the preparation, executing, stamping and registration of these presents, and procuring the signatures and assents of the said creditors thereto; and in the second place in payment of the costs, charges and expenses of and incidental to the carrying out of the powers and provisions of these presents, including the payment of such salary or remuneration as aforesaid; and in the third place in and towards payment rateably and without preference or priority of the debts due from the said debtor to the said creditors respectively, until the said creditors shall respectively have received the amount of their said respective debts, and if there shall be any surplus of the said monies after making the several payments, the same shall belong to the said debtor, his heirs, administrators and assigns. And further, that they or he shall from time to time, when and as often as the monies in hand shall in their or his opinion be sufficient, after allowing for current expenses, to pay a rateable dividend to the said creditors, declare and pay such dividend accordingly. Provided always, and it is hereby agreed and declared, that in case any dividend or dividends as aforesaid shall be declared before all the said creditors shall have executed or assented to these presents, or before the amount of dividend payable on all their respective debts shall have been ascertained, the said inspectors or inspector shall retain, or direct the retention of, a sufficient sum or sums for the purpose of paying a like rateable dividend to any creditor or creditors who shall not have executed or assented to the same, or the amount of dividend payable on whose debt shall not have been ascertained, and shall afterwards pay or cause to be paid such dividend to such creditor or creditors upon his or their request in writing, or on the amount of dividend payable on his or their debt being ascertained, or in case no such retention shall have been made by, or by the direction of, the said inspectors or inspector, they or he shall out of the monies from time to time in hand (after allowing for current expenses) pay or direct the payment to such creditors or creditor upon such request, or on the amount of dividend payable on his or their debt being ascertained, a rateable dividend on the amount of his or their debt or debts, before any further dividend shall be paid to the general body of creditors, but not so as to disturb any dividend or dividends which may have been previously paid to the general body of creditors. Provided always, and it is hereby agreed, that if any of the said creditors shall at any time hereafter while these presents are in force commence or prosecute any action, suit or other proceeding against the said debtor in respect of their respective debts, claims or demands, these presents and the provisions herein contained shall operate and have the same force and effect as an order of discharge granted to the debtor under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861; and this declaration and agreement may be pleaded as a defence to every such action, suit or proceeding in like manner and with the same effect as an order of discharge under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861," &c.

(The deed then provided for the release of the defendant from the debts and demands of his creditors, upon the inspectors certifying in writing that the estate had been collected and the funds distributed.)

Averment of performance of all things necessary to give the deed validity under section 192. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. That at the time of the execution of the deed the plaintiffs were creditors of the defendant within the meaning of the said act, and that the causes of action in the declaration mentioned were debts and demands upon the amount of which the said composition would become payable under the deed.

Replication—That the plaintiffs never executed or assented to the said deed, and that the inspectors had not by writing under their hands certified that all the said estate had been collected and recovered, and the proceeds distributed.

There was a demurrer to the plea, and the replication was demurred to by the defendant. Joinders in demurrers.

Joseph Browne, for the plaintiffs.—This deed is unequal as between assenting and non-assenting creditors, and therefore void under section 192. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. The first objectionable clause is that whereby it is "agreed and declared that in case any dividend or dividends as aforesaid shall be declared before all the said creditors shall have executed or assented to these presents, or before the amount of dividend payable on all their respective debts shall have been ascertained, the inspector or inspectors shall retain, or direct the retention of, a sufficient sum or sums for the purpose of paying a like rateable dividend to any creditor or creditors who shall not have executed or assented to the same, or the amount of dividend payable on whose debt shall not have been ascertained, and shall afterwards pay, or cause to be paid, such dividend to such creditor or creditors, upon his or their request in writing, or on the amount of dividend payable on his or their debt being ascertained," &c. This provision as to the request in writing makes the deed unequal, inasmuch as non-assenting creditors will be compelled to make a request for payment of their claims, while the other creditors who have assented to the deed will be paid the amount without any such request being made. The manifest intention was to compel those creditors who had not assented to the deed to do an act which might be insisted upon afterwards as equivalent to an assent, and thus to prevent the arrangement becoming inoperative by reason of the deed not having been executed by a sufficient number of the creditors, as provided for by section 192. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. Armstrong v. Baker (1) shows that such restraint and compulsion ought not to be imposed upon creditors. If creditors act under a composition-deed, they are as much bound by it as if they had executed it — see Forsyth on Composition Deeds, p. 36. (Other objections were urged against the deed; but as the Court were of opinion that they were governed by the decision of Strick v. De Mattos (2), it is unnecessary to report them.)

Lusk (Hannen with him), contra.—The clause requiring the inspectors to pay the dividend to non-assenting creditors, upon their request in writing, does not create such an inequality as will make the deed invalid. The same objection might have been made in Wells v. Hacon (3), for in that case there was one creditor upon whom there was no obligation to make any demand in writing, while such an obligation was imposed upon the general body of creditors. The objection that the demand in writing is intended to be equivalent to an execution of the deed is of no weight, inasmuch as the inspectors cannot have any power to enter upon the division of the profits of the business until the deed has become operative by reason of the assent of a sufficient number of creditors.

[BLACKBURN, J. — The distinction between the two bodies of creditors in respect of one being bound to make a demand in writing, and the other not being so bound, is a very trifling one.]

Just so; and it can never have been intended that a deed should become inoperative by reason of such a trifling matter. Further, the clear meaning of the deed is, that all the creditors should receive their dividends, but that the non-assenting creditors should make a demand in writing, simply because, if they did not do so, the inspectors would not be cognizant of their claims.

J. Browne replied.

COCKBURN, C.J. — The whole of the questions arising in this case, with one exception, are involved in the case of Strick v. De Mattos (2), now pending in error; and with respect to those further consideration is at present unnecessary. But a point has been raised by the plaintiffs' counsel, upon that part of the deed which relates to the retention by the trustees of a sum of money, upon the declaration of a dividend, for the purpose of meeting the demands of non-assenting creditors, and those the amount of whose claims shall be then unascertained, and which creditors are to receive their dividend only upon demand in writing. It is argued that the effect of this provision is to place non-assenting creditors in a position of inequality with those assenting, and that its object is, in fact, to compel non-assenting creditors to do that which virtually would amount to an assent to the deed. I was, I confess, at first somewhat struck with the ingenious manner in which this argument was pressed upon us; but upon consideration I cannot assent to it. The Courts have now put upon section 192. this construction, namely, that although upon the assent of a certain proportion in number and value of the creditors, the deed shall be binding alike upon assenting and non-assenting creditors, yet that the latter are to be bound only by such conditions as are reasonable. Now, here, all that is required by the deed of a non-assenting creditor is this, that before receiving his dividend he shall send in a request in writing for its payment; and the question is, whether this is or is not an unreasonable condition. If I thought the object of the condition was, as contended for, to compel the assent of an unwilling creditor, I should agree with the plaintiffs' counsel that it would be unreasonable; but I cannot recognize this as the purpose of the deed. I think that, upon a full examination of this deed, the intention is apparent that the estate should be worked in conformity with the provisions of section 192; and so far from thinking that it contains anything which can prejudicially affect a non-assenting creditor, I am directly of the contrary opinion. The inspector, upon funds derived from the estate coming to his hands, is not to dispose of those funds without reference to the claims of non-assenting creditors; on the contrary, the duty is imposed upon him of retaining in hand an amount sufficient to cover their demands, as also the demands of those creditors the amount of whose debts have not been ascertained. The object of calling upon creditors of this class to demand payment in writing, as it seems to me, was to enable the inspector to judge whether their claims were such as should be entertained, and to ascertain the amounts payable. I do not, therefore, regard this clause as an attempt to enforce the assent of an unwilling creditor, but simply as designed to enable the inspectors the more efficiently to discharge their duty. Its effect is, undoubtedly, to impose upon non-assenting creditors the performance of something which is not required of others; but I think that we must, nevertheless, have regard to the substantial effect of this requirement; and if we think the difference it creates between the two classes of creditors is so trifling as to be immaterial, we should treat it as practically amounting to no difference at all. To hold otherwise would render the task of framing a valid deed under the act almost an impossibility; and in conformity with the maxim de minimis non curat lex, I am of opinion that the defendant is entitled to our judgment.

Judgment for the defendant.

1865. } WYATT v. THE GREAT WESTERN June 6. } RAILWAY COMPANY.

Railway—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 20.) s. 47.—Level Crossing over Turnpike-Road.

The effect of section 47. of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845,—which enacts, that if a railway crosses any turnpike or public carriage-road on a level, the company shall erect and maintain sufficient gates across the road on each side of the railway, and shall employ proper persons to open and shut the gates, which shall be kept constantly closed across the road, except during the time when horses, carriages, &c., passing along it, have to cross the railway, and the person having the care of the gates shall, under the penalty of 40s., cause them to be closed as soon as the horses, &c. have passed through,—is to make the road a highway only when the gates are opened by one of the company's servants; and if, there being no servant there, after waiting a reasonable time, a passenger open the gates, and attempt to pass through with his horse and carriage, and damage ensue to him from the gates swinging to, he is committing an illegal act, and the company are not liable for the damage — (So held by Cockburn, C.J., Crompton, J. and Shee, J.; Blackburn, J. dissenting.)

Declaration—That before the passing and coming into force of the 27 Vict. c. cxliii, intitled 'An Act for the Amalgamation of the West Midland Railway Company with the Great Western Railway Company, and for other purposes,' and after the passing and coming into force of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, a certain other act of parliament, called 'The Oxford, Worcester and Wolverhampton Railway Act, 1845,' was passed and came into force, and with which said act the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, was incorporated, and by which said Oxford, Worcester and Wolverhampton Railway Act a certain railway and works therein mentioned were authorized to be constructed and made and maintained by the Oxford, Worcester and Wolverhampton Railway Company therein mentioned, and which railway and works were accordingly constructed; and afterwards by another act of parliament, passed before the first-mentioned act, the railway and works became and were vested in and belonged to a company called "The West Midland Railway Company;" and afterwards, and after the passing and coming into force of the said first-mentioned act of parliament, and before and at the times of the neglect of duty and negligence by the defendants hereinbefore mentioned, the railway became and was vested in the defendants, under the provisions of the first-mentioned act, and was in the possession of the defendants; and the railway was then worked and used by the defendants; and which railway crossed and crosses on a level a certain turnpike-road leading from the Cross Hands, on the Worcester and Oxford turnpike-road, to Holford Bridge and other roads in the counties of Gloucester, Warwick and Worcester, and passing through Chipping Campden, in the county of Gloucester, to Ebrington in the same county; and under and in pursuance of the provisions of the said Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, in that behalf, certain gates had, before the time aforesaid, been and were erected, and at the times aforesaid were maintained by the defendants according to the provisions of the said Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, across the said turnpike-road on each side of the said railway where the same communicated with the said road, and which gates were of such dimensions, and were so constructed, as when closed to fence in the railway from the turnpike-road, and wholly to prevent horses and carriages travelling upon and along the turnpike-road from passing upon the turnpike-road across the railway, and which gates were also so constructed and hung that the same when open would shut themselves across the turnpike-road by their own weight, and which gates the defendants, according to the provisions of the acts of parliament hereinbefore mentioned, kept constantly closed across the turnpike-road, except during the time when horses, cattle, carts or carriages passing along the turnpike-road had to cross the railway. Yet the defendants, not regarding the provisions of the acts of parliament hereinbefore mentioned, nor their duty in that behalf, did not nor would, whilst the gates were so maintained by them as aforesaid, employ, have or keep any proper person or persons to open or shut the gates for the passage there-through of horses, cattle, carts and carriages passing along the turnpike-road across the railway on the level, and to watch and superintend the level crossing, according to the provisions of the before-mentioned acts of parliament, and their duty in that behalf. And the defendants negligently and improperly, during the time aforesaid, left the gates wholly without any proper person or persons whatever to open and shut the same for the passage there-through of horses, cattle, carts and carriages passing along the turnpike-road across the level of the railway; and also negligently and improperly left the level crossing without any person or persons whatsoever to watch and superintend the same. That during the time aforesaid, whilst there was no person or persons as aforesaid to open and shut the gates, or to watch and superintend the level crossing, the plaintiff was travelling along the turnpike-road, in a carriage drawn by a horse, upon a journey from Chipping Campden to Ebrington, and the plaintiff necessarily had occasion to cross and was desirous of crossing the railway at the level crossing with the horse and carriage through the gates; and by reason of the defendants' neglect of duty and negligence hereinbefore mentioned, the plaintiff was unable so to cross the railway, and to proceed upon his journey, without himself necessarily opening the gates in order to enable the horse and carriage to pass through the same and across the railway at the crossing. That before the plaintiff himself opened the gates as hereinbefore mentioned, he waited for a long and reasonable time in that behalf for some such person or persons, for and on behalf of the defendants, to come to and open the gates in order to allow the plaintiff and the horse and carriage to pass through the gates across the railway, and the plaintiff used all reasonable means in that behalf to call the attention of and to make known to any person or persons having the care or management of the railway there, or the care and superintendence of the gates and level crossing, his the plaintiff's desire, and that he required to pass through the gates with the horse and carriage, and to have the gates opened for that purpose ; but no person or persons whatever appeared or came to open the gates, and there was no person or persons whatever to open the gates for the plaintiff in that behalf ; and by reason whereof the plaintiff, in order to proceed upon his journey, was necessarily forced and obliged to and did open the gates himself and pass through the same over the railway by the level crossing ; and it then being night-time and dark, and the plaintiff having passed through one of the gates with the horse and carriage on to the crossing, and having set open the other of the gates, and was getting into the carriage in order to drive through the last-mentioned gate, when, without default on the plaintiff's part, whilst the plaintiff was passing through the same gate with the horse and carriage, the last-mentioned gate, by its own weight, flew back and shut itself across the turnpike-road, and in so doing the gate struck the horse with great violence, and drove it back, and thereby caused the horse to swerve suddenly round and become unmanageable, whereby the plaintiff was thrown out of the carriage upon the railway, and was thereby greatly hurt, lamed and injured, &c.

Demurrer and joinder.

T. J. Clark (Digby with him), for the defendants, in support of the demurrer.—The declaration is founded on the statutory duty imposed on railway companies by the 47th section of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, (8 Vict. c. 20.) which enacts that, "If the railway cross any turnpike-road or public carriage-road on a level, the company shall erect and at all times maintain good and sufficient gates across such road, on each side of the railway where the same shall communicate therewith, and shall employ proper persons to open and shut such gates ; and such gates shall be kept constantly closed across such road on both sides of the railway, except during the time when horses, cattle, carts, or carriages passing along the same shall have to cross such railway ; and such gates shall be of such dimensions and so constructed as when closed to fence in the railway, and prevent cattle or horses passing along the road from entering upon the railway ; and the person intrusted with the care of such gates shall cause the same to be closed as soon as such horses, cattle, carts, or carriages shall have passed through the same, under a penalty of 40s. for every default therein : Provided always, that it shall be lawful for the Board of Trade, in any case in which they are satisfied that it will be more conducive to the public safety that the gates on any level crossing over any such road should be kept closed across the railway, to order that such gates shall be kept so closed, instead of across the road, and in such case such gates shall be kept constantly closed across the railway, except when engines or carriages passing along the railway shall have occasion to cross such road, in the same manner and under the like penalty as above directed with respect to the gates being kept closed across the road." Conceding that there is a breach of duty shewn on the part of the defendants, the damage alleged is not the natural result of that breach. The object of the enactment is to prohibit or render the use of the road by the public, if crossed by a railway on a level, illegal, except when the gates are opened by the company's servants ; and this is clear from the course of legislation on the subject. Former railway acts had enacted that the gates should be kept closed across the railway ; but the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 55. s. 9. recites this, and that experience had proved that it was much safer to have them kept closed across the highway, and enacts for the future that they shall be kept closed across the road, in similar terms to the present enactment. The company's servants alone therefore have the duty and right to open these gates ; and, whatever other remedy the plaintiff had, he had no right to open the gates himself : and if he does so, and injury ensues, although he be guilty of no negligence, the consequences must fall on himself.

[BLACKBURN, J.—The plaintiff is a traveller lawfully using the highway, and the defendants are allowed to obstruct this highway, subject to the conditional duty of always keeping a person to remove this obstruction at times when any of the public want to pass; is the plaintiff, by the neglect of this duty on the defendants' part, to be shut out from using the highway? Would not an action lie?]

Very possibly. But it is clear that the intention of the legislature was that, in so dangerous a place as a level crossing, no one, except railway officials, should interfere.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—If a stranger has a right to cross the railway when the assistance of the railway company's servants is not at hand, he might be crossing the line at a time when a train is coming, and the result might become a catastrophe to the train and passengers, for the consequences of which it might be sought to make the railway company liable. SHEE, J.—May not the attendant be absent without any default at a time when it would not be safe to open the gates? CROMPTON, J.—The declaration does not allege that at the time the plaintiff wanted to cross it would have been safe to open the gates.]

That is the defendants' second point.

[BLACKBURN, J.—Suppose a trench dug partly across a road, and the plaintiff using due care, his horse, nevertheless, falls into the trench, the person digging the trench would be liable?]

No doubt; but that is not this case: the obstruction here is legalized by the legislature. The case of the trench is Clayards v. Delhick (1).

[BLACKBURN, J.—I do not quite see the distinction between the trench being illegal and the gates being illegal; they are only made legal conditionally on the company keeping some one always to open them. In Thompson v. the North-Eastern Railway Company (2) it was held a question for the jury whether a man of ordinary prudence would have gone out of the Shields Dock knowing the state it was in; and if yes, it was held that the owners of the dock were liable for the damages. CROMPTON, J.—There is another objection to this declaration; the damage is too remote; suppose a fence wrongfully put on the highway, and a passenger takes a hatchet to remove it, and injures himself, that is not the direct consequence of the nuisance.]

Sir G. Honyman, for the plaintiff.—If the defendants are held not liable under the circumstances stated in the declaration, it will involve serious consequences to the public. How long is a person to wait when he finds no one in attendance at the gates? It is averred that the plaintiff waited a reasonable time; but, according to the contention on the other side, there is no limit to the delay. It is expressly alleged that the plaintiff was guilty of no negligence.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—No doubt; but the result shews that he was attempting what a man embarrassed with a horse and carriage could not do.]

By the 8 Vict. c. 20. s. 46. it is only when authorized by the special act that a railway can cross a carriage-road on a level; but where, as in the present case, the special act authorizes such a crossing, then the crossing is legal. The temporary obstruction is lawful conditionally on the defendants keeping a person constantly ready to remove it; but the highway is not less a highway.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—Is that so? Is not the intention rather that the highway shall always be obstructed so as to prevent danger, except when the company's servants themselves think it right to open the gates for the passage of the public? No doubt an action would lie against the company for unreasonable delay; but does not the legislature intend that no one shall cross, except when the gates are opened by the company? BLACKBURN, J.—There is nothing in express terms to say, that on no occasion shall the highway be used, except when there is a person employed by the company there to open the gates.]

No doubt the legislature intended that the company should always have some one in attendance on the gates; but there is nothing in the act of parliament saying, "the public shall not go across if there is no one there." It cannot be that after waiting a reasonable time the passenger notwithstanding the most pressing business must yet go back.

[CROMPTON, J.—Is not that inconvenience better than the danger to himself and the trains, which would follow from allowing a man with a carriage and horse to attempt to open the gates for himself?]

The effect of the statute is only to give the railway company a conditional right to obstruct the highway, and if they neglect their conditional duty of keeping a person ready, then they are in the position of an ordinary person putting an obstruction, as a log, across a highway, and they are liable for the consequences.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—The fallacy of that argument is in supposing this a conditional authority to obstruct the highway. The special act says, it shall be lawful for you to make the railway across the highway so as to obstruct it, and you shall have a gate always across the highway for the safety of the public and the railway, and you shall have a person there so as to allow persons to pass across the railway at safe times. CROMPTON, J.—In the case of the log, if the man rupture himself in attempting to remove it, I doubt if he could recover damages for that injury.]

The case is like that where a company was empowered to obstruct a highway, provided they afforded the public reasonable accommodation in lieu of it, and it was held they were indictable for nuisance if they did not afford this accommodation—The Queen v. Scott (3). So here, the defendants are authorized to obstruct the highway, provided they keep a person ready; and if they do not, then they unlawfully obstruct the highway; and if so, then the plaintiff, after waiting a reasonable time, has a right to proceed and remove the nuisance and open the gates for himself, and if he do this without being guilty of any negligence, the defendants are liable for any damage that ensues as the consequence of their breach of duty, which rendered it necessary for the plaintiff to do as he did.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that the judgment should be for the defendants; and my reason for this opinion is, that on reading the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, I consider that it amounts virtually to a prohibition to the public—to individuals constituting the public—from passing over the railway under the circumstances which are set forth in the present case. The act of parliament authorizes a railway company to make a railway, and so to construct it that it shall pass over a highway on a level; but at the same time the legislature add an enactment by which they authorize, and not only authorize but enjoin, the railway company to make the railway so as to obstruct the public highway. It is not, therefore, like the case of a wrongful obstruction, it is an obstruction created by the act and the injunction of the legislature; and when one comes to look at the 47th section, I think it is plain that what is meant is, Whereas it is expedient for the purposes of public traffic that the railway shall cross the highway, the highway shall be obstructed to this extent, that no one shall be allowed to pass across it, except under circumstances by which the safety of individuals, horses, and cattle, crossing the railway, can be insured. There shall be gates of a certain kind, and these gates, says the legislature, shall be constantly closed. When circumstances require them to be opened, and justify their being opened with due regard to safety, the person employed by the railway company for that purpose shall open them, and so soon as the occasion requiring their being open has ceased, that person shall close them again; and otherwise they shall be kept, according to the express language of the section, constantly closed. I take that to amount virtually to a prohibition to the members of the public to open these gates or pass across the railway, except at a time when these gates are opened by those persons whose duty it is to open them. I go further and say, that the terms of the act of parliament say, they shall be kept so closed that nobody can open them without breaking open the gates; and that, I apprehend, no one is justified in doing. Although it may be true that where there is an obstruction to the highway, any person requiring to use it has a right to remove the obstruction, that appears to me not to apply to obstructions enjoined by act of parliament; therefore it appears to me that the plaintiff was clearly in the wrong in opening these gates, and endeavouring to cross the railway. Of course, I do not mean to say that he would not have his remedy if the statutory duty imposed upon the railway company by act of parliament was not fulfilled, or if there was not a person ready to open the gates upon the plaintiff's requirement, if the time and occasion were a fit one for him to cross the line. It may be that he might be exposed to delay and inconvenience, and that he would have a remedy against them for not discharging the statutory duty. But it is a different thing to say, Whereas these gates are to be kept closed, except when opened by the servants of the company employed for that purpose, if he chooses to open the gates and take upon himself the risk of crossing the railway, he is to be at liberty to bring an action against the company for damage. It seems to me it would be fraught with danger and serious consequences if, where the legislature has thought it right to create for the public safety an obstruction, private individuals are, in spite of the warning which the statutory enactment impresses upon them, to remove that obstruction and go across the railway at their own discretion. It might lead to serious consequences, and at all events I cannot but think, when the legislature directed that such an obstruction as this should be created, that it never could have intended that persons were to open the gates when they required, or that individuals should take upon themselves to incur the risk and danger which it was manifestly the intention of the legislature to prevent them incurring; and to visit the railway company with all the consequences. It seems to me that the damage the plaintiff incurred is too remote a consequence of the breach of duty on the part of the defendants, and for which they cannot be made liable.

CROMPTON, J.—I am of the same opinion. The declaration seems to me to amount in effect to this, that the defendants have a duty thrown upon them to keep people at the gates to open and shut them when carts or carriages come, and at the time in question there was no person there in attendance, and that the plaintiff then, without, as he says, any contributory negligence on his part, took upon himself to perform the duty of opening and shutting the gates, and in so doing he hurt himself. That is the effect of the declaration. Now, it is perhaps a nice point to say whether there is not some kind of negligence on the plaintiff's part, for it is hardly possible to read the declaration without seeing that what the plaintiff did was a dangerous act. I think, short of our saying there was no contributory negligence, a matter which would arise on the plea of not guilty, we may suppose any imaginable state of facts; but I think, short of this, that the damage to the plaintiff is not a consequence, within the rules of law, of the breach of duty. I am quite clear, if the plaintiff incurred any damage, and perhaps, without any damage, for the mere delay, an action would lie against the company for not performing their duty in this respect. But I cannot think that the plaintiff has any right to take upon himself the duty of opening and shutting these gates; and I agree with what has fallen from the Bench, that it would be dangerous if he were to be allowed to do so. And if, according to Sir George Honyman's argument, he might break the gates open when locked, and pass through with a cart or carriage, that would be extremely dangerous, because the great object is to prevent passengers being caught by a train, and the train being caught by a cart or carriage or animals passing on the line. It is this ordinary danger that the section is framed to prevent. And it appears to me that the present is not a damage under the circumstances which really flows from the defendants' acts, but flows from the plaintiff's act. It is a consequence not of the defendants' act, but a consequence of the plaintiff taking upon himself to open the gates. It seems to me there is no negligence alleged as to the construction of the gates. They are to swing back and get into their proper position, according to the act of parliament, when the passenger has passed and the servant is there to close them. It is to be practically a swinging gate, and there is no charge in the declaration against the construction. The plaintiff seems to me to have hurt himself in trying to get across, and I think it is very like some of the cases put in the course of the argument. I agree with the case, that if a man finds a log on the high road, and he trying to drive very near it meets with an accident, and the jury choose to say there is no negligence, or suppose he drives into a trench, and the jury negative there being carelessness,—in all those cases, if no contributory negligence be shewn, the damage arises as the direct consequence of the defendant's act. But suppose the case of a log upon the highway, and a man who has a right to do so, tries to remove it, and in removing it hurts himself; or suppose that in removing the log he brings on a rupture;—or take the case of the gates of a dock, in a large town, where a man takes upon himself, the means of doing so being left, to bring the gates together and damage arises,—is that the consequence of the other's negligence? So, in the present case, it is difficult to say that the damage the plaintiff suffered is in consequence of the proper person not being in attendance, or other negligence of the defendants. It seems to me no such damage could be contemplated at all. The damage contemplated by the act is the train going backwards and forwards, and not that of a man hurting himself in going across. The plaintiff seems to me improperly to have chosen to take this act upon himself; just as if he had fallen down in getting over a high gate, that would not be a legitimate and necessary consequence that would flow from leaving the gates unattended. I cannot help thinking that this damage is too remote, upon the whole; although it is somewhat a nice question, whether it resolves itself into a question of negligence. But, I think, it is sufficient that we must take it on this declaration that the plaintiff hurt himself,—not as a direct consequence of the defendants' negligence for which they were liable, but that he hurt himself in consequence of trying to cross the line by opening the gates himself; and, therefore, I think judgment ought to be for the defendants.

BLACKBURN, J.—In this case, I have come to a different conclusion from my Lord and my Brothers Crompton and Shee; but I do not think the case is one in which we should gain any benefit from taking time to consider. It is not a case upon which light would be thrown by authorities. The whole point on which we differ is on the construction of a few words in the act of parliament. In this case it appears the turnpike-road was a public highway, along which the plaintiff had a right to travel, and was travelling at night. The railway crosses the highway on a level, but still it remains a highway on which the plaintiff and all the Queen's subjects had a right of way to go along, except so far as the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act had enabled the company to put an obstruction upon it. And that brings me to the 47th section of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, which applies to this case. It is there enacted, "If the railway cross any turnpike-road or public carriage-road on a level, the company shall erect and at all times maintain good and sufficient gates across such road, on each side of the railway where the same shall communicate therewith, and shall employ proper persons to open and shut such gates; and such gates shall be kept constantly closed across such road on both sides of the railway, except during the time when horses, cattle, carts, or carriages passing along the same shall have to cross such railway." It seems to me, therefore, that that shews in plain terms that the gates have to be put up, and in plain terms it is said that the railway company shall keep servants there to open and shut such gates and keep them closed, "except during the time when horses, cattle, carts, or carriages passing along the same shall have to cross such railway." If I could come to the conclusion, which my Lord has intimated, in the construction of that act, that the effect was, that if the servants of the company were away and if the gates were closed, though it shall be lawful for persons to go along there, yet persons must wait till the servants of the company come back, however long they may be,—if I thought the act said that, I should say that this plaintiff, who went across the railway, had done an illegal act, and could not recover for this damage. I have looked at the section of the act, and I cannot come to that conclusion. It seems to me that inasmuch as this continues a turnpike-road, and a turnpike-road for all the liege subjects of the Queen, which they have a right to pass along, if the company's servant was not there, the plaintiff might still use it, and open the gates. Of course, I need not say, that in so doing he must take due care that he do not endanger the traffic of the railway, for if he does he would be responsible civilly or criminally. He must take all reasonable precaution as to himself, and if he does not, and if mischief happens, he cannot recover; but I think he does nothing illegal in opening the gates, if he takes reasonable care; and if mischief arises from the consequences of the railway company having neglected their duty which has been cast upon them to open the gate, I do not see why the plaintiff should not recover. It does not seem to me that he has done anything illegal. The case is extremely like that of Clayards v. Dethick, in which Patteson, J. says, after having stated the facts (6), "The defendants had clearly no right to leave a trench open in the passage to this mews, without a proper fence, and having done so to tell the plaintiff, 'You shall keep your horse in the stable till we inform you you may remove him.'" So, on the construction that I put on the act of parliament, I say the railway company have no right to leave the gate shut and let their servants go away and tell the plaintiff, "You must wait all night till our servants come back." Then Patteson, J. goes on to say, "Whether or not the plaintiff contributed to the mischief that happened by want of ordinary caution is a question of degree. If the danger was so great that no sensible man would have incurred it, the verdict must be for the defendants." The question in that case was rightly left to the jury. In the present case no question has been left to the jury, because it has not gone to them; but in my opinion the question would be required to be left to the jury in that way. The question would be, "Did the plaintiff in going through use ordinary caution?" Assuming, according to my view, although the majority of the Court is the other way, assuming he had a right to go across that railway, the question of fact would be, "Did he in doing so use ordinary caution in opening the gate?" If he did so, was it an accident arising from the default of the company in having omitted to perform their clear and statutable duty in not keeping their servant there to look after the opening and shutting of the gates? That again is a question of fact. It may be that the accident was not such a direct consequence of that breach of duty, but arose from the improper conduct of the plaintiff in managing the gates carelessly. It may be that the facts may turn out against the plaintiff by reason of his own negligence. But it is a question of degree more or less, and it appears to me the declaration is good upon demurrer. Although there are questions upon the plea of not guilty to leave to the jury, and it may be that the jury might find for the defendants; yet that has nothing to do with the demurrer, and I think that our judgment ought to be for the plaintiff.

SHEE, J.—I agree with my Lord and my Brother Crompton. It seems to me in construing the act, that we must look to the object that the legislature had in view. And it seems to me their object was to provide against the great danger which might arise, unless proper precautions were taken for a railway crossing any turnpike-road or public carriage-road on a level; and the object of the legislature, as it seems to me, was not merely to protect careful persons but negligent persons; not only to protect the persons crossing the railway from their own negligence, but the negligence of the company's servants as far as that can be provided for; and for that purpose it appears to me to have enacted that the gates shall be constantly closed. It shall be the duty of the company to keep them constantly closed, "except during the time when horses, cattle, carts, or carriages passing along the same shall have to cross such railway." It further provides that the company shall keep proper persons, and employ proper persons to open and shut such gates. That seems to me to be the fair meaning of this provision—they shall keep proper persons to open and shut such gates at such times "when horses, cattle, carts or carriages passing along the same shall have to cross such railway." And for the protection of the public, except when those gates are opened by the servants of the company, it shall be the duty of the company to see that they are constantly closed. It seems to me the legislature thus imposed upon the company the duty of obstructing the public highway; and there was no such duty thrown upon the defendants in the case of Clayards v. Dethick (1), to which my Brother Blackburn has referred. Here they are to keep the gates constantly closed, except when carriages and horses have to cross the railway. When they have to cross such railway it is the duty of the company to have persons employed by them there to open the gates, and if they do not have persons there to open the gates, then they are obstructing the highway at a time when they are not authorized to obstruct the highway, and if any person having a right to cross the highway sustain any particular damage by the obstruction, then the company is liable for the damage. It seems to me on that ground this declaration is bad, and that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover. And I also think that he is not entitled to recover on this ground: the injury he has sustained was not the necessary result of the breach of duty on the part of the company in not keeping persons there to open the gates. It was the result of his own act, his own indiscretion. He chose to do a thing which it is exceedingly difficult to do, to get his horse and carriage through a swing-gate without any assistance. It is true in this declaration we are not at liberty to consider there was any default on his part; but we are at liberty to consider that the injury which happened to him was the result of his own act, something done by him beyond what was done or omitted to be done by the company or the company's servants. It appears to me any damage resulting from that act of his, additional to the omission or neglect of the company and its servants, is too remote to be the consequence of the breach of duty of which the plaintiff complains, and I think, therefore, he is not entitled to recover.

Judgment for the defendants (7).

(7) By the Railways Clauses Act, 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 92. s. 6), it is enacted as to any railway authorized by any special act passed after or incorporating that act (see section 3), "For the greater convenience and security of the public, the company shall erect and permanently maintain a lodge at the point where the railway crosses on the level the turnpike-road or public carriage-road; and the company shall be subject to and abide by all such regulations with regard to the crossing thereof on the level, or with regard Easement—Fences—Liability to Repair—Presumption of Fact from Ancient Inclosure.

The owners and occupiers of an ancient copyhold inclosure, and they alone, had from time to time repaired the fence belonging to the inclosure between it and the common waste land of the manor:—Held, that the proper inference for a jury to draw was that at the time the lord granted the exclusive possession of the land, he granted it subject to the obligation on the part of the grantees to keep it fenced as against the cattle of the lord and the other copyholders turned out on the wastes of the manor, and that the owner or occupier was therefore bound to keep up the fence as against adjoining occupiers after the wastes of the manor were inclosed under a modern Inclosure Act.

SPECIAL CASE.

1. This was an action of replevin removed from the Manor Court of the manor of Wakefield in the county of York, whereupon the plaintiffs complained that the defendants, on the 1st of May 1862, in the parish of Almondbury, in the said county, in a certain close and lands there situate, being part of a farm called Bartin Farm, in the township of Austonley, in the said parish, took the sheep and lambs of the plaintiffs and unjustly detained them against sureties and pledges. The defendants pleaded, first, that they did not take the sheep and lambs; and secondly, the defendant Whiteley avowed, and the defendant Moorhouse acknowledged the taking the sheep and lambs, because Whiteley was lawfully possessed of the said close and land in which, &c.; and because the sheep and lambs were wrongfully in the said close and land, doing damage to the defendant Whiteley, they took the said sheep to the speed at which trains may pass the level crossing, as may from time to time be made by the Board of Trade. If the company fails to erect, or to maintain, such lodge, or to appoint or keep a proper person to watch or superintend the level crossing, or to observe or abide by any such regulation as aforesaid, they shall for every such offence be liable to a penalty not exceeding 20*l.*, and also a penalty of 10*l.* for every day during which the offence continues after the penalty of 20*l.* is incurred."

and lambs in the said close and land as a distress for the said damage.

2. To this avowry and cognizance the plaintiffs pleaded in bar, by first joining issue thereon; secondly, they pleaded that they were before and at the time of taking the sheep and lambs by the defendants, possessed of certain land and a close contiguous to the close and land of defendant Whiteley, and that defendant Whiteley and all other tenants of the said close and land in which the sheep and lambs were taken, had immemorially and of right repaired and ought of right to repair and keep in repair, and that defendant Whiteley still of right ought to repair and keep in repair the hedges and fences between the said close and land of the defendant Whiteley and the said land and close of the plaintiffs, that the cattle respectively therein might not escape into the said contiguous closes and land, and because the said hedges and fences between the said land and closes of the defendant Whiteley and the plaintiffs were ruinous and broken down for want of needful repair and renovation, the sheep and lambs of the plaintiffs, being in plaintiffs' close and land, escaped into the close and land of the defendant Whiteley, in which they were taken as aforesaid, until the defendants took the same and unjustly detained them.

3. The defendants joined issue upon the plea in bar.

4. The cause came on to be tried before Wilde, B., at the Summer Assizes for the county of York, who by consent of both parties heard the evidence without a jury, and thereon a verdict was entered for the defendants subject to the opinion of the Court on the following case.

5. The plaintiffs are the joint occupiers and tenants under the devisees of the late William Leigh Brook, the owner of 400 acres of copyhold land held of the manor of Wakefield, called Good Bent, in the township of Upperthong, in the parish of Almondbury, in the said county, and have been such occupiers and tenants since about the year 1859.

6. The defendant William Whiteley has since about the year 1842, been the occupier and part owner of a farm called Bartin Farm, in the township of Austonley, in the same parish. This farm consists of ancient inclosures, of which nine acres are copyhold of the manor of Wakefield, and two roods freehold. These nine acres of copyhold include the land forming the southern boundary of Bartin Farm, where it abuts on and is contiguous to the northern boundary of the land of Good Bent, a distance of about 400 yards. The line of this boundary is defined by a barrier or fence, partly natural and partly artificial, hereinafter described.

7. The lands of Good Bent were formerly part of certain common and uninclosed waste lands within the graveship of Holme, in the said manor of Wakefield, over which some of the copyholders of the manor had rights of common until the inclosure hereinafter mentioned.

8. An act of parliament was passed in the year 1828, for inclosing the said waste, and a copy of this act was to be referred to, if necessary, as part of this case.

9. The Commissioners appointed to carry out this act had thereby powers granted to them to sell and absolutely dispose of portions of the said waste lands in order to raise money for the expenses of the act.

10. In pursuance of these powers, the Commissioners sold to the before-named William Leigh Brook the said 400 acres of land called Good Bent, and also two other pieces of the said waste lands, one containing twenty acres and the other thirty-two acres, and on the 12th of April 1834 they made their award under the said act.

11. The deed by which the Commissioners conveyed to the said W. L. Brook these three pieces of land, dated the 4th of March 1834, and also their said award dated the 12th of April 1834, and the plan referred to by the said award, were to be considered to form part of and be used for the purposes of this case, so far, and so far only, as they are by him admissible in evidence against the defendants.

12. By the said deed of conveyance to the said W. L. Brook, Good Bent is described as containing by survey 400 acres more or less, and is bounded northward in part by ancient inclosures in Austonley. The ancient inclosures here mentioned are the said ancient inclosures of Bartin Farm.

13. This piece of land called Good Bent and the said two other pieces of land so sold to the said W. L. Brook as aforesaid, are shewn and described in the margin of the said conveyance, and a copy of the plan marked A, so far and so far only as the same is admissible in evidence against the defendants, was to be used for the purposes of this case.

14. By the said conveyance the said two other pieces of land, containing respectively twenty acres and thirty-two acres, were thus conveyed, subject to the condition that the said W. L. Brook, his heirs and assigns, should within six months from the date thereof, make and for ever uphold and repair good and sufficient stone walls of five feet at least in height, in good and sufficient quickset hedges as fences of all sides of these two pieces of land respectively, but no condition or provision as to fencing or walling was imposed by the said conveyance as to the said piece of land called Good Bent.

15. By the said award the said three pieces of land so sold and conveyed to the said W. L. Brook as aforesaid, were allotted to him by the same description as in the said conveyance, and with the same requirements as to fencing with respect to the said two pieces containing respectively twenty acres and thirty-two acres, but without any requirement as to fencing with respect to the said piece of land called Good Bent. The award also contains directions and provisions as to the fencing or walling of the several other allotments made thereunder.

16. A copy of the plan referred to by the said award and marked B, was to be referred to for the purposes of this case as correctly delineating the general position and features of the locality, but for no other purpose save so far as it may be legal evidence against the defendants.

17. The state of things now existing with respect to the boundary line between Bartin Farm and the said piece of land called Good Bent, and which is the same as existed before and at the time of the said act and the inclosure thereunder, is as follows :

18. Bartin Farm lies on the north side of a brook called Marsden Clough, which flows from the west to east. The length of the southern boundary of the farm is about 418 yards, along which there is a barrier or fence, partly natural and partly artificial, forming the whole length of the southern boundary of the farm, and abutting in some places upon the brook. In some parts there are between the brook and the said barrier or fence, strips, portions of moorland, varying in width from ten to twenty yards; but the said barrier or fence and not the brook is and always was the boundary line between Bartin Farm and Good Bent. For about one-fourth of its length, namely, between the western end of it and a fall in the brook, called Lumb Fall, the said barrier or fence is almost entirely an artificial wall built of stone, and now varying in height from three to six feet, but formerly of six feet uniform height, between which stone wall and the brook part of the said strips and portions of moorland lie.

19. The remaining three-fourths of the said barrier and fence is formed by natural shale or rocks, with small pieces of artificial walling built up here and there, in part on the top of the bank of rock, and in other parts in places where the rocks have been excavated.

21. This barrier or fence had the effect of forming an obstruction between the lands of Bartin Farm and the lands of Good Bent, by means of which the cattle and sheep depasturing on the one side of it were stopped from straying out of the lands of that farm into those of the other farm.

22. The owners and occupiers of Bartin Farm had from time to time repaired this barrier and fence prior to the inclosure of Good Bent common lands, and since their inclosure have repaired it down to the month of September 1860, and no one else has ever done so.

23. The cattle and sheep on Good Bent have always, except in flood time, been able and accustomed to cross the stream of the Marsden Clough and depasture the strips and portions of land lying on the north of that stream between it and the said barrier and fence.

24. All the lands south of the said barrier or fence, as well those which lie on the north of the said brook as those that lie on the south thereof, form part of Good Bent, and are and were at the several times in question in this case occupied by the plaintiffs as part thereof.

25. These lands of Good Bent are still partly kept as moorlands and sheep pasture, and at the time mentioned in the pleadings the plaintiffs' sheep, being and pasturing therein, escaped through a portion of the said barrier and fence that had fallen and was out of repair, and got into the ancient inclosures on the north side occupied by the defendant Whiteley.

26. On several occasions about the year 1824, and before the said inclosure, the sheep of one Arthur Turton, being one of the copyholders who turned sheep on Good Bent common lands, crossed the said barrier or fence, and strayed on to Bartin Farm and were there distrained and impounded by the then occupier of Bartin Farm as damage feasant, and on each of those two occasions the said A. Turton made payments in order to release his sheep which had been so distrained. He also put up some thorns on the south side of the brook near to Lumb Fall to prevent his sheep crossing over the brook at that point.

27. On two or three occasions during the two years next before the present cause of action the sheep of the plaintiffs strayed from Good Bent on to Bartin Farm through defects in the said barrier or fence, and on each of these occasions the defendant W. Whiteley caused the same to be distrained and the plaintiffs made payments in order to release their sheep. These last-mentioned payments were made under protest, but the plaintiffs took no steps to dispute these distresses, except that on one occasion they took out a summons against the defendant W. Whiteley for overcharges for trespass and poundage fees. On the 22nd of May 1862 the plaintiffs' sheep and lambs mentioned in the pleadings in this action, whilst depasturing on Good Bent, strayed therefrom on to the lands of Bartin Farm, in consequence of some defects in the said barrier and fence as above mentioned, and were then and there distrained by the defendants as damage feasant, and thereupon the plaintiffs replevied their said sheep and lambs and brought the present action against the defendants to recover damages for the said distress as being illegal.

28. The Court was to be at liberty to draw conclusions of fact; and the question for the Court was, whether upon the above facts the verdict should be entered for the plaintiffs or the defendants.

Manisty (Maule with him), for the plaintiffs.—The defendant Whiteley avows for cattle damage feasant on his land called Bartin Farm, and the plaintiffs plead that he was bound to keep up the fence between this farm and the adjoining land on the side at which the plaintiffs' cattle escaped. Now Bartin Farm is an ancient inclosure adjoining on this side what remained until late years uninclosed land; and the owners and occupiers of Bartin Farm, and they only, have from time to time repaired the fences; therefore, the proper conclusion to draw is, that when the old inclosure was granted out of the wastes, the lord granted it subject to the duty of fencing against cattle turned out on the uninclosed land; the lord would otherwise have been subjecting the commoners to the burden of being obliged to take care that their cattle did not trespass on the inclosed land. Boyle v. Tamlyn (1) (the marginal note of which is not borne out by the judgment) shews that even without the additional circumstances in this case, the mere fact of one owner having always repaired the fence is evidence, though slight, of an obligation to keep it up.

Kemplay, for the defendants.—There can be no doubt that the law is as laid down in Gale on Easements, 412, 3rd edit.: "The only general obligation with respect to fences imposed by the common law is, that every proprietor of land should prevent, by fences or other means, his cattle from trespassing on the land of his neighbours"—Churchill v. Evans (2). So in 3 Dyer, 372 b, case 10; it is said, If the lord of a waste of 200 acres enfeof another of 50 acres, the feoffee must inclose them or keep his cattle from straying into the residue; and so ought the lord of the residue to do for his cattle as it seems. Boyle v. Tamlyn (1) is an authority for the defendants; in that case the repairs had been done by the defendant after notice to do them. Littledale, J., who tried the cause, told the jury (3), "that if they thought that the fact that the occupier of Dead Moor (the defendant's close) having always repaired the gate, and having in two instances repaired it after notice from the plaintiff to repair, amounted to an admission on his part that he was bound to repair the fence for the benefit of the plaintiff, they might presume that there had been an agreement between the plaintiff and defendant that the gate should be kept up by the latter for the benefit of the plaintiff, and that if they were of opinion that there was such an agreement, they should find for the plaintiff." The jury found that the defendant was bound by agreement to repair the gate. Leave having been reserved to enter a nonsuit, the Court refused this, but made the rule absolute for a new trial, intimating that the evidence strongly preponderated in favour of the defendant.

Manisty, in reply.—The notices to repair in Boyle v. Tamlyn (1) amounted to nothing, for they were only notices to the defendant to keep his own cattle in.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that the verdict ought to be entered for the plaintiffs. It is unnecessary to say what would have been the effect of the evidence had it stood simply that the fence had always been repaired by one party; because here there are other circumstances leading to the inference of the obligation to repair being on the part of the owner of Bartin Farm; viz. the fact that originally this farm was land inclosed from the waste of the manor, and that the plaintiffs' land was also part of the waste, but inclosed in modern times under an Inclosure Act. Now the very purpose of inclosing lands by the lord must have been that the land should be used as cultivated land, and since such a use, beneficial to the owner alone, makes it necessary that the land should be protected from grazing animals, it is more likely that the lord would enforce the obligation of keeping up a fence and so preventing a trespass on the person whom he had allowed to inclose than on the other tenants of the manor, who had rights of common, over the waste which they could have exercised before the inclosure without being subject to the risk of having their cattle distrained for trespassing, and who would be, moreover, a varying and fluctuating body. Granting, therefore, that when no obligation to fence is shewn to be upon either of two adjoining landowners, the principle of law is that each must fence or take care that his own cattle do not stray; yet a different inference arises when, as in the present case, there is on the one hand, the fact of land being inclosed from common land for the benefit of a particular person, and on the other a body of commoners entitled to exercise rights on the open land adjoining. Therefore, looking at the fact that beyond the time of memory the fences on Bartin Farm have been repaired by the owner; looking at the circumstances under which the inclosure originated, the fair and reasonable presumption is, that the obligation to repair was coeval with the inclosure, and the duty flowed from the right to the exclusive possession; or, in other words, that the lord imposed as part of the terms on which the exclusive possession was permitted by him, that the owner should take upon himself the obligation to fence as against the cattle of the commoners. Therefore, the right conclusion to draw from the evidence is, that the owner of Bartin Farm was bound to keep up the fences, and therefore there must be judgment for the plaintiffs.

CROMPTON, J.—I am of the same opinion. Boyle v. Tamlyn (1), which is the case generally relied on against the general obligation to repair for the benefit of an adjoining owner, is not to be explained as Mr. Kemplay would explain it, by reference to the notice mentioned in it. The judgment is not put on the notice. Bayley, J., in his judgment, says, "It appeared that applications were made by the plaintiff to the occupier of Dead Moor (the defendant's close) to repair. On the first occasion the tenant was told that if he did not repair and his cattle trespassed on the plaintiff's land, he would impound them. On the other occasion the defendant was merely told that he must repair, but he was not told on either occasion that if he did not, and the plaintiff became damaged in consequence of his cattle trespassing upon the lands of other persons, he, the plaintiff, should look for compensation to the occupier of Dead Moor. The fact, therefore, of the defendant having repaired upon these two occasions did not distinctly shew that he did so by virtue of his being under any legal obligation to the plaintiff so to do. But still it appears to me that there was some (though very slight) evidence to go to the jury, that the defendant was bound to repair; for the fence might be considered a mutual benefit to the plaintiff and the defendant, and if that were so, unless one were bound by law to repair at his own expense, it might fairly be expected that each would contribute to the repairs; but the proof was, that the gate was always repaired at the expense of the occupier of Dead Moor; that fact afforded some evidence, though very slight, that the latter was bound to repair" (4). In the present case there are, in addition to the mere fact of repair, other circumstances from which I think an obligation on the part of the defendants to repair may be inferred. We have to see whether, as a jury, we ought not to infer the obligation, and if we see any evidence tending that way we ought to support the ancient usage. Now, very slight circumstances in addition to the constant repair ought to preponderate. In the present case the defendants' predecessors and the defendants alone ever repaired this fence; that is some evidence in itself; and is perfectly consistent with the way in which the right is supposed, by Mr. Manisty, to have originated. The inclosure must have been very old. When the lord granted a new copyhold tenement it is very unlikely that he would put on the rest of his copyholders the liability of keeping up a fence, or would build one himself. He would have been doing a great injury to the copyholders in general if he made an inclosure, or rather gave exclusive occupation of land to one, without imposing on him the obligation to fence and keep up the fence as against the adjoining open land. I think very little of the fact that the occupier of Bartin Farm distrained the cattle of a copyholder on one occasion; it is not even said that they got on the farm through defect of fences; and then equally little weight is to be given to the payments under protest. On the whole therefore, as a jurymen, I think, as Mr. Manisty suggested, that we ought to find that the owner of Bartin Farm took the land, subject to the obligation to keep up the fences, and the verdict should therefore be entered for the plaintiffs.

SHEE, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is in the highest degree probable that on the inclosure of the Bartin Farm, the person to whom it was granted should have taken it subject to the obligation to repair the fences as against the then adjoining open lands: first, because it was for the interest of the lord and the tenants that the lord should insist on the grantee taking upon him this liability; and, secondly, because it was also for the interest of the grantee of the Bartin Farm that he should keep up the fences to keep his own cattle in and those of the commoners from getting on to his inclosed land. It is therefore highly probable that the new owner would have submitted to take upon himself this liability for his own sake; this probability therefore, coupled with the fact that the owner of Bartin Farm has always repaired, leads to the inference that such an obligation did exist.

Post-dated Cheque—Innocent Holder.

A cheque payable to bearer, and stamped with a penny stamp, was on the 22nd of June drawn by the defendant and given by him to G. It was at that time dated the 22nd of July. On that day G. indorsed it to W, who handed it to the plaintiff, and received in return the plaintiff's cheque for the same amount. The plaintiff took the defendant's cheque without notice or knowledge that it had been post-dated:—Held, in accordance with Williams v. Jarrett (1) and Whistler v. Forster (2), that the cheque appearing to be correctly stamped according to its purport, and having been taken by the plaintiff, without notice that it was post-dated, and innocently, he was entitled to recover upon it against the defendant.

This was an action upon a cheque for 350*l.*, payable to bearer, and dated the 22nd of July 1864.

Plea, traversing the making of the cheque.

At the trial, which took place before Cockburn, C.J., at the Sittings at Westminster after Michaelmas Term, 1864, it appeared that the cheque in question had been given by the defendant with several others to Charles Garrett. At the time it was given it was dated the 22nd of July 1864, and Garrett called the attention of the defendant to the fact that it was post-dated. On the 22nd of July Garrett indorsed it to one Warden, and Warden handed it to the plaintiff in exchange for an open cheque for the same amount, which he said he preferred to a crossed one. The defendant insisted that the plaintiff could not recover, inasmuch as the cheque was post-dated, and was therefore void, and the learned Judge nonsuited the plaintiff, giving him leave to move to set the nonsuit aside and enter a verdict for him instead thereof.

A rule nisi was subsequently obtained, against which Laxton and Wills shewed cause.—The question in this case turns upon the construction to be put upon several acts of parliament, the first of which is the 31 Geo. 3. c. 25. By section 2. of that act certain duties are to be charged upon every piece of vellum or parchment, or sheet or piece of paper, upon which bills of exchange, promissory notes, &c., are ingrossed, written or printed. And by section 4. it is enacted that nothing in the act contained shall extend "to charge any draft or order for the payment of money to the bearers on demand, bearing date on or before the day on which the same shall be issued, and at the place at which the same shall be drawn and issued, and drawn upon any banker or bankers, residing and transacting the business of a banker or bankers, within ten miles of the place where such draft or order shall be actually drawn and issued." But here there is no exemption in favour of a post-dated cheque. By section 19. all vellum, parchment and paper liable to stamp-duty are to be stamped before they are ingrossed, printed, or written upon, and no bills, &c. are to be given in evidence unless they are stamped as required. Therefore, it appears that when a document ought to be stamped, but is not stamped, it is not admissible in evidence. Now, the cheque in question falls within the terms of section 2, and the question is, whether it is also within the exemption clause in section 4. The next statute is the 55 Geo. 3. c. 184, which, by section 8, continues all the powers of the former act, 31 Geo. 3. c. 25. The 13th section of 55 Geo. 3. c. 184. subjects to the payment of a penalty of 100*l.* any person who makes or issues, or causes to be made and issued, "any bill, draft or order for the payment of money to the bearer on demand upon any banker or bankers, or any person or persons acting as a banker or bankers, which shall be dated on any day subsequent to the day on which it shall be issued unless it shall be duly stamped as a bill of exchange, according to the act." Under this section the cheque in question is void, and could not be pleaded or produced in evidence.

[MELLOR, J.—Yes; but even if that section should have the effect of making it void in the hands of the maker, the question still remains whether it is so when the bill is in the hands of an innocent holder. CROMPTON, J.—Can it be said section 13. makes the bill void when it is in the hands of a person who cannot know anything about its being post-dated.]

It is submitted that it is void. Then the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 59, by section 2, continues the duties chargeable under the powers, provisions, clauses, regulations, directions, allowances and exemptions, fines, forfeitures, pains and penalties imposed by former acts, and then, by section 3, imposes upon drafts a stamp of one penny; but the question of exemption from stamp-duty still depends upon the old exemption appearing in section 4. of 31 Geo. 3. c. 25. The next statute is the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 20, which continues the provisions and penalties under former acts, and by section 1. enacts that drafts or orders for the payment of any sum to the bearer on demand, being payable to any banker, &c., shall be chargeable with the stamp-duty of one penny. It is submitted that this cheque was properly objected to, and that it was not admissible in evidence: firstly, because it was not stamped as a bill of exchange, as it ought to have been; and next, because it is void by the 13th section of 55 Geo. 3. c. 184.

[Horace Lloyd, in support of the rule, admitted that the objection was purely one of want of stamp, and was properly taken.]

The question has been before the different Courts several times. In Dunsford v. Curlewis (3) Hill, J. refused to allow a post-dated cheque to be received in evidence. In Oliver v. Mortimer (4) the point was again raised, but not determined. In Key v. Matthias (5) Bramwell, B. admitted such a cheque in evidence. Then these cases were cited in Whistler v. Forster (6), and the decision in that case is not against the proposition now contended for, inasmuch as it was said that the 55 Geo. 3. c. 184. s. 13. and 21 & 22 Vict. c. 20. s. 1. applied only to drafts payable to bearer, which are made void by being post-dated—see the judgment of Willes, J.,—and not to drafts payable to order. The decision, therefore, is so far in favour of the defendant, and there was an early case of Allen v. Keeves (7), in which it was said, by Lord Kenyon, C.J., to be too clear for argument that a draft on a banker payable to bearer, and post-dated, could not be admitted in evidence. So also in Whitwell v. Bennett (8). Williams v. Jarrett (9) was cited at the trial of this cause, and will be relied on now; but it is submitted that it does not apply: it was decided on the 12th section of the 55 Geo. 3. c. 184, while the section upon which the defendant here relies is the 13th, which has the effect of making it void—see Serle v. Norton (10), where the Court held that a post-dated cheque was altogether void. Next, the recent act, 21 & 22 Vict. c. 20, has no operation so as to make the cheque admissible.—They also referred to Peacock v. Murrell (11), and to Upstone v. Marchant (12).

Horace Lloyd, in support of the rule.—Before the statute 21 & 22 Vict. c. 20. an unstamped instrument, purporting to be a cheque on a banker, but post-dated, could not be read in evidence; but on the face of it this document appears to be a properly stamped cheque, and is admissible. In Dunsford v. Ourlewis (3) the point was not raised. In Oliver v. Mortimer (4) the count upon the cheques was abandoned, and the nonsuit was on the common counts; and Key v. Matthias (5) is in favour of the plaintiff if the cheque had been payable to bearer. The decision in Whistler v. Forster (6), if against the plaintiff at all, is only an obiter dictum. The real questions upon the cheque being tendered in evidence were, What does it purport to be? and Is it properly stamped according to that purport? The penalty in section 13. of the 55 Geo. 3. c. 184. was intended to be a security against the perpetration of frauds, but can never have been intended to make a cheque void when in the hands of an innocent holder. But the decision in Williams v. Jarrett (9), confirmed by Whistler v. Forster (6), expressly decides this case, because it shews that the Court must look at what the document purports on its face to be. In the latter of the two cases, Willes, J. said, “Now, in the case of bills of exchange, it has been held in Williams v. Jarrett (9), and other cases, that the Court can only look to the date appearing on the face of the instrument. That, no doubt, was the key to my Brother Bramwell’s ruling in Key v. Matthias (5).” Upon the face of the cheque in question, everything appears to have been in accordance with the terms of the statute, and it was stamped according to its purport.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be made absolute. I quite concur in thinking that Williams v. Jarrett (9) and Whistler v. Forster (6) are expressly in point. If it was necessary to state my opinion whether the legislature intended by the 31 Geo. 3. c. 25. and the 55 Geo. 3. c. 184. to make void all instruments which were post-dated the moment it was shewn that the apparent date was not contemporaneous with the date on which they were issued, I should be inclined to say that it was so intended, and I am by no means satisfied with the reasons given for the decisions I have referred to, but I consider that they are binding upon us; they have long been acquiesced in, and I bow to their weight, as we are not to sit in error upon them. The rule must, therefore, be absolute; and I am not sorry that it must be so, for the defence set up was founded on gross injustice and fraud.

CROMPTON, J.—I quite agree that we are bound by Williams v. Jarrett (9), which was approved of in Whistler v. Forster (6), and was decided on the ground insisted on by the plaintiff's counsel. Those cases establish the principle that in construing the early statutes on the subject we ought to look to the purport of the instrument. If the matter was new I am not convinced that we should arrive at the same conclusion as the Courts did in those cases; but it seems clear that we must now look to what the instrument purports to be on the face of it.

BLACKBURN, J.—I think that Williams v. Jarrett (9) has established that the objection can only be taken when the instrument does not bear the stamp which, according to its purport, it ought to bear.

Attorney and Solicitor—Re-admission.

An attorney having been struck off the Roll, in order to be called to the bar, was afterwards disbarred for professional misconduct. After the lapse of twenty years, he applied to be re-admitted an attorney. It appeared that since his disbarral he had lived a very secluded life; but he had filed affidavits two months before the application, stating every place at which he had lived, and no affidavits were filed impeaching his character. The Court dispensed with the affidavits usually required of professional and other persons as to his good conduct and character in the interval, and re-admitted him without a re-examination.

Stammers now renewed his application on behalf of Henry Hugh Pyke to be re-admitted an attorney (1).

In addition to the facts disclosed on the former occasion, the applicant filed an affidavit stating that he had lived a very secluded life with his family since he was disbarred, and that, consequently, he was unable to bring the affidavits or testimonials required by the Court as to his character and conduct in the interval.

(1) See ante, p. 121.

But he mentioned in his affidavit every place, with the dates, at which he had been resident, and this affidavit was filed two months before the present application.

Garth, on behalf of the Law Society (no affidavits being filed in opposition), left it to the Court whether there was sufficient shewn to dispense with the affidavits of good conduct generally required by the Court; and also submitted that if the Court decided to re-admit the applicant, he ought to pass a fresh examination before he could be re-admitted; and he cited the case of a Mr. Sewell, who had been struck off the Roll ten years before, in order to be called to the bar; and Mellor, J. refused to order his re-admission without he underwent a fresh examination, although Mr. Sewell in the mean time had been practising as a barrister, and stated, as Mr. Pyke did in the present case, that he had been keeping up his professional knowledge by reading legal works.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think we may accede to this application. We were certainly desirous of satisfying ourselves that Mr. Pyke, during the time he has been excluded from professional practice, has conducted himself with perfect propriety in any business that he had been carrying on. We felt it to be due to the branch of the profession to which Mr. Pyke sought re-admittance, that satisfactory evidence of that should be given; because we were extremely anxious to give effect to that which was present to our minds, that the same character of honour which belongs to one branch of the profession should belong also to the other, and that we ought to be as watchful, in order to protect its honour and credit, over the branch of the profession to which Mr. Pyke seeks re-admittance, as over that branch to which we and the Bar belong. But we cannot expect impossibilities; and if Mr. Pyke, during the twenty years that he has been excluded from the profession, has not been brought into relations of business with persons to whom he can apply for testimonials as to his conduct, I do not think that impossibility ought to stand in the way of his re-admittance, if we think under all the circumstances he has done enough to atone for any professional misconduct for which in earlier life he was removed; and I think we may safely say that Mr. Pyke has been excluded long enough, reference being had to the matter which was the cause of his exclusion. I think we may accede to this application, and allow Mr. Pyke to be re-admitted an attorney.

BLACKBURN, J. and SHER, J. concurred.

Order accordingly.

1865. } WILLIAMS v. REYNOLDS AND June 17.* } ANOTHER.

Contract of Sale—Measure of Damages for Non-Delivery—Profit on Re-Sale.

On a contract to sell cotton of a certain quality at a certain price, to be delivered at a future time, the measure of damages for non-delivery is the difference between the contract price and the market price at the time limited for the delivery; and the buyer cannot recover for the loss of profit which he would have made by carrying out a re-sale at a higher price made in the interval between the contract and the time for delivery.

Declaration, that it was agreed between the plaintiff and defendants, that the defendants should sell and deliver to the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff should buy of the defendants, about 500 piculs of China cotton, at the price of 16½d. per lb., to be delivered in the month of August 1864, guaranteed fair; that the defendants delivered and the plaintiff accepted 181 piculs, but although all conditions had been performed, &c., and the plaintiff was ready and willing to receive, yet the defendants did not, in the said month of August or at any time, deliver to the plaintiff the residue of the cotton, whereby the plaintiff was incapacitated from performing a sub-contract for the sale of the cotton at a higher price than 16½d., and the plaintiff lost the profit he would have received for the performance of the said sub-contract.

Pleas—First, that it was not agreed as alleged; secondly, that the plaintiff was not ready and willing to accept the residue as alleged; thirdly, that the defendants did deliver the residue in August; fourthly, that the defendants were prevented from delivering by the acts of the plaintiff.

Issues joined thereon.

At the trial, before Shee, J., at the Liverpool Spring Assizes, it appeared that the plaintiff and defendants were Liverpool cotton brokers. On the 1st of April 1864 the plaintiff and defendants contracted by bought and sold notes for the purchase by the plaintiff of the defendants, of "about 500 piculs China cotton, @ 16½d. per lb., to be delivered in August this year, guaranteed fair." And on the 25th of May 1864 the plaintiff contracted to sell to Messrs. Mayall & Anderson "about 500 piculs China cotton, @ 19½d. per lb., guaranteed fair, August delivery." The defendants delivered about 181 piculs before the end of August, which were handed over by the plaintiff to Mayall & Anderson; but the defendants did not deliver any more cotton by the end of August. On the 1st of September the market price of cotton had again fallen, and the price of "fair China cotton" was then 18½d. per lb. It was admitted that it was the universal custom at Liverpool in contracts like the present, for "forward delivery," for the purchaser to re-sell as in the present case. A verdict was taken for the plaintiff for 515*l.* 19*s.* as damages on account of the residue not delivered which included the loss of profits which the plaintiff would have realized on his re-sale; with leave to the defendants to move to reduce the verdict to 257*l.* 19*s.* 6*d.*, if the Court should be of opinion that the measure of damages was only the difference between the contract price and the market price on the last day for delivery, when the breach of contract occurred.

A rule nisi having been obtained accordingly,—

R. G. Williams shewed cause.—He contended that as it was well known that on such contracts, the contract was, as it were, sure to be transferred by a sub-sale, the defendants were liable to any loss of profit which might have been made by the plaintiff on a re-sale; for which a contract had been made, subject only to the condition that the re-sale had been made at the actual market price at the time. The following cases were referred to in the course of his argument—Borries v. Hutchinson (1), Gee v. the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company (2), Wilson v. the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company (3), Randall v. Raper (4), Smeed v. Foord (5) and Dunlop v. Higgins (6).

Quain, in support of the rule, was not called upon to argue.

CROMPTON, J.—The rule must be made absolute to reduce the damages. The extra damages which the plaintiff claims are not recoverable either on authority or principle. The contract is to deliver cotton within a certain time; between the making of the contract and the limit of the time for the delivery the price rises, so that the buyer is in a position to make an advantageous re-sale; afterwards the price again falls, and at the time the contract is broken by the non-delivery the real or market price is higher than the contract price, but lower than that at which the plaintiff agreed to sell. What is the measure of damages? In general, the difference between the contract price and the real or market price at the time of breach. But the plaintiff contends that the criterion of the market price does not apply; but he says the loss of his profits by the re-sale is the measure of damages. I do not agree to this proposition. The plaintiff maintains that he is entitled to special damage, "because," he says, "having made a contract of sale at a higher price, by your (the defendants') default I have lost this bargain, and I have a right to pin you to that price." But this is not within the rule that measures the damages by the consequences naturally flowing from the breach, or such as are within the contemplation of the parties at the time of the contract. Mr. Mayne, in his book on Damages, p. 15, citing Hadley v. Baxendale (7), says rightly, "The first, and in fact the only inquiry is, whether the damage complained of is the natural and reasonable result of the defendant's act; it will assume that character if it can be shewn to be such a consequence as in the ordinary course of things would flow from the act, or in cases of contract, if it appears to have been contemplated by both parties." The extra damage here sought to be recovered does not come within either branch of the rule; and all the authorities are against it. Dunlop v. Higgins (6) was a case under the Scotch law, and all that Lord Cottenham says amounts to no more than that it was not a case to reduce the damages to the English rule. In Borries v. Hutchinson (1) the Court must be taken to have considered the sub-contract as contemporaneous and known to the defendant at the time of his contract. In Mayne on Damages, p. 18, after noticing Dunlop v. Higgins (6) as no authority in England, Mr. Mayne observes, "It is, however, remarkable for a vigorous onslaught upon the English law by so formidable an opponent as Lord Cottenham," and after noticing Lord Cottenham's dicta, he then makes this very good remark: "The question is, not what profit the plaintiff might have made, but what profit he professed to be purchasing. Not what damage he actually suffered, but what the other contemplated and undertook to pay for. It is quite clear that loss of profits by a re-sale can never be contemplated, unless the re-sale has taken place at the time and is communicated to the other party. The reason is that such a profit is utterly incapable of valuation. It may depend upon change of weather, a scientific discovery, an outbreak of war, a workmen's strike. It will depend upon the energy and sagacity of the person who purchases the goods, and the solvency of the person to whom he sells them again. In short, if the Scotch rule were to be carried out to its fair extent, no one could contract to sell goods which were not actually in his possession without charging an additional premium commensurate to the profits which the vendee might possibly make, and for which he himself would have to pay, if prevented from carrying out his agreement." There would be great difficulty in saying, where a contract is made for delivery at a particular date, at a time when the price is constantly fluctuating, that the seller contemplated as part of his liability, in case of default, the loss of any more advantageous contract that the buyer might have the opportunity of making. This is just like the case of the purchase of stock for the account, and it never was thought of looking at anything but the price of stock at the time of delivery, the loss to the buyer being the loss of the stock; any other loss would not be "the natural consequence" of the breach of contract (which is, perhaps, a better phrase than being "too remote"), and not in the contemplation of the parties. The seller contracts on a speculation of what the price may be at the time of delivery, and not with reference to five or six bargains which the buyer may make in the mean time, about which he knows nothing; and this is very different from the case where parties contract for the supply of materials to carry out an actual contract already made and known to both of them. The rule must be absolute to reduce the damages to 267*l.* 19*s.* 6*d.*, the difference between the contract price and the market price at the date for delivery.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. On the 1st of April 1864 the plaintiff and the defendants entered into a contract by which the defendants agreed to sell 500 piculs of China cotton at 16½*d.* per lb., to be delivered in August. They had therefore all the month of August to supply a certain quantity of cotton, answering the description given, at a certain price; and at the end of August they had not delivered the whole of the cotton. On the above facts the measure of damages would have been the difference between the contract price of 16½*d.* and the market price at the end of August, the latest time for delivery, which was 18½*d.* The question is, whether the further facts in the case make any difference. This was a contract in the ordinary course for the sale, not of any specific cotton, but of cotton of a particular description bought on speculation. It was admitted that such contracts were to a certain extent the subject of re-sale, that is, that in the ordinary course the buyer does not re-sell or transfer the contract, like a bill of lading, but he contracts with some other person to sell a similar quantity of goods of a like description to those he has bought, relying on his purchase as the source by which to carry out his sub-contract. There are, no doubt, cases in which by the course of business, if one party makes a contract binding himself to deliver goods, he makes the contract to deliver to others whom the purchaser may name, who rely only on the original seller's liability; but that is not the present case. The additional facts here are, that on the 25th of May 1864 the plaintiff contracted to supply to Messrs. Mayall & Anderson 500 piculs of China cotton at 19½*d.*, to be delivered in August. When the end of August came, if the defendants had fulfilled their contract, the plaintiff would have handed over the cotton to his purchasers and would have gained a considerable profit by the transaction. It was argued that because this purchase was made at Liverpool, and all there know that cotton is bought on speculation to sell again, and that the purchaser as a matter of course would enter into a fresh contract relying on the performance by the defendants of their contract to enable the plaintiff to carry out his, and that the non-delivery of the cotton by the defendants would entail the breach by the plaintiff of his sub-contract, the loss of the profits by the re-sale would be a natural consequence of the defendants' breach of contract. But no one case cited, or which could have been cited, bears out this proposition; and I cannot see that this loss of profit was the natural consequence of the defendants' breach of contract. It was not at all a necessary consequence, not even a natural one, that the purchaser should rely on the seller's contract alone to fulfil his own contract. If he had reason to doubt the seller's solvency, it would have been very imprudent of him to do so. The plaintiff might have gone into the market and supplied the cotton for his sub-contract from thence. In point of fact the plaintiff did rely on the defendants, but that is no reason for saying that therefore the defendants are liable for all the consequent loss. Many analogous cases may be put. One constantly sees in the advertising columns of the Times such advertisements as that "in consequence of failure of remittances from abroad, Messrs. A. are obliged to stop payment." Could it be maintained for a moment that the merchant here could recover as damages from his foreign correspondent all the loss he has suffered by being obliged to suspend payment? There can be no doubt that all he could recover would be the amount due, with interest; and the loss of credit consequent on the failure of the remittances could form no ground of special damage. So in the case of bills of lading, by which goods are made deliverable to the consignee or assigns for the express purpose of making them transferable on delivery, so that they may be used for the purpose of fresh contracts, if the shipowner fails to deliver, it has never been suggested to include in the damages to be recovered the increased value at which the goods had been sold during the interval of carriage. So again on the Stock Exchange, in the sale of shares or stock for the account, the contract is made for the express purpose that the purchasers may pass the contract from hand to hand, yet it has never been contemplated that the original seller would be liable for the highest price obtained between the day of contract and the day of account; yet if the argument for the plaintiff is good, it would follow that he would be so liable. We must, therefore, look to the consequences that would follow were we to allow this present claim; and not only is there no authority in any analogous case, but the inconveniences would follow which are pointed out in the passage read by my Brother Crompton from Mayne on Damages, and against which the writer gives very good reasons. I, therefore, am clearly of opinion that the rule must be absolute to reduce the damages to the smaller sum.

SHEE, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think we ought to adhere to the rule laid down in Hadley v. Baxendale (7), which meets this case exactly. In that case, it is laid down that the damages are to be such as naturally—that is, in the ordinary course of things—arise from the breach of duty complained of, or such as may be fairly considered to have been in the contemplation of the parties at the time they entered into the contract. Take the first proposition: can the loss of the profits on the sub-contract be said to arise naturally and in the ordinary course of things from the breach? Not unless, in the ordinary course of things, the plaintiff could have sold at a profit, on the last day of August. But it cannot be that the loss of any profit he might make in the interval is the natural consequence of the breach; for whether a profit may be made depends on circumstances altogether out of the ordinary course of things; this loss of profit, therefore, cannot be the natural result of the defendants' breach of contract. Again, can it be said to have been fairly and reasonably in the contemplation of the parties at the time of the contract? Both parties had communicated all they knew; but they could not have formed any opinion, and could not foresee whether or not the purchaser would be able to realize a profit in the mean time. The extra damages, therefore, do not fall within either alternative of the rule, and the verdict must be entered accordingly.

Rule absolute. (8)

Pauper Lunatic—Irremovability—Constructive Residence.

A pauper, having occupied lodgings in a parish, left the parish intending to return as soon as his trade became better; he did not retain his lodgings, but left some old clothes there in the hands of the landlord, and in his absence his lodgings were not occupied, and he could have had them at any time on his return. After three months' absence, he returned:—Held, that the pauper was not constructively resident in the parish during the three months, and that the absence formed a break in the residence.

June 17.* } RICHARDSON v. LOCKLIN.

Venue — Local Action — Nuisance — Pleading.

An action for damage arising from a public nuisance on real property, as on a public highway, is a local action; and if there is no local description in the body of the declaration, the county in the margin must be taken to be repeated in the declaration, and it is a material allegation; and on a plea traversing the existence of the highway, proof that the highway is in another county is a fatal variance and ground of nonsuit.

Declaration.—Surrey, to wit. The plaintiff complains, &c. For that the defendant wrongfully altered and diverted a certain footway through a certain piece of land over which the public had a right of way, and that the defendant negligently and improperly made the alteration and diversion by leaving a tree in the middle of the pathway so altered and diverted, and also by wholly or partly filling up a certain ditch on one side of the pathway, so altered and diverted, by placing in the ditch a quantity of faggots, and laying thereon certain earth, which faggots and earth being so negligently and improperly laid down became unsound, unsafe and unfit for use as a public footway, whereby the plaintiff whilst lawfully passing along the footway was tripped up by reason of the faggots not being properly put down, and fell and was injured, &c.

Plea.—First, not guilty; secondly, that the plaintiff was not lawfully passing along the footway; thirdly, that the defendant did what is complained of by the plaintiff's licence. Issue thereon.

At the trial, before Bramwell, B., at the Surrey Spring Assizes, 1865, the plaintiff was nonsuited on the opening of counsel, on the ground that the cause of action was local, and that Loughton, the place in which the alleged footway was situate, was in the county of Essex.

A rule nisi having been obtained to set the nonsuit aside, and for a new trial, on the ground that the cause of action was not local, and that the objection was not open to the defendant on the record as it stood; and that the objection that the action was improperly brought, and the venue laid in Surrey was not ground of nonsuit.

Pearce shewed cause.—The action is for a nuisance to a highway which is clearly local.

[CROMPTON, J.—There can be no doubt of that: the question is, whether the fact of the road being in another county was ground of nonsuit.]

It would appear to be so. If the objection appear on the record it is ground of demurrer—The Mayor of Berwick v. Ewart (1); but if not, it is ground of nonsuit—1 Chitty on Pleading, 290, 7th edit., and the cases there cited.

[CROMPTON, J.—Boyes v. Hewetson (2) is an authority the other way.]

Bullen and Leake's Precedents of Pleading, p. 2, 2nd ed., cites the Pleading Rule 4, Trin. Term, 1853, which is the same as Rule 8, Hil. Term, 4 Will. 4. "The name of a county shall in all cases be stated in the margin of the declaration, and shall be taken to be the venue intended by the plaintiff, and no venue shall be stated in the body of the declaration, or in any subsequent pleading. Provided, that in cases where local description is now required, such local description shall be given." And then proceeds: "The venue, or the county named in the margin of the declaration, is the place where all the facts alleged in the declaration are supposed to have happened. Where the place of the happening of a fact is a material allegation, the venue so stated in the margin supplies that allegation in the absence of any other statement"—citing Cook v. Swift (3) and Boydell v. Harkness (4).

Yeatman, in support of the rule, contended that the action was not local but transitory, being not in rem, but in personam.

[BLACKBURN, J.—This is an action for a nuisance caused on real property; such an action is clearly local.]

If the Court are of opinion that the cause of action is local, there can be little doubt that the objection is ground of nonsuit.

CROMPTON, J.—There is clearly nothing in the first point; and as to the other, on consideration I think the plaintiff's counsel is right in declining to argue the question. This is an action founded on a nuisance on real property, and there can be no doubt that such causes of action are always local. Then, was the nonsuit the proper mode of taking advantage of the action being brought in the wrong county? That depends on whether the venue in the margin amounts to an allegation in the declaration that the act complained of took place in Surrey; for, if it does, then the fact of the footway being in Surrey is a material part of the issue on a traverse that there was any such footway. Now, under the 4th Pleading Rule, Trin. Term, 1853, "the name of a county shall in all cases be stated in the margin of a declaration, and shall be taken to be the venue intended by the plaintiff, and no venue shall be stated in the body of the declaration"; that is, the venue in the margin shall be taken as an averment that the cause of action arose in the county named in the margin. The only question in my mind was, whether there was any exception as to local actions by reason of the proviso in the rule, "that in cases where local description is now required such local description shall be given;" but the cases of Cook v. Swift (3) and Boydell v. Harkness (4) cited in Bullen and Leake, seem to shew that the venue in the margin must be taken to be incorporated in the declaration for this purpose, when it is material that the place in which a fact happened should be stated. And other text writers seem to adopt this view, and, therefore, as we have the authorities and text writers agreeing, I think we ought to follow them. I therefore think that the nonsuit was right.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The declaration is very inartificially drawn, but in effect it amounts to saying that the plaintiff was guilty of a public nuisance in obstructing a public footway, and that in consequence the plaintiff suffered damage. Such a cause of action is clearly local. Now, it seems to me that what is said in Roscoe on Evidence, p. 487, 10th edit., is quite true: "If the action is local, and it appears in evidence that the premises are not situate within the county, this is not a ground of nonsuit or objection at Nisi Prius, unless the plea raises the point of venue, or the effect is to produce a variance." And the question is, whether on the present pleadings the effect is to raise a variance. Now, if by reason of the venue in the margin the allegation is to be taken as repeated in the declaration that the footway was in Surrey, then that fact is a material part of the issue on a plea that there is no such public footway. In Bullen and Leake's Pleading (page 2, 2nd edit.), Cook v. Swift (3) and Boydell v. Harkness (4) are cited in support of the proposition that "when the place of the happening of a fact is a material allegation, the venue stated in the margin supplies that allegation in the absence of any other statement," and those cases fairly bear out that proposition. We therefore must take it that in the present declaration there is what amounts to an allegation that the footway was in Surrey, and that being a material averment, a variance is raised by the plea between the allegation and the proof.

CROMPTON, J. added,—The declaration amounts to an allegation that there was a public footway in Surrey; and the plea, that there was no footway in Surrey.

Vendor and Purchaser—Qualified Covenant for Title.

In a deed of conveyance in fee from the defendant to the plaintiff of a house and premises then in the occupation of the defendant, "together with all lights, liberties, privileges, easements and appurtenances to the premises belonging or in anywise appertaining or usually held and enjoyed therewith, or deemed or taken as part, parcel or member thereof," the defendant covenanted "that notwithstanding any act, deed, matter or thing whatsoever made, done or permitted by him, or any person claiming through him, he, the defendant, hath now good title to convey the messuage and premises with the appurtenances." Some years before

(5) The Court seem to have assumed that there was a traverse of the right of way; but the plea was as above set out.

* Decided in the Sittings after Trinity Term, coram Erle, C.J., Martin, B., Willes, J., Channell, B., Keating, J., Pigott, B. and Smith, J.

this conveyance the defendant, being then owner in fee and occupier of the same house, &c., which was then in the same state and condition, entered into a contract in writing with the owners of the adjoining premises that the cornice and spouts and three windows of the defendant's house overlooking the adjoining premises were encroachments, and agreed to pay an annual sum of 5s. so long as he was permitted to use the said cornice, spouts and windows. The defendant had never acquired any easement in respect of the cornice, spouts or windows by twenty years' user:—Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench), that there was no breach of covenant for title by the defendant, for that he only conveyed the premises so far as he was possessed or could convey them, and that his qualified covenant for title limited his covenant to that which he actually had, or but for any act of his would have had, and that he had not and never would have acquired any easement in the windows, &c., inasmuch as the adjoining owners would have interfered to prevent him but for his acknowledgment.

This was an appeal, by the plaintiff, from the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, making absolute a rule to enter a verdict for the defendant upon a point reserved at the trial (1).

The action was brought to recover damages for the breach of a covenant contained in a deed of conveyance by the defendant to the plaintiff of a certain house, garden, hereditaments and premises, in the town of Nottingham. The deed conveyed the premises in fee to the plaintiff, "together with all lights, liberties, privileges, easements, profits and appurtenances to the said messuage, garden, hereditaments and premises belonging or in anywise appertaining, or usually held, occupied or enjoyed therewith, or deemed or taken as part, parcel or member thereof;" and the defendant covenanted in the said conveyance, "that notwithstanding any act, deed, matter or thing whatsoever made, done or permitted by him or any other person claiming through him, he, the defendant, then had good right and title to grant and convey the messuage and garden with the appurtenances.

(1) 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 275.

At the trial, it was proved that the defendant had entered into an agreement, some years previous to this conveyance, with the owners of a chapel adjoining his house, that a cornice, three windows and two spouts belonging to his house were encroachments on the chapel, and in consideration thereof agreed to pay to the owners of the chapel an annual sum of 5s. There was no evidence of fraud on the part of the defendant. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff; leave being reserved to the defendant to move to enter the verdict in his favour, and a rule nisi was obtained on the ground that there was no breach of covenant; which rule was made absolute. The case is reported in the 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 275.

Hayes, Serj., for the appellant (the plaintiff in the Court below).—The defendant is liable for the breach of his covenant. The Court has only to look at the plain words of the covenant and at the facts as proved at the trial, and it is at once clear that there is a breach of the covenant. The agreement with the owners of the adjoining premises was the act of the defendant himself; but for the agreement the defendant might have acquired an easement by user. At least the cornice, spouts and windows should have been excepted from the conveyance. There are no cases precisely in point. The case of Browning v. Wright (2) is a different and rather a converse case. The defendant in this case has made the encroachments himself. This is, in fact, a covenant for quiet enjoyment.

[MARTIN, B.—That means that the party conveying has done nothing to hinder quiet enjoyment. It does not meet the case of an encroachment.]

The words of the conveyance are, "Together with all lights, liberties, privileges, easements and appurtenances." The meaning of the covenant must be that the defendant had a title to what he conveyed; not that he conveyed what had been conveyed to him. Butler v. Swinerton (3) may be said to be a charter for a liberal construction of covenants, and it was there held that "acts" mean something done by the party conveying. The construction sought to be put on this covenant would certainly be a very narrow and illiberal construction. He referred to 2 Sugden's Vendors and Pur- chasers, 81, 9th edit., Hobson v. Middleton (4), Spencer v. Marriott (4) and James v. Plant (5).

Field (Cave with him), for the respondent (the defendant in the Court below).—There was no breach of covenant. The defendant, the vendor, had no title to the windows, cornice and spouts to convey. The maxim caveat emptor is applicable to this case. That maxim applies when a vendor has no title to convey, and the purchaser has then no action for a breach of covenant. This rule was adopted in Bell v. Holbeck (6), and in Cripps v. Reade (7). This covenant was, in fact, that the defendant had not incumbered. A purchaser says, "Having satisfied me as to your title, now covenant that you have not incumbered." The conveyance does not purport to grant any right in the nature of an easement in respect of the windows, cornice and spouts. It only purports to grant such rights in respect of the windows, cornice and spouts as appertained thereto, or as were usually held and enjoyed therewith. There was no easement appertaining or belonging to the windows, cornice or spouts at the time of the conveyance. The defendant had no power to grant the windows, cornice and spouts, but it was not by reason or in consequence of any act, deed, or thing done or permitted by him. The cases all shew that the vendor is not liable on a covenant of this kind, unless he has been guilty of some act injurious to the title. All he contracts and covenants for is, that he has done no act to incumber—Stannard v. Forbes (8), Woodhouse v. Jenkins (9) and Nash v. Ashton (10).

Hayes, Serj., in reply.—It is said that the vendor never had any title to the cornice, spouts and windows, and that these were not therefore within the covenant; but the covenant cannot admit of so narrow a construction. The agreement to admit the encroachment and pay an annual sum to the owners of the adjoining premises was an act in derogation of the defendant's title, and amounted, in fact, to an incumbrance.

ERLE, C.J.—We are all of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench was right and ought to be affirmed. There was a conveyance in fee by the defendant to the plaintiff of a house and premises, together with all lights, liberties, privileges, easements, and appurtenances to the premises belonging or in anywise appertaining or usually held and enjoyed therewith; and in the conveyance there was a covenant by the defendant that, notwithstanding any act, deed, matter or thing whatsoever made, done, or permitted by him, or any other person claiming through him, he had then good title to convey the said messuage and premises, with the appurtenances. It appears that some time previous to the sale and conveyance of the house and premises by the defendant, he had pulled down an old house, and had built a new house on the same site, but that in building the new house the defendant had encroached upon the adjoining premises, and had, in fact, extended the cornice of his house into and over the land of the owners of the adjoining premises, and had also carried the waterspouts from his own house into and over the adjoining premises, and had opened three windows into the adjoining premises. Now, it is not disputed, that in respect of the cornice and spouts the defendant had no title, or that he had any right to the light by the windows; and the owner of the adjoining premises had several years previous to the date of the conveyance to the plaintiff, and before the defendant had acquired any title by reason of user, called upon the defendant to acknowledge the encroachment, and the defendant had entered into an agreement with the owner of the adjoining premises to admit the encroachment, and had agreed to pay in respect and for the same an annual payment of 5s.; and it is said that this agreement was an act done by the defendant in derogation of his title to the premises conveyed to the plaintiff, and was therefore a breach of covenant. The plaintiff has, no doubt, been wronged; but there was no fraud proved at the trial, and I am of opinion that the plaintiff has no remedy in an action for breach of covenant. The liability of a vendor on a qualified covenant for title of this kind has been laid down in a series of cases, and I can see no reason for overruling those decisions. On a sale of real property it is for the purchaser to satisfy himself whether the vendor has a good title or not. The vendor then makes a conveyance, and usually covenants that he has by no act of his done anything to derogate from his title. It is clear that on such a covenant a vendor would not be liable even if he never had any title to the property conveyed whatever, and in this case there was nothing in the agreement which the defendant entered into with the owners of the adjoining premises to derogate from the defendant's title, or to render it less good than when he first came into possession. I may add that I concur in the reasons given for the judgment in the Court below.

MARTIN, B.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with the judgment of my Lord and that of my Brother Mellor delivered in the Court below. I think the reasons given for my Brother Mellor's judgment well founded. By the terms of the agreement entered into between the defendant and the trustees of the chapel, it is clear that the trustees may put an end to the agreement at any time. The defendant's only title to the cornice, spouts and lights was by virtue of this agreement, which, in fact, is no title at all. It appears to me that this is a case in which the maxim caveat emptor applies, because the jury found distinctly that there was no fraud on the part of the vendor. The purchaser therefore has no redress. This maxim caveat emptor, no doubt, in some cases, may operate harshly; but the principle works well, and in putting a stop to litigation is on the whole beneficial. The cases cited on behalf of the defendant are conclusive as to the rule of law on this subject. It has been the practice of conveyancers to insert certain covenants in conveyances for the protection of purchasers, and these covenants have been inserted for centuries, viz. an absolute covenant for title, a covenant for quiet enjoyment, and a qualified covenant for title that the vendor has done no act to incumber. Now, the first two of these are not in this conveyance; if they had been, perhaps the defendant would have been liable; but this qualified covenant is quite distinct from the absolute covenant. The words of this covenant are to be construed literally according to their true meaning. The covenant in this conveyance in effect only provides that the defendant, by himself, or by any person or persons claiming through, under or in trust for him, has done no act, deed, matter or thing to injure or impair or derogate from his title. I am clearly of opinion that there has been no breach of this covenant by the defendant. The act of the defendant in entering into the agreement did not affect his title to the property either one way or the other. However hard the result may be on the purchaser, we should do very wrong to strain the law in his favour. I am therefore of opinion that the judgment of the Court below ought to be affirmed.

The other JUDGES concurred.

Judgment affirmed.

} MAINPRICE v. WESTLEY.

Auction—Peremptory Sale—Liability of Auctioneer—Principal and Agent.

An auctioneer was instructed by the owner of premises to offer them for peremptory sale, by public auction, at a named day and place. He issued handbills, in which it was represented that the premises would be offered for sale by himself in manner above stated. It was also represented in the handbills, that the premises would be offered for sale by direction of the mortgagee, but not disclosing his name; and there was a notice at the bottom of the handbills, "For further particulars apply to Mr. Hustwick, solicitor, or the auctioneer." Hustwick was the solicitor of the vendor. The plaintiff attended the auction, and made the highest bid, except that Hustwick bid a larger sum and bought in the premises; whereupon the plaintiff brought an action against the auctioneer:—Held, that upon these facts there was no contract upon which the auctioneer was personally liable.

Declaration against the defendant, an auctioneer. Averments, that he was retained to sell a house and shop by public auction; that he published and circulated handbills, in which it was stated and represented by him that he would offer them for peremptory sale by public auction on a day and at a place named; that the plaintiff, confiding in these statements and representations, attended at the time and place; that the house and shop were offered according to the representations and statements; that the plaintiff bid a price, which was the highest bid except a sum which, to the knowledge of the defendant, was bidden by an agent on behalf of the vendor, contrary to the representation that the sale was peremptory; yet the defendant did not nor would sell the house and shop peremptorily or accept the offer of the plaintiff, or declare the plaintiff the highest bidder and purchaser.

Pleas—First, not guilty; secondly, a denial that the defendant caused the handbills to be published and circulated as alleged.

At the trial it appeared that the defendant had circulated handbills, in which it was stated,—that the premises, on the day in question, “will be offered for peremptory sale by auction by Mr. J. Westley, by direction of the mortgagee, with a power of sale, subject to such conditions as will be then declared.” At the bottom of the bills was a statement, in large capitals: “For further particulars apply to Mr. Hustwick, solicitor, or the auctioneer.” Mr. Hustwick was the solicitor of the vendor, and the representations were made by his authority, and he bought in the premises at the auction by bidding over the plaintiff.

A verdict was entered for the plaintiff, with leave to move to set that verdict aside and enter one for the defendant instead thereof.

A rule nisi was accordingly moved for and granted, against which—

Lush, Douglas Brown and Markby shewed cause (April 24).—There are two points to be considered: First, whether the declaration is proved; secondly, whether there is anything in the Statute of Frauds which can disentitle the plaintiff from recovering in the action. As to the first point, everything which is alleged and put in issue was proved. It was proved that the defendant entered into a contract that the house and shop should be offered for peremptory sale. At the trial there was not any contest as to the meaning of peremptory sale, and it must be taken that the property was to be sold without reserve, and that the highest bidder had a right to have it knocked down to him.

[BLACKBURN, J.—Does the defendant do more than put himself forward as the agent of some one else?]

Yes; he puts himself forward as a known person acting for another whose name he does not disclose. It is just the same as where a reward is offered for the recovery of lost property. Warlow v. Harrison (1) is an authority in favour of the plaintiff. That case was decided in the first instance in this Court, the judgment being that a nonsuit should be entered, and that judgment was affirmed in the Exchequer Chamber, though for slightly different reasons. Judgment was delivered by Martin, B. for himself, Byles, J. and Watson, B.; but Willes, J. added, “My Brother Bramwell and myself do not dissent from the judgment which has been pronounced. But we prefer to rest our decision, as to the amendment, upon the ground that the defendant undertook to have, and yet there was evidence that he had not, authority to sell without reserve.” The whole Court considered that the auctioneer had made a contract, and it is submitted that the defendant has done so in this case.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—It seems hard to make him liable; his authority may be revoked at any moment.]

The persons who go to an auction have no one to look to except the auctioneer, and if he does not disclose the name of his principal, he ought to be held to be liable upon the contract made by him. In the course of the argument in Warlow v. Harrison (1), Martin, B. says, “Does the auctioneer do more than ‘say that the owner has directed him to sell without reserve’?” But he afterwards says, in delivering the considered judgment of the Court, “upon the facts of the case, it seems to us that the plaintiff is entitled to recover.” Now here the handbill is published by the auctioneer; he assumes the authority of the principal: suppose, after issuing the bills, he was to refuse to hold the auction, or to knock down the articles sold to the highest bidder, he would be liable to an action. If he has a right to say that his power has been revoked by his principal, no one would think it worth while to attend the sale. In Hanson v. Roberdeau (2) Lord Kenyon said, “The defendant, after having agreed to take 50*l.* for the deposit, cannot object that too little was paid. And though, where an auctioneer names his principal, it is not proper that he should be liable to an action, yet it is a very different case where the auctioneer sells the commodity without saying on whose behalf he sells it; in such a case the purchaser is entitled to look to him personally for the completion of the contract." In Story on Agency, a 267, it is said, "Thus where a contract is made with an auctioneer for the purchase of goods at a public sale, and no disclosure is made of the principal on whose behalf the commodity is sold, the auctioneer will be liable to the purchaser to complete the contract, although, from the nature of public sales, it is plain that he acts as agent only." This is in accordance with the decision in Warlow v. Harrison (1); for the intention of the Court is clear, although no judgment was ever really entered, as the parties consented to a stet processus, as appears from the case as reported in the Law Journal Reports.

O'Malley (May 4), in support of the rule. —The bill of advertisement mentions that the defendant is selling for the mortgagee, and refers to Mr. Hustwick as his solicitor; it shews, therefore, that the defendant was acting for a disclosed principal, and in such a case the contract is, prima facie, with the principal, and not with the agent. Warlow v. Harrison (1) is no authority against the defendant. The majority of the Judges in the Exchequer Chamber decided against the auctioneer, holding him liable on the ground that no principal was disclosed; but here the principal is disclosed. Lord St. Leonards is express upon the point; in the Handy Book, p. 25, 7th edit., he says, "If you state in the particulars, or advertisements, that the estate is to be sold without reserve, the sale would be void against a purchaser if any person were employed as a puffer, and actually bid at the sale. But although the owner himself, or an agent for him, bid at a sale, notwithstanding such a condition, and the lot is knocked down to him, the last bond fide bidder cannot claim the lot, whatever remedy he may have for a misstatement: against the auctioneer he has no remedy." Manser v. Back (3) shews that the auctioneer's authority may be revoked at any time before the sale has actually taken place; how then can an action be maintained against him upon a contract which he had no power to make? It must be remembered that no misrepresentation is either alleged or proved.

Cur. adv. vult.

(3) 6 Hare, 443.

The judgment of the Court (4) was now delivered by—

BLACKBURN, J.—The declaration in this case contains averments that the defendant, being an auctioneer, retained to sell by public auction a house and shop, published and circulated handbills in which it was stated and represented by the defendant that he, the defendant, would offer the said message and shop for peremptory sale by public auction, on a day and at a place named; that the plaintiff confiding in these statements and representations, attended at the time and place; and that the message was offered according to the representations and statements, and the plaintiff then bid a price, which was the highest bid except a sum which, to the knowledge of the defendant, was bidden by an agent on behalf of the vendor, contrary to the representation that the sale was peremptory; yet the defendant did not nor would sell the message peremptorily, or accept the offer of the plaintiff, or declare the plaintiff the highest bidder and purchaser. There were pleas, amongst others, of not guilty, and a denial that the defendant caused the handbills to be published and circulated as alleged.

If it had been alleged that any part of this representation was false to the knowledge of the defendant, and that the plaintiff was induced by such deceit to incur expense by going to the place of auction, or the like, the count would have been good, and the plaintiff, on proof of the deceit, would have been entitled to such damages as he might have sustained by reason of expenses or loss of time occasioned by his attendance at the sale, or possibly to merely nominal damages. But intentional deceit is neither alleged, nor was it attempted to be proved; what the plaintiff relied on was, that there was a contract on the part of the defendant that, if the plaintiff was the highest bidder, the premises should be knocked down to him, and if he had proved such a contract, the declaration would probably after verdict be understood as alleging it, or at all events might easily be made to do so by an amendment. But we think that no such contract was proved.

It appeared on the trial that the defendant was an auctioneer, and that he had circulated handbills, in which it was stated that the premises, on the day in question, would be offered for peremptory sale by auction by Mr. J. Westley, the defendant by direction of the mortgagee, with a power of sale, subject to such conditions as will be then declared; and at the bottom of the bill was a statement, in large capitals, "for further particulars apply to Mr. Hustwick, solicitor, or the auctioneer." There is no doubt that this was a representation by the defendant that he intended to put up the premises for peremptory sale; but it is also a statement that he did so by the direction of the mortgagee, and as agent for him, and though the name of that mortgagee is not disclosed on the bill, the name of the solicitor, Mr. Hustwick, is disclosed, and he is referred to as being the party from whom further particulars were to be obtained. These parts of the handbill very materially qualify the representation stated in the declaration, and it appeared that they were true. Hustwick was the solicitor of the vendor, and the representations were made by his authority; and the plaintiff's complaint was that Hustwick bought in the premises. If there was a contract on the part of the defendant that the sale should be peremptory, it was truly enough said that the contract was broken by allowing the property to be bought in.

The plaintiff's counsel, in the argument before us mainly relied on the authority of the case of Warlow v. Harrison (1), where, in the Exchequer Chamber, three learned Judges gave their opinion that where an auctioneer advertised a sale without reserve, not disclosing in any way who his principal was, he personally contracted that there should be a sale without reserve. Two other learned Judges did not agree in this view: and it appears that ultimately the Court of Exchequer Chamber pronounced no other judgment than that the pleadings should be amended to enable the parties to raise the question, unless they consented to a stet processus, which they did. We do not think, therefore, that we are precluded by this, as a judgment of a Court of error; and if necessary we should be at liberty to consider the question whether, even in a case where the name of a principal is not disclosed by an auctioneer, there is a contract by the latter, such as is now insisted on. The Lord Chief Justice and my Brother Shee are of opinion that there is not, inasmuch as the character of an auctioneer as agent is unlike that of many other agents, as to whom, so long as the fact of there being a principal is undisclosed, it remains uncertain whether the contracting party is acting as principal or agent; while in the employment and duty of an auctioneer, the character of agent is necessarily implied, and the party bidding at the auction knowingly deals with him as such, and with the knowledge that his authority may be at any moment put an end to by the principal. I myself should pause before deciding upon this ground. I do not, however, wish to express dissent from the view thus expressed; and we are all of opinion that it is unnecessary to decide this point. The three Judges who formed the majority of the Court in Warlow v. Harrison (1) base their opinion entirely upon the fact that the vendor was not disclosed—that he was a concealed principal; but in the present case, the passages in the handbill (which are not set out in the declaration) shewed that the defendant was acting for a principal—the mortgagee, who was described, and whose agent Mr. Hustwick, the solicitor, was named. Now, as a general rule, where an agent acts for a named principal, the contract, if any, is, prima facie, with the principal, not with the agent, and, accordingly, acting on this principle, the Court of King's Bench, in Evans v. Evans (5), decided that where premises were let by auction by the plaintiffs as auctioneers, but at the foot of the written conditions was written, "approved by David Jones," the contract of letting was not with the plaintiffs, the auctioneers, but with David Jones; Patteson, J. saying, "On the document I can see no doubt; if the plaintiffs let for themselves why is David Jones's name added?" We think this an express authority, that if there was any contract in this case it was with Hustwick, not with the defendant.

We are not to be understood as deciding that the plaintiff could not have maintained this action against Hustwick, but merely that he has failed in proving any case against the defendant.

The rule, therefore, must be absolute to enter the verdict for the defendant.

Rule absolute.

Marine Insurance—Total Loss—General Average.

If a ship is submerged in deep water with cargo on board so that it cannot be got out without raising the ship, the cost of raising is general average, to which the cargo must contribute. In such a case, in order to ascertain whether a ship is a constructive total loss, the sum to be contributed by the cargo as general average must be taken into consideration; and if, after deducting that sum, the remaining cost of raising together with the cost of repairs of the ship is less than her value when repaired, the ship is not a total loss. So held by Blackburn, J.; Shee, J. dissenting.

Declaration on a policy of insurance, dated the 6th of October 1863, effected by the plaintiff on the ship Chebucto, from Liverpool to Rio de Janeiro, valued at 1,500*l.*; underwritten by the defendant for 25*l.*

The defendant paid 18*l.* 15*s.* into court.

At the trial, before Mellor, J., at the Sittings in London after Trinity Term, 1864, a verdict was found for the plaintiff, subject to the following

CASE.

1. The Chebucto, the vessel insured, belonging to the plaintiff, sailed on the 21st of October 1863 from Liverpool for Rio de Janeiro on the voyage insured, laden with a general cargo.

2. In the due prosecution of her voyage the ship met with heavy gales, and worked, strained and leaked very much, so that it became necessary by reason of the perils of the seas, for the safety and preservation of the cargo, ship and crew, to cut away all forward, and to bear up for and put into Falmouth harbour as a port of refuge, where the vessel with her cargo on board came to anchor on the 12th of November 1863.

3. By reason of the premises a certain general average loss was sustained.

4. On the arrival of the ship at Falmouth the master of the ship applied to Messrs. Broad & Sons, who are ship agents at Falmouth, requesting them to act as agents for the ship, and Messrs. Broad & Sons agreed so to do.

5. On the recommendation of surveyors employed by the master, the ship was passed inside the breakwater, and was moored to the pier for the purpose of being repaired, and a portion of the cargo was discharged, the heavier portion of the cargo, however, being left in the ship. The repairs were then proceeded with, but were not completed by the 2nd of December 1863.

6. On the 2nd of December, whilst the ship was lying moored to the pier, there blew a hurricane, which caused the ship, with that part of the cargo which had not been discharged, to sink at her moorings, at a place where at low water there was a depth of twenty-two feet and at high water a depth of forty feet.

7. On the same day, namely, the 2nd of December 1863, the plaintiff was informed by a telegram sent to him by the master of the ship that she had sunk in Falmouth harbour; and on the following day a Mr. Amos, a person experienced in the surveying and repairing of ships, arrived at Falmouth with full authority from the plaintiff to investigate the whole matter, and to act for him in all matters concerning the ship as according to the best of his judgment would be best for all concerned. Mr. Amos having examined the position of the ship, and having informed himself of her prior condition, and taking into consideration the probable injuries the ship had sustained, and having formed a judgment of the cost of raising her and of her further repairs, came to the conclusion that it would cost more to raise and repair her than she would be worth when repaired. Accordingly, on the 4th of December he, on the part of the plaintiff, gave notice to Broad & Sons that the plaintiff abandoned the ship, and would not be responsible for and would have nothing to do with raising or repairing her.

8. On the 7th of December a surveyor, Mr. Thomas, by the orders of Messrs. Broad & Sons (which were given on their own responsibility, and not as agents for the plaintiff) commenced raising the ship, and on the 20th of that month he succeeded in raising her with all those goods on board of her which had not been discharged before the aforesaid 2nd of December. She was subsequently moved into dock by the orders and under the superintendence of the master, who had remained at Falmouth since the arrival of the ship in that harbour, notwithstanding that Mr. Amos on his visit to Falmouth had expressly ordered the captain to have nothing to do with the ship, and at the commencement of this action she was lying at Falmouth safely moored.

9. On the 4th of December the captain, by the instructions of Amos, signed and sent by post a notice of abandonment to Davies & Co. of Liverpool, the brokers who had effected the policy of insurance, and who then held the same, and on the 9th of December Davies & Co. gave due notice of abandonment to the defendant as follows :

"Liverpool, 9th Dec. 1863.

"Messrs. Burn & Airley.

"Gentlemen,—On behalf of owners of the Chebucto we beg to give you notice that the vessel is abandoned to you in Falmouth harbour.

"Yours very truly,

"D. W. Davies & Co."

10. The value of the cargo which sank in the ship and which was raised in her was when raised, 1,750*l.*; the value of that previously taken out was 7,000*l.* The amount of the whole freight by the charter-party was 475*l.*, and upon the portion of goods sunk 237*l.* 10*s.*; the whole net freight was 75*l.* The questions that were left to the jury were: whether there was a constructive total loss of the vessel, first, at the time when Mr. Amos gave notice to Broad & Sons that the plaintiff abandoned her, or, secondly, at the time she lay moored after being raised, both of which questions were answered in the affirmative. In putting these questions to the jury no account was taken of any liability on the part of the cargo or freight to contribute in a general average towards the expenses of raising the vessel or towards the general average loss at sea; and it is to be taken as a fact that if such liability for either loss ought to have been taken into calculation and the estimate of the cost of raising and repairing ought to have been reduced by the amount of the general average to be so contributed, then that there was not a constructive total loss.

11. The Court or Court of Appeal were to be at liberty to draw inferences of fact in the same way as a jury would be entitled to do.

The questions for the opinion of the Court were: first, whether the plaintiff is under the above circumstances entitled to recover on the policy against the defendant as for an absolute total loss as distinguished from a constructive total loss.

And if the Court should answer the above question in the negative, then Secondly, whether it was material in determining the question of constructive total loss to take into account the liability, if any such existed, of the cargo and freight to make a general average contribution towards the expenses of raising the ship or towards the general average loss at sea.

Thirdly, whether the notice of abandonment was given too late.

If the Court should be of opinion that the plaintiff was entitled to retain the verdict, then judgment was to be entered for the plaintiff for the amount of the verdict with costs of suit. If otherwise, there was to be judgment for the defendant with costs of suit.

The case was argued (Easter Term, May 2nd) by E. James, for the plaintiff, and Cohen (Brett with him), for the defendant.

Watkin Williams, for the plaintiff, was heard in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

The following judgments were delivered on the 13th of June.—

SHEE, J.—Having had the advantage of reading the judgment of my Brother Blackburn, I refer generally for the facts on which our opinion is asked to his statement of them, and to the statement in the case.

In the law laid down by him as the result of a great number of differently worded and variously illustrated decisions—Irving v. Manning (1), Parry v. Aberdeen (2), Benson v. Chapman (3), Moss v. Smith (4), Gardner v. Salvador (5) and Rosetto v. Gurney (6)—on the questions of abandonment and constructive total loss, I so entirely concur, that I think it better to adopt the language which he has used than to attempt any further elucidation of the principle which it establishes.

If my judgment could prevail, the plaintiff would retain his verdict. I differ with my learned Brother rather upon the inferences to be drawn from the facts submitted to us, and upon the application to them of the law, than upon the law itself.

On the first question, viz., whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover as for an absolute total loss as distinguished from a constructive total loss, my answer is, no. It was not impossible to raise, or when raised, to repair the ship. There was a chance of raising her in a condition which might enable her after repairs had been done to her to be used as a ship. Subsisting as she did in specie under the control of the assured, and not being in danger of immediate destruction, it would have been inexcusable to have sold her and to have allowed her to be removed in fragments as a wreck, or to have sold her as a wreck when raised, without giving to the underwriters, by notice of abandonment, the opportunity of electing whether they would incur the expense of raising and repairing her. We can, as it seems to me, consistently with the decisions—Anderson v. Royal Exchange Assurance Company (7), Stewart v. Greenock Marine Insurance Company (8), Fleming v. Smith (9) and Knight v. Faith (10)—within the range of which the facts before us lie, give but one answer to this question, viz., that the ship as she lay submerged at Falmouth, and when moored in dock after she had been raised, was not an absolute total loss.

To the second question proposed to us, viz., whether it was material in determining the question of constructive total loss to take into account the liability, if any such existed, of the cargo and freight to make a general average towards the expenses of raising the ship or towards the general average loss at sea, my answer is also in the negative. It is admitted that, regard being had to the cost of raising the ship, the cost of repairing her when raised, and her probable value when repaired, she was constructively a total loss on the 4th of December, when the plaintiff informed the Messrs. Broad that he abandoned her, and also when moored in dock after she had been raised; unless the liability of the freight and cargo to contribute to the general average loss at sea, and of the freight and cargo to contribute in a general average to the cost of raising her, or either of them, were, in determining the question whether she was constructively a total loss, proper items of deduction from the outlay necessary to raise and repair her.

First, as to the general average loss at sea. A voluntary sacrifice of part of the ship and of her apparel having been made for the aversion of the common danger, to which ship, freight, and cargo were exposed, the assured on ship had a claim against his insurers for the share of that loss chargeable to ship, and also for the share, should it not have been paid to him, chargeable to the cargo, they on payment of this latter share being subrogated to the assured on ship as respects his claim for it upon his co-contributories to the general average—Pothier, Contrat d'Assurance, Nos. 52, 164; Marshall on Insurance, 5th edit. p. 435.

Such portion of the money value of the assured's share of the general average contribution as had not been expended on the repairs before the final disaster, would, as a claim upon his insurers, merge and be absorbed in the subsequent loss, if total, occasioned by that disaster—Marshall on Insurance, 5th edit. 435, Le Cheminant v. Pearson (11), Stewart v. Steele (12) and Livie v. Jamson (13); such portion of it, as had been expended on repairs which had become valueless by reason of fresh damage done by the final disaster to the parts repaired, would have to be expended again, if a resolution to repair had been taken; such portion as had been actually expended on repairs which enured to the benefit of the ship after the final disaster must be taken, on these findings, to have been considered in the estimate of the repairs which would be required for her restoration; so that no portion of the indemnity recoverable by the shipowner from his insurers in respect of his ship's share of the general average loss at sea could come in aid of his liability on contracts for raising or repairing the ship. The same observations apply to such portion of the share of the general average contribution chargeable to the cargo, as before the final disaster had been expended on repairs which had become valueless by reason of fresh damage done to the parts repaired, or which still enuring to the ship's benefit after the final disaster, must be taken to have been considered in the estimate of the required repairs on which the resolution to abandon was based.

Whether the cost of raising the ship, if she had been raised by the plaintiff, would have been the subject of a general average or not, is a question which it is impossible, as I read the statement before us, to answer affirmatively, uninformed as we are of the state of things as respects ship, freight and cargo, in which, and the intention with which, the cost would have been incurred. Extraordinary expenses, submitted to by the master of a ship, under the urgent pressure of a well-founded fear or moral certainty, should they not be submitted to, of total loss of ship, freight, and cargo—(Emerigon, c. 12. s. 39, Benecke, pp. 191, 192, Baily on General Average, p. 15)—all of them being in equal peril of perishing, may,—so far as such expenses serve to avert a danger threatening the whole concern, and are not incurred to repair or diminish an already existing loss,—as well found a claim for general average contribution, as the jettison of goods or the cutting away of masts and cables (Benecke, pp. 214, 215). But the right to contribution by way of general average has no place where there has not been a voluntary sacrifice of property or money for the common safety in a danger imminent and common to the ship and the property in her. The mere circumstance that an outlay, absolutely indispensable to the continued existence of a ship as a ship, and to the earning of her stipulated freight, may incidentally be conducive also to the rescue of cargo remaining in the ship, but not in danger of perishing with the ship, would not impart to it the character of such a sacrifice. Expenses incurred by a shipowner with cargo on board, in keeping his ship afloat, or in restoring her to a condition of navigability, if they be the necessary consequence of an accomplished misfortune and not occasioned by, or the necessary consequence of a voluntary bestowal of his property, or of part of it, for the common safety, are incurred for his own benefit, to preserve his property, to enable him, by fulfilling his contract, to earn his freight, and can no more found a claim for general average contribution than the expense of hiring another ship to carry the cargo to its destination—Casaregis, Disc. 121, Nos. 16, 17, 18.

The distinction between extraordinary expenses incurred to repair or diminish a particular average loss, and extraordinary expenses incurred for or occasioned by a sacrifice for the common safety at a time when without them it would be morally impossible to avert a total loss of all the interests at risk—as in the case put by Benecke (pp. 215, 216), and on his authority and partly in his words, and with the intention probably of adopting and condensing the qualifications which restrict their meaning, by Mr. Arnould (vol. ii. p. 931, s. 340) of a stranded ship which, having sustained a particular average loss, "is in most cases in danger of being lost, unless speedy measures are taken for her preservation,"—is neatly precised in the words by which the enactment of Article 6, of the French Ordonnance de la Marine, liv. 3, tit. 7, 'Des Avaries' (14), is rectified and made conformable to principle in the corresponding Article 400 of the Code de Commerce, tit. 11, 'Des Avaries.' In the former "the cost of floating a ship," in the latter "the cost of floating a ship stranded with the intention of averting a total loss," is declared to be general average.

The case before us, though combining a particular average loss to ship, with probably a particular average loss to cargo, does not, unless we import into it intentions on the part of the shipowner, which appear not to have influenced him, and danger to the cargo which does not appear to have been apprehended, differ in the principle of its decision from the case cited in the insurance books from the Digest, of the freighted ship, which having sustained a heavy average loss in her voyage to Ostia was compelled to put into Hippo, and there incur expenses which were necessary for her own safety to enable her to reach her destination and deliver her cargo in good condition. It was urged in that case that the owners of the cargo ought to contribute to make good the damage which the ship had sustained, but the decision was against the shipowner, "because the expenses had been incurred rather for the benefit of the ship than the preservation of the cargo." "Hic enim sumptus instruendæ magis navis quam conservandarum mercium gratiâ factus est," Digest, lib. 14, tit. 2, 'De Leg. Rhod. de Jactu,' Art. 6. The shipowner must raise his ship or hire another, or lose his freight, it is his affair, and his only. The charges in such a misfortune of unloading, housing, drying, and reloading the cargo, fall in like manner upon the owner of it. (Benecke, pp. 191—194.)

kind in port would be converted into a general average. The shipper who has a right under his contract to have a sea-borne carriage provided for the conveyance of his goods from the place of their shipment to the place of their destination, would, in addition to the agreed freight, have to bear part of the expense to which by the very nature of the service and of the instrument by which it is rendered, the shipowner is engaged; and as goods contribute to a general average, not according to their weight, but according to their value (a provision perfectly just when all are in equal danger of total loss—Benecke, p. 193), merchandise of bulk and weight so small as to offer no impediment to the raising of a ship, or none that would not yield to a small increase of mechanical power, might be burthened with a principal share of the cost of raising her, although, regard being had to her age, class, previous condition, and present employment, it would be madness, on the part of her owner, not to incur the expense of raising her so as to enable her to arrive at her destination, earn her freight, and be afterwards useful as a ship.

In the case before us, the ship, having escaped the dangers which necessitated the sacrifice of part of her apparel at sea, and while moored in safety to the pier at Falmouth, was assailed by a hurricane, during the raging of which she foundered. The damage caused by this disaster to ship and cargo was a particular average to each of them, to be borne separately by the several owners of each. No case for contribution between them could arise, unless some new sacrifice was made to obviate and avert what but for such sacrifice would be the great probability of further disaster to ship and cargo, involving the total loss of both of them.

Whether the cargo was irreparably damaged by its submersion, or not damaged at all—averaged only to the extent of the cost of raising it alone, or of the cost above the value of the ship when raised, of raising the cargo with and in the ship,—in danger of absolute total loss, or certain to be recovered in the early and necessary operation of removing the submerged ship from the pier side,—is not stated, nor to what extent the freight to be earned by the shipowner was imperilled by the loss, should it prove one, of his ship. With the exception of the fact, that the ship had gone down during the sway of exceptionally violent winds over waters usually tranquil,—in itself a strong prima facie objection to a claim for general average contribution,—we are informed of no circumstance which might lead us to the conclusion that such motives for incurring the expense of raising the ship could have existed, as might convert what in its nature was a particular average into a general average outlay. Benecke says, in the context (p. 216) of the passage interwoven by Mr. Arnould with his statement of the law on this point, that “if the charges of floating a ship exceed the value which is saved by it to the shipowner, and the measure be deliberately adopted to avoid the losses and expenses to which stranded goods are frequently exposed, the surplus of the charges of floating the ship above the value saved to the shipowner ought to be borne by the cargo,” but that “the charge of floating can in no case be the subject of general average.” The latter part of the passage is more roundly worded than on reference to other passages already cited from his chapter on average, it seems probable that he could have intended. I read it as the expression of a general rule, subject to the exceptions which he had before indicated. The rule applies to the facts before us, and there is nothing in them which could in my judgment have brought the cost of raising the ship in question within any admissible exception to it.

The statement, on which we are asked to answer the second question put to us, presents in truth (though the disaster occurred in a place protected from all but extraordinary sea risks, and where appliances for ships' rescue may be supposed to have been abundant), a case of shipwreck, in the event of which according to Casaregis (15),—the highest authority on such questions, and according to other authorities whom he cites (Van Leewen and De Vicq ad Tractatum Quintini Weytsen de Avariis, par. 45), (16), his and their opinions having been adopted by later writers of nearly equal weight,—there is no room for general average contribution. If we were to come to a different conclusion, our judgment might be cited in support of the position, that the cost of raising a ship submersed in port with cargo of whatever kind on board, is always to be made good to the shipowner by a general average, no matter how certain the rescue of the cargo by other means may be, how little damage it will sustain from a short delay, and as respects the ship's freight how practicable and inexpensive to hire another ship in which to carry the cargo to its destination,—that the mere fact, in fine, that the property saved benefits by an act out of the ordinary course of a ship's service is alone sufficient to justify the allowance in general average of the loss caused by the act or by the expense attending it—(Baily on Average, p. 10).

Nor does the theory on which such a contention must rest better recommend itself as the story of the disaster proceeds. The ship was raised with the cargo in her, not by the shipowner or the master acting for the common safety of the ship and cargo, but by persons officiously rescuing, as salvors, and possessing themselves of the rescued property in the hope of reward from those whom it might eventually concern. The expenses incurred by them were surely not general average, apportionable between ship, freight, and cargo, of none of which had a sacrifice been made in time of danger for the common safety, and surely were the subject of distinct and separate claims, secured by separate liens on the ship and on the cargo respectively. If the master in discharge of his duty to keep the ship and cargo water-borne had raised the ship, he would have been entitled to no reward for doing so, and could have charged the cargo for no portion of the expense of which it was not the special and particular cause. The ship and cargo having been raised by strangers, they would be entitled to a reward, and would have a lien for it on each of the subjects saved, redeemable by a payment to be assessed on a fair consideration of the skill, money, time, and labour expended upon, and of the value of, each of these subjects. The ingredients of a salvage service, not contracted for or rendered in time of danger, are not the same as of a general average act. The former cannot, after the service done, be converted into the latter by agreement between the salvors and the owners of one of the subjects saved; nor are the charges which attach to the subjects saved apportionable between them on the principle of a general average.

If I could feel sure, after reading the judgment of my Brother Blackburn, that this view of the second question as respects the point of general average for raising the ship was correct, and that we are not bound to assume a general average intention, if such intention might, though we are not informed of it, have existed, it would be unnecessary to consider, whether supposing the cost of raising the ship were the subject of a general average contribution, the share of it chargeable to the cargo ought to be taken into account, as an item of deduction, in determining whether a constructive total loss had taken place. In my opinion, however, it would not be a proper item of deduction.

The subject of insurance had sustained a particular average loss by perils of the sea, the measure of which loss as between the assured on ship and his insurers was the cost (although the cargo may have accidentally benefited by it—Watson v. the Marine Insurance Company (17),) of raising the ship and of repairing the ship's damage which the accident had occasioned. That loss, whether partial only or constructively total, fell at once upon the underwriters on ship. In the latter case nothing that occurred afterwards (the ship being in fact unworthy of the cost of raising and repairing her, and abandonment being duly made) could, as respects them, alter its character or vary their liability for it.

Supposing, however, that the intention with which the outlay, necessitated by the submersion of the ship was incurred, could transform what was a particular average loss into a general average loss from its inception, or that we were at liberty, regardless of what had already happened (the ship and cargo as they lay submerged being in imminent danger of destruction), to consider the resolution to raise the ship as the starting-point, and the outlay required for that purpose as a sacrifice by the ship-owner for the common safety,—in determining whether as between the assured on ship, not being also owner of the cargo, and his insurers, a loss constructively total had taken place, the liability of the cargo to contribute to the general average would not be an allowable item in diminution of the estimate of expenses, on the amount of which the question of partial only or of constructively total loss would depend. The assured, having sustained a loss of the subject of insurance by the perils insured against, had a right to look for his indemnity from the person who had engaged to indemnify him, without troubling himself with any remedies over against third parties. He was not bound on the occurrence of a misfortune involving a loss of the subject insured, so probably total as this must have been considered by Mr. Amos, and appears from the statement before us to have been, to expend his money on the chance of being reimbursed a part of it by a satisfactory adjustment of general average at Rio de Janeiro, should the cargo be safely delivered there out of the crippled ship. He had paid his premium for the option under such circumstances of calling upon his insurers to bear that risk,—of disentangling his own capital from the disaster, and of surrendering to them (they paying him as for a total loss) his ship, and all the rights and liabilities attaching to the ownership of it. This seems to me clear on principle and on authority — Pothier, Traité du Contrat d'Assurance, No. 52, 164, Emerigon, c. 12. s. 44, Marshall on Insurance, 5th edit. p. 435, 2 Phillips on Insurance, pp. 127, 128, 2nd edit. It has been so decided repeatedly by Judges of the highest eminence, and among them by Kent and Story in the Courts of the United States—Magrath v. Church (18), Vandenheuvel v. United Insurance Company (19), Watson v. the Marine Insurance Company (17), Jumel v. the Marine Insurance Company (20), and Potter v. the Providence Washington Insurance Company (21). There would be no really useful indemnity for the assured were it otherwise. If a total loss of the subject of insurance has actually taken place, its insurers must pay its real or agreed value; if a total loss of the subject of insurance has constructively taken place, they must pay its real or agreed value and make the most of the salvage ceded to them, and of the rights against third parties which attach to it.

Apart from the question of general average, I cannot think that any share of the cost of raising the ship which the Messrs. Broad or the plaintiff, after the adoption by him of their act, might consider chargeable to the cargo raised in the ship, would be an admissible item of deduction in considering whether a constructive total loss of ship had taken place. Between the owners of the ship and their insurers, the fact that the ship and the cargo might together be worth the cost of raising them and of repairing the ship, could not, in my judgment, operate to make the loss on ship less than total, if the ship separately was not worth the cost of raising and repairing her.

The engagement of the underwriter is, that the thing which he insures shall, with reasonable repairs and expenses for which he undertakes, should they be rendered necessary by the perils insured against, reach its destination capable of being used as the thing which it was when the risk commenced, or that he will bear the loss of it. His contract is to indemnify the assured against the loss of the subject of insurance, or the damage which it shall sustain by the perils insured against; his liability does not extend to, and is not limited by the loss which the assured shall sustain in consequence of his being the owner of the subject of insurance—Reimer v. Ringrose (22) and Baily on Perils of the Sea, pp. 33-34.—I see nothing in the case of Moss v. Smith (4) inconsistent with this view, but much by implication in support of it. A loss of freight was there claimed from an underwriter on freight, because the ship had sustained damage, the repair of which though it would have cost very much less than the value of the ship when repaired, would have cost more than the freight she was in the course of earning; to which it was properly answered that the loss contended for was a loss of freight as incident to the ship, and that the ship being practically repairable its incident the freight could not be lost. It has none but a remote and distinguishable bearing on a case in which the ship itself by the perils insured against had become unworthy of the cost of raising and repairing her. Apply what Maule, J. and Lord Truro said to ship and cargo instead of ship and freight, and Moss v. Smith (4) will be found to fail at every point as an authority governing this case. No doubt, as Lord Mansfield said in Hamilton v. Mendes (23), "It is repugnant to a contract of indemnity to recover as for a total loss, when the final event has determined that the damnification is, in truth, an average, or perhaps no loss at all;" but Lord Mansfield was there dealing with the case of a single subject, a ship re-captured and safe before action brought; his words are not applicable to the case of two distinct subjects, the property of different owners damaged by the same disaster, as to one of which the question is, whether, not being at the time of its abandonment, or ever after, reasonably worth the cost of raising and repairing it, it was then constructively a total loss.

On the third question, whether the notice of abandonment was given too late, my opinion under all the circumstances of this case is, that the abandonment, on the 9th of December, the date of the notice given by Messrs. Davis to the defendant, was in time. It is enough if notice of abandonment be given within a reasonable delay, and reasonable or not is a question for a jury, and upon this case, for us—Anderson v. the Royal Exchange Assurance Company (7) and Kelly v. Walton (24).

My judgment, therefore, upon the whole matter would be for the plaintiff; but as it does not agree with the judgment of my Brother Blackburn, I withdraw it, and judgment will be entered for the defendant.

BLACKBURN, J.—It appears from the statement in the case, that the ship Chebucto was insured in a valued policy in the ordinary form for 1,500*l*.

She sailed with a general cargo on board, and on her voyage sustained damage such as to require repairs. Part of the damage thus incurred was such as to be the subject of general average. The ship put into Falmouth for repairs, and was moored with part of her cargo on board, the residue being on shore, and the repairs were commenced, but not completed. When in this state, she was, on the 2nd of December, sunk by a peril of the sea, and lay submerged with the portion of the cargo on board. Whilst she lay so submerged the agent of the assured, Mr. Amos, came to the conclusion (as is stated in paragraph 7. of the case) that to raise and repair the ship would cost more than she was worth. The ship's agents, Messrs. Broad & Sons, were of a different opinion, and acting on their own responsibility, and not as agents of the assured, they did, in fact, raise the ship with the portion of cargo on board.

On the 9th of December, after Broad & Sons had commenced raising the ship, but before that operation was completed, the assured gave notice of abandonment. The plaintiffs claimed as for a total loss; the underwriters paid money into court as for a partial loss, and it appears to have been agreed between the parties that the payment was sufficient unless the loss was total. It appears also to have been agreed between them, that if the fact that there would be a claim for contribution against the cargo on board the submerged vessel, which cargo would be raised by the same operation as raised the hull, and which would be saved along with the hull, was to be taken into account, there was no total loss. And it seems also to have been agreed between the parties, that if the fact that part of the sea damage which necessitated the repairs was the subject of general average was to be taken into account, there was no total loss. But it seems to have been contended by the underwriters, that even if both these facts were to be discarded as immaterial, the circumstances were not such as to constitute what is called a constructive total loss.

The arrangement made at the trial appears to have been that the opinion of the jury should be taken on this disputed question of fact, and that, subject to their finding, the case should be reserved for the Court. The case is by no means clearly stated; but I think that what I have stated above is the effect of the statement in paragraph 10, that the learned Judge left to the jury the question whether there was a constructive total loss at the time when the vessel was submerged, and the assured's agent determined not to raise her, or, after she was raised, and the jury found both these questions in favour of the plaintiff; but in putting these questions to the jury no account was taken of any liability on the part of the cargo or freight to contribute in general average towards the expenses of raising the vessel or towards the general average loss at sea; and it is to be taken as a fact that if such liability for either loss ought to have been taken into calculation, and the estimate of the cost of raising and repairing ought to have been reduced by the amount of general average to be so contributed, then that there was not a constructive total loss.

Some questions are raised as to the effect of the lateness of the notice of abandonment, on which I think it unnecessary to come to any determination, as I come to the conclusion that on this statement there never was such a state of things as could amount to a total loss, whatever notice of abandonment was given. In coming to this conclusion, I do not regard the general average incurred at sea, but proceed entirely on the ground that, as I understood the statement in the case, the cost of raising the submerged ship and cargo, though it would have been excessive, having regard to the value of the unrepaid ship alone, was reasonable, having regard to the value of the ship and cargo and freight, which were jointly saved by this expenditure from a common jeopardy.

The case contains a statement of the value of the submerged cargo, which in fact was raised by the same operation as raised the hull; but as it states neither the value of the hull itself nor the cost of raising it, this statement is valueless: but I will suppose a state of figures, to illustrate what I understand to be meant by the statement in the case. Let us suppose the expense of raising the ship with the portion of her cargo on board to have been 600*l.*, that the further repairs necessary would be 700*l.*, that the value of the ship when repaired would be 1,200*l.*, and that the value of the portion of the cargo raised and saved along with the ship is 1,500*l.* I leave out the freight, which would only complicate the statement without altering the principle. Now, inasmuch as the value of the portion of cargo saved is, on these figures, three times the value of the unrepaid hull, and the two were saved by the expenditure of 600*l.*, if that 600*l.* is to be charged as general average against the ship and the portion of cargo saved, 150*l.* would be chargeable to the ship and 450*l.* against the portion of cargo saved by this expenditure. Now, it is plain that on this state of figures, if the fact that cargo was on board is disregarded, there was a total loss; for in that view a ship worth 1,200*l.* would cost 600*l.* to raise her and 700*l.* to repair her, together 1,300*l.*, which is more than she is worth; but if the fact that cargo is there, which would be saved and contribute to the expense of raising, is taken into account, there is no total loss, for it would then stand that a ship worth 1,200*l.* and a cargo worth 1,500*l.*, together 2,700*l.*, would be saved by the expenditure of 1,300*l.*, of which 450*l.* would be separately chargeable to the cargo, and 800*l.* separately chargeable to the ship. Whether, therefore, the ship and cargo were considered together or separately, they would be well worth the expenditure required to rescue them from loss.

It is on construing the statement in the case as submitting one similar in principle to that which would arise on the figures here given that I have come to the conclusion, that the defendant is entitled to judgment; and after having carefully considered my Brother Shee's reasons for the opposite opinion, I still think so for the following reasons.—

It is first necessary to consider whether, if the shipowner had in this case raised the ship and cargo as Messrs. Broad & Son did, they would have been entitled to charge that expense as general average against the portion of cargo raised by its expenditure as well as against the hull.

In order to give rise to a charge as general average, it is essential that there should be a voluntary sacrifice to preserve more subjects than one exposed to a common jeopardy; but an extraordinary expenditure incurred for that purpose is as much a sacrifice as if, instead of money being expended for the purpose, money's worth were thrown away. It is immaterial whether the shipowner sacrifices a cable or an anchor to get the ship off a shoal, or pays the worth of it to hire those extra services which get her off. It is quite true, that so long as the expenditure by the shipowner is merely such as he should incur in the fulfilment of his ordinary duty as shipowner, it cannot be general average; but the expenditure in raising a submerged vessel with cargo is extraordinary expenditure, and is, if incurred to save the cargo as well as the ship (which prima facie is the object of such an expenditure), chargeable against all the subjects in jeopardy saved by this expenditure.

In the last edition of Arnould on Insurance, vol. 2, pp. 981–2, section 340, it is said, "A stranded vessel is, in most cases, in danger of being lost, unless speedy steps are taken for her preservation, either by unloading the cargo to lighten her, or by endeavouring to float her by means of buoys, &c., with the cargo in her. The remuneration which the shipowner is obliged to pay for the services thus rendered gives a claim to general average contribution, provided such services shall appear to have been incurred for the joint benefit of ship and cargo, which will be the case if ship and cargo are both exposed to a common danger, and both saved from it by the exertions employed for their rescue." This, I apprehend, is a perfectly accurate statement of the law.

In the present case, the greater part of the cargo was on shore and safe before the ship was submerged, but the extraordinary expenditure necessary to save the ship and the portion of the cargo on board would have been chargeable as general average as against them, though not as against the part that was safe—see Moran v. Jones (25). I do not mean to say that, in every case where a ship with cargo is submerged, and the two are, in fact, raised together by one operation, the expenditure incurred must necessarily be for the common preservation of both. I think it is in every case a question of fact whether it was so; and if the cargo could be easily and cheaply taken out of the ship, and saved by itself, it would not be proper to charge it with any portion of the joint operation which, in that case, would not be incurred for the preservation of the cargo. But it must be rather an exceptional case in which, where a vessel lies under twenty feet of water at low tide, the cargo can be easily, or indeed at all, taken out of her hold without either raising the ship with the cargo, or destroying the hull for the purpose of getting the cargo out. If the contention of the assured at the trial had been that such an exceptional course was, in this case, practicable and the proper one, the question would have been left to the jury, or the facts agreed upon, so that we might draw the proper inference of fact from them. Instead of doing so, the only fact bearing on this question stated, is that Messrs. Broad & Sons did, in fact, raise the ship with the cargo on board. As they could have no interest, except to save the imperilled subjects in the proper way, so that they might be entitled to charge their outlay against them as salvage, I think the inference to be drawn from this fact is, that the mode adopted was the proper one, and I should, if necessary, draw that inference. But I think, from the way the case is stated, that it appears to have been agreed between the parties, that the expense of raising the ship and cargo was, in fact, general average, and, as such, chargeable, in fact, on the cargo, if in law it could be so.

I shall now proceed to consider the question, whether the circumstance that the expense of raising the ship and cargo would be partly borne by the cargo, ought to have been taken into consideration in determining whether there was what is commonly called a constructive total loss. A contract of marine insurance is a contract to indemnify against loss by certain perils; and if the subject-matter of insurance is totally lost in consequence of those perils, the assured is entitled to recover as for a total loss: if it is only partially lost, the assured is only entitled to recover for a partial loss.

It frequently happens that by the perils insured against, the subject-matter of the insurance is so far damaged that it cannot be preserved without outlay on repairs or other ways, but may be preserved by such outlay; or that it is by perils insured against taken out of the possession of the assured, but that they can recover the possession by exertions and expenditure; or it may be, as in the present case, that both facts exist, the subject-matter is taken out of the possession of the assured, and sunk in a damaged state, but can by expenditure be raised, and then can by further expenditure be repaired. In all such cases the assured may, if he pleases, elect to incur the expenditure, and save the subject-matter, and in that case it will be a partial loss only; or he may offer to abandon the whole to the underwriters, and, if they accept the abandonment, it will be a total loss, the underwriters being subrogated for the assured, and entitled to all salvage and every other right of the assured. Or, lastly, the circumstances may be such that though the underwriters refuse to accept the abandonment, the assured may elect to treat it as a total loss, and force them to indemnify him for it as such; in which case, on principles of equity not confined to marine insurance, they are subrogated for him whom they have indemnified, and have all his rights—Randal v. Cockran (26), Yates v. Whyte (27).

If it were possible to work out the insurance, so as to make it in practice a perfect indemnity, it would be the same thing in the pecuniary result whether the assured repaired or abandoned the subject-matter; but it is not possible so to work it out, and, in general, it is for the benefit of the assured to treat a loss as total, and this is peculiarly the case where the policy is a valued one. It therefore becomes a very important subject of inquiry, under what circumstances the assured has a right, against the will of the insurers, to treat the loss as total. Up to the present time I believe there is no difference in the principles on which the law of insurance is administered in this and in foreign countries; and the decisions of foreign jurists are entitled to great weight. Many of those authorities cited by my Brother Shee are authorities in support of positions I have laid down. I do not think it necessary to examine or cite them at length, as those principles are not now in controversy between us. But on the part of the case which I am proceeding to argue, there is a fundamental difference between the law of insurance as administered in America and as administered in England.

In America, if the subject-matter of insurance sustain damage to the extent beyond 50 per cent., the assured may abandon and recover as for a total loss. This is an implied part of the American contract; and, unless there be something expressed which excludes this implication, the assured has this right; and that right depends on the state of things when the abandonment was given, and is not altered by any subsequent change in the state of things. But this is not the English law. In 2 Phillips on Insurance, § 1536, it is said, "This rule of abandonment on account of loss over 50 per cent. of the value of the subject, makes the most material difference between the American and the English jurisprudence relative to total loss and abandonment, and is to be kept in mind in examining the decisions of the tribunals of the two countries. It extends equally to ship, cargo, and freight. This rule and that rule in the United States whereby the validity of the abandonment is tested by the circumstances existing at the time of making it, instead of the time of bringing the suit, as in England, give a wider range to the constructive total loss and abandonment in the United States, and consequently an increased liability of underwriters for loss by the agents who have charge of the insured subject." I do not think that any American cases, based on principles so different from ours, are authorities in an English case. I shall therefore, with great deference to my Brother Shee, who relies upon several cases in the United States, refrain from examining them, and rely only on the English decisions.

It is now finally settled in England by the decision of the House of Lords in Irving v. Manning (1), "that the question of loss, whether total or not, is to be determined just as if there was no policy at all." If the subject-matter is by the underwriters' perils put in such a situation that, supposing there was no policy, it would be totally lost to its owner, then as between the assured and the underwriter there is a total loss, not otherwise. And the question whether the thing is lost to the owner is to be treated in a practical business-like spirit; and if the owners cannot by any means which they or their representative the captain can reasonably use be saved, then it is totally lost; but if by any reasonable means which were reasonably within their reach they might redeem the subject-matter, and do not do so, the total loss is not attributable to the perils which cast the subject-matter of insurance into that position, but to the neglect of the owners to take those reasonable means. If they do not take those means, "they cannot make the loss total by their own neglect"—Thornely v. Hebson (28), as explained by Lord Tenterden in Parry v. Aberdeen (2). "The duty of the master in case of damage to the ship is to do all that can be done towards bringing the adventure to a successful termination, to repair the ship, if there be a reasonable prospect of doing so at an expense not ruinous, and to bring home the cargo and earn the freight if possible"—Benson v. Chapman (3). The underwriters do not by their contract engage to indemnify against the consequences of his neglect to perform that duty. The question, however, whether it is possible, must be understood in the sense in which it is explained by Maule, J. in Moss v. Smith (29): "In matters of business a thing is said to be impossible when it is not practicable, and a thing is impracticable when it can only be done at an excessive or unreasonable cost. A man may be said to have lost a shilling when he has dropped it into deep water, though it may be possible by some very expensive contrivance to recover it." I may add, to complete the illustration, that a diamond of great value would not be totally lost if dropped into water from whence it would cost 10*l.* to recover it, though a shilling in the same position would be totally lost.

(26) 1 Ves. sen. 98.

When a ship or other subject-matter of insurance is in such a situation that it can be saved, but only by an excessive expenditure, the assured may undoubtedly (at least if they give notice of abandonment in due time) treat it as a total loss and recover for it as such. In Knight v. Faith (30) Lord Campbell expressed a strong opinion that it was essential that there should be such a notice, and that the owner of the shilling at the bottom of the well could not, without what would in his case be an idle ceremony, recover as for a total loss. If it were necessary for the decision in this case to determine that point, my doubt would be, whether I was not bound in a Court below to follow that as the latest decision, and to reserve for a Court of Error the question whether he was right in that opinion; but it is unnecessary to come to any determination on this point: for all the English authorities agree that unless the circumstances are such as to make the loss total within the principle expounded by Maule, J., in Moss v. Smith (29), no notice of abandonment can make it so; and also that even if the circumstances were such that at the time the notice of abandonment was given it was justified, yet if by subsequent events before an action brought, the plaintiff might by reasonable means obtain the thing, he can only recover for a partial loss. As was stated by Holroyd, J., in Brotherton v. Barber (31), "Abandonment has its origin from the contract being a contract of indemnity. But it is apparent that if the assured might abandon at his pleasure, he might be a gainer to a much greater extent than the value of the loss; which is inconsistent with a contract of indemnity." . . . "As events have made it at the time when the action was brought, it is but a partial loss." See also Naylor v. Taylor (32).

The question, whether it is practicable to save the subject-matter within the meaning of the phrase as explained by Maule, J., in Moss v. Smith (29), has been differently left to the jury. In Gardner v. Salvador (5) Bayley J. left it to the jury to say whether "by means within the reach of the captain which he could reasonably use" the ship could be saved. The mode of putting the question generally adopted has been to ask "whether a prudent uninsured owner would have done it." In Rosetto v. Gurney (33), the Court, approving of what had been said by Maule, J. in Moss v. Smith (29), state the rule thus: "If the damage is reparable the loss is total or partial according to circumstances. If the damage cannot be repaired without laying out more money than the thing is worth, the reparation is impracticable, and therefore as between the underwriters and the assured impossible." The three modes of expression all seem to me to convey the same idea. No means which would cost more than the object is worth can be considered reasonable, and a prudent uninsured owner would not adopt them. But if the means within his reach would cost less than the object is worth, a prudent uninsured owner would adopt them rather than suffer the thing to perish; though a prudent insured owner, especially if insured in a valued policy, would probably act otherwise, if the law permitted him by so doing to recover from the underwriters for a total loss.

I should observe that I think, in the present case, the question whether there was a total loss at the time when the ship lay submerged, and that whether there was a total loss when she lay moored at Falmouth in the custody of Messrs. Broad & Sons, are identically the same. Whilst the ship lay submerged, it was a question of calculation what the cost of raising her would be; but before the trial Messrs. Broad & Sons had by experiment ascertained what it was, and the assured could have got their ship by adopting their act, and paying them for what they had done; and then the assured would have been exactly in the same position as if they had themselves originally raised her.

In considering whether it was reasonable to raise the ship and cargo in the present case, I think that every circumstance tending to increase or diminish the necessary outlay, and every circumstance tending to increase or diminish the benefit to be derived from that outlay, ought to be taken into account; and, amongst those, the fact that cargo would be saved by the operation, and would contribute to the expense, seems to me a very important element.

The shipowner is not asked to advance money for the benefit of strangers on the security of their property; he is the authorized agent of the owners of the cargo, having the custody of it, and bound to save it if he can. It was contended on the argument that in considering whether the subject-matter of insurance was totally lost, we were bound to look to it, and to it alone; so that in the conceivable case of a ship, worth say 1,500*l.*, being in peril, with cargo on board also worth 1,500*l.*, which could be saved together by the expenditure of 2,000*l.* on one operation, the assured was entitled to consider both as totally lost, because neither singly was worth the sum which would save the two. If a long series of decisions had established this, we could not help it; but in truth from the time of Lord Mansfield it has been an established rule in assurance law that "if the thing in truth was safe, no artificial reasoning shall be allowed to set up a total loss"—Hamilton v. Mendes (34); and the only case in which a point like this was ever attempted to be set up was Moss v. Smith (29). In that case, the attempt totally failed. Maule, J. explained the law in a manner to me perfectly satisfactory, and what I have written is in truth but an attempt to adapt his reasoning to the present case. Lord Truro, in the same case, said (35), "We are asked—would any man in his senses spend 1,000*l.* on the repair of a ship for the mere purpose of earning 500*l.* freight? To this I answer, certainly not. But this is not the true question. If by expending 1,000*l.* on repairs he gets not only 500*l.* but also a ship worth 3,000*l.*, who will for a moment question the prudence of the outlay?" This is an authority, as it seems to me, precisely in point, and agreeing with it as I do in principle, I think our judgment should be for the defendant.

I need hardly say that I should not adhere to this opinion against that of my Brother Shee, unless on consideration I entertained it decidedly; but I should regret much if my decision were to be final. That, however, is fortunately not so.

This Court being equally divided, there would be no judgment, unless one of the Judges withdrew his opinion in order that the case might go into error. It is the practice for the junior Judge in such a case to withdraw his judgment, and owing to the accident of my Brother Shee being junior to myself, the judgment will be entered for the defendant, leaving the plaintiff to appeal.

Judgment for the defendant.

COWLES v. POTTS.

Slander—Privileged Communication—Malice.

In an action of slander, laying special damage, it was proved that the plaintiff, a trustee of a charity, asked C, by whom he was employed as bailiff, to obtain signatures to a protest against his being turned out of the trusteeship. C. asked the defendant for his signature, which the defendant refused; and on being pressed to give his reasons, said that he would not keep a big rogue like the plaintiff in the trust; and he explained the reasons for his opinion, which were that the plaintiff had left the parish under discreditable circumstances and without settling with his creditors, including the defendant. He also added, that he was surprised that C. kept such a man on with his son. The whole of what was said about the plaintiff's character was said with reference to the discussion whether it was proper that he should be continued as a trustee of the charity. In consequence of what the defendant said, C. dismissed the plaintiff from his employment. The jury found that the defendant had not acted with malice:—Held, that, assuming the words were bona fide spoken with reference to the propriety of taking steps to retain the plaintiff in the trusteeship, as they were pertinent to the question whether he was fit to be trusted or not, they were to be regarded as a privileged communication, and therefore that the defendant was entitled to have the verdict entered for him.

The declaration alleged that the defendant falsely and maliciously spoke of the plaintiff the words following, that is to say, "I will never sign to keep a big rogue like Robert Cowles in the trust," (meaning a certain trust called Buckman's Charity, in the parish of, &c., whereof the plaintiff at the time the defendant spoke and published the above false and defamatory words was a trustee,) "as he has robbed me of two pounds. I will not vote to keep such a rogue and swindling thief like Robert Cowles in the trust" (meaning the said trust). "You will find him to be a big rogue before long." Whereby the plaintiff lost his situation as farm-bailiff in the employ of Charles Cooper, &c.

Plea, not guilty.

At the trial, at the Suffolk Summer Assizes, 1864, before Channell, B., it appeared, from the evidence on the part of the plaintiff, that the plaintiff was a trustee of a charity, called Buckman's Charity, and was also farm-bailiff to Mr. Cooper, a farmer at Kessingland. Some attempts had been made to remove the plaintiff from the trust, and as he was unwilling to resign he requested Mr. Cooper to obtain signatures from the inhabitants to a protest against his being turned out. In consequence of this request of the plaintiff, Mr. Cooper applied to the defendant to sign the protest. This the defendant refused to do, whereupon Cooper asked for his reasons for so refusing, when he said that he would not keep a big rogue like the plaintiff in the trust. Cooper further pressed him to explain the reason for his opinion, and he then said that the plaintiff had left the parish under discreditable circumstances, and without settling with his creditors, including the defendant. Cooper further stated that in consequence of what the defendant told him he dismissed the plaintiff. The defendant gave much the same account of the above conversation, but added, that, towards the end of it, he told Cooper that he was surprised that he kept such a man on with his son.

The learned Judge asked the jury whether the special damage resulted from the words spoken; what was the amount of damages to be given to the plaintiff; and also whether there was malice. He reserved for the Court the question whether the words were privileged or not. The jury found that the dismissal was in consequence of what the defendant said, and assessed the damages at 10*l.*; but they also found that there was no malice. The verdict was thereupon entered for the plaintiff.

A rule nisi was subsequently obtained, calling upon the plaintiff to shew cause why the verdict entered for him should not be set aside, and a verdict entered for the defendant, on the ground that the Judge ought to have held that the words were privileged.

O'Malley and Bulwer shewed cause against the rule (Easter Term, May 10).—

The Court cannot come to the conclusion that the learned Judge was wrong; the finding of the jury that the defendant acted without malice is unimportant, when it is considered that he said so much more than he was justified in saying under the circumstances, and that the jury have estimated the damages at 10*l.*, the dismissal of the plaintiff having resulted from the speaking of the words. Fryer v. Kinnerley (1) is an example of the class of cases which shew that though a simple statement may be privileged, the person who utters it may be liable to an action if he goes further and does not confine himself to a mere simple statement. There is no doubt that the jury intended to find for the plaintiff, and that their finding that there was no malice was a compromise. In Milne v. Marwood (2) the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiffs in an action for a false and fraudulent representation as to the value of a ship, but added that they acquitted the defendants of any fraudulent intention. A rule was obtained to enter the verdict for the defendants on that ground, but the Court refused to do so, and Maule, J. said, "I think it is quite clear that the jury meant to find a verdict for the plaintiffs; but they thought fit to add something to make it go down easily with the defendants." A man may be quite justified in stating facts, and in drawing a bond fide conclusion from them, but he must confine himself to doing so; instead of which the defendant, after stating that he would not keep a big rogue like the plaintiff in the trust, and giving his reasons for saying so, goes on to say that he was surprised that Cooper kept such a man on with his son. (They also referred to Martin v. Strong (3), Fairman v. Ives (4), Robertson v. M'Dougall (5), Godson v. Home (6), Somervill v.

Hawkins (7), Wenman v. Ash (8), Wright v. Woodgate (9), Tuson v. Evans (10) and Starkie on Libel, Preliminary Discourse, 87.

Keane and Markby, in support of the rule.—The jury have negatived malice, and there is nothing in what the defendant has said which can be considered as removing the case from the operation of the rule with regard to privileged communications. The fact of what the defendant said can only be used as evidence of malice subsequently—George v. Goddard (11), and the plaintiff cannot now contend that the finding of the jury is wrong upon that point. The inference to be drawn by the Court ought to be in favour of the defendant. He thought that the plaintiff was dishonest, and it is not pretended that what he said was not in confirmation of his original statement. The only questions in such a case are, first, is the occasion privileged? secondly, was the defendant abusing the privilege? Whether the defendant has acted maliciously or not is a question for the jury—Cooke v. Wildes (12); where the defendant, who was deputy clerk of the peace for the county of Kent, had written a letter to the finance committee of the county giving reasons why he had taken away from the plaintiff the business of printing the register of voters for the county; the letter contained libellous matter, and Lord Campbell, C.J., who tried the cause, thought that the occasion was privileged, but that the defendant had exceeded his privilege; but inasmuch as he did not leave the question of malice to the jury, the Court made a rule absolute for a new trial. The same rule was laid down in Toogood v. Spyring (13). It is difficult to understand the case of Fryer v. Kinnerley (1).

[BLACKBURN, J.—Before we give our judgment, we will consult my Brother Channell; but we think that the parties had better consider whether they might not do well in consenting to a stet processus.]

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the COURT (15) was now (May 13) delivered by BLACKBURN, J.—In this case the action was for words spoken to one Charles Cooper, imputing to the plaintiff that he was a rogue, in consequence of which the plaintiff lost his situation as servant to Cooper. Plea, not guilty. On the trial, before my Brother Channell, it appeared that the plaintiff was a trustee of some local charity; that it had been proposed to remove him from that trust, and that Cooper, to whom the plaintiff was then farm-bailiff, at the request and instance of the plaintiff, was canvassing for signatures to a protest against his being turned out of the trust; Cooper requested the defendant to sign this protest; and he, having refused to do so, was pressed to give his reasons, and gave them, namely, that he would not keep a big rogue like the plaintiff in the trust; being further pressed, he explained the reasons for this opinion, which were that the plaintiff had left the parish under discreditable circumstances, and without settling with his creditors, including the defendant, so that it was plain that the words were used in a sense disparaging to the plaintiff, but not actionable without special damage. Cooper gave evidence that he in consequence of these words dismissed the plaintiff, not wishing as he said to have him near his son, a boy of about 18. At the close of the plaintiff's case, the defendant's counsel submitted that there was no case, as the words were privileged by the occasion. The learned Judge said that he should reserve the question for the Court above, and in the meantime leave to the jury the two questions whether the special damage did result from the words spoken, and the amount of damages, and also (in case the Court should think the words privileged by the occasion) whether there was malice. The defendant's counsel then called witnesses, and amongst others the defendant himself, whose account of the conversation with Cooper did not materially differ from that given by the plaintiff's witnesses, except the defendant stated that towards the end of the conversation, he told Cooper that he (the defendant) was surprised that he kept such a man as the plaintiff on with his son. The jury found that the dismissal was in consequence of the slander uttered by the defendant, and assessed the damage at 10*l.*; but they negatived malice. The verdict was then entered for the plaintiff, with leave to move to enter a verdict for the defendant if the Judge ought to have held that the words were privileged. A rule nisi was obtained accordingly, which was argued before my Brothers Mellor and Shee and myself, during last term.

During the argument a doubt occurred to some of us whether the words, which, according to the defendant's own account, he had spoken as to his surprise that Cooper should keep the plaintiff near his son, were not so disjoined from the discussion about the trusteeship as not to be privileged, whatever might be the case with regard to the other words; but on reference to the learned Judge, we are informed that the whole of what was said about the plaintiff's character, was said with reference to the discussion whether it was proper that he should be continued as a trustee of the charity; and that the question reserved to the Court was whether, that being the case, words imputing roguery to the plaintiff were prima facie privileged or not. The intemperance of the defendant's expressions, and the assertion on his part that the roguery of the plaintiff was so great that he was not fit to be near young Cooper, were left to the jury as evidence of malice; but that being negatived, the question reserved is, whether the occasion excused language, strongly disparaging the plaintiff's character for honesty, but bona fide spoken with reference to the discussion whether it was proper to take steps to retain him as a trustee of the charity. No motion has been made to set aside the finding as to malice as against evidence, nor would the Court, according to its usual practice, have granted a rule on that ground where the damages were so small.

We are, therefore, now to take it as decided that the words were bona fide spoken with reference to the propriety of taking steps to retain the plaintiff in his trusteeship, that discussion having been brought on by the plaintiff himself causing the defendant to be canvassed for that purpose. The principle on which it depends whether words or writing prima facie actionable are justified by the occasion on which they are published, so as to put the plaintiff on proof of actual malice, has been laid down in Toogood v. Spyring (13), by Parke, B., in the following terms: "The law considers such publication as malicious, unless it is fairly made by a person in the discharge of some public or private duty, whether legal or moral, or in the conduct of his own affairs, in matters where his own interest is concerned. In such cases, the occasion prevents the inference of malice, which the law draws from the unauthorized communication, and affords a qualified defence depending upon the absence of actual malice. If fairly warranted by any reasonable occasion or exigency, and honestly made, such communications are protected for the common convenience and welfare of society; and the law has not restricted the right to make them within any narrow limits." This exposition of the law has always been approved of, the difficulty felt being in the application of the rule to the particular case; and in the more recent decisions, such as Whiteley v. Adams (14), the tendency has been to extend the limits of the moral duty or reasonable exigency which authorizes the publication of defamatory matter. But we think that the present case falls strictly within the limits as laid down in Toogood v. Spyring (13). When the defendant was requested to join in taking steps to retain the plaintiff in his trusteeship, or to state the reasons why he so refused, we think that there was a duty towards those who were concerned in the trusteeship, and an interest of his own, making it a reasonable occasion warranting his statement of that which he believed, so far as it was pertinent to the fitness of the plaintiff for that office. And this was still more clearly the case when we find that the defendant was canvassed at the instance of the plaintiff himself. Under such circumstances the plaintiff cannot, as we think, complain of any statement honestly made, if pertinent to the question whether the plaintiff was fit to be trusted, and every statement relating to his honesty and previous conduct in business was pertinent to such a question. If the defendant had made statements injurious to the plaintiff's character, on some matter not in any way connected with the subject of his fitness to be a trustee, as if, for instance, there had been a statement made that he had beaten his wife, that would have been wholly unwarranted by the occasion, and would consequently not have been privileged. But all the words of which evidence was given in this case, were relevant to the question whether the plaintiff was fit to be trusted or not; and that being so, we think that, according to the decision of this Court in Cook v. Wildes (12), of which we approve, the intemperance of the defendant's language and the unnecessary force of his expressions formed evidence of malice which it was proper to leave to the jury, but did not take away the privilege, the jury having negatived malice.

We think, therefore, that the rule must be absolute to enter the verdict for the defendant.

Rule absolute.

1865. } REYNOLDS AND ANOTHER v.
June 16. } JEX.

Ship and Shipping—Charter-Party—Master's Authority to make Bills of Lading with Freight payable to third Persons.

The master of a ship has no power, under his general authority, to draw bills of lading making the freight payable to other than his owner.

A ship was chartered out and home at a lump sum, bills of lading to be signed by the shipowner or agent at any rate of freight without prejudice to the charter. At an outward port, the agents of the charterers advanced money to the master for the ship's use, on condition of the ship taking goods on the return voyage under bills of lading making the freight payable to them (the agents), or their assigns, at the port of delivery; goods were put on board, and bills of lading given accordingly by the master:—Held, that the master had no authority to make such bills of lading, and that the shipowner retained his lien on the goods for freight.

This was an interpleader issue to try whether or not the plaintiffs were entitled to the 350*l.* paid into court under an interpleader summons; and was tried, before Shee, J., at Liverpool, at the Spring Assizes, 1865, when the following were the undisputed facts:

The defendant, living at New York, is owner of the British ship De Jex, and entered into the following charter-party, on the 11th of September 1863, with James C. Jewett & Co., of New York.

"This charter-party, made and concluded upon in the city of New York, this 11th day of September in the year 1863, between Josiah Jex, of New York, agent of the British bark De Jex, of Jamaica, B.W.I. of the burden of 398 (U.S. measurement) tons or thereabouts, now lying in the harbour of New York, of the first part, and James C. Jewett & Co., of New York, of the second part, witnesseth that the said part of the first part, for and in consideration of the covenants and agreements hereinafter mentioned, to be kept and performed by the said part of the second part, do covenant and agree on the freighting and chartering of the said vessel unto the said part of the second part, for a voyage from the port of New York to Hong Kong and Whampoa, and thence to Shanghai (China), and from thence to an Atlantic port in the United States, and not south of the Chesapeake, or to a port in Great Britain, not beyond London, on the east coast, or to a port on the continent of Europe, between Havre and Hamburg inclusive, calling at Queenstown or Falmouth for orders, with liberty to use on returning to the United States or Great Britain, &c. &c., as named, one other port in China, or to use Manila or Singapore, on the terms following, that is to say: First, the said part of the first part do engage that the said vessel, in and during the said voyage, shall be kept tight, staunch, well-fitted, tackled, and provided with every requisite, and with men and provisions necessary for such voyage. Secondly, the said part of the first part do further engage that the whole of the vessel (with the exception of the cabin, the deck, and the necessary room for the accommodation of the crew and of the sails, cables and provisions,) shall be at the sole use and disposal of the said part of the second part, during the voyage aforesaid, and that no goods or merchandise whatever shall be laden on board, otherwise than from the said part of the second part, or agent, without consent, on pain of forfeiture of freight agreed upon for the same. Thirdly, the said part of the first part do further engage to take and receive on board the said vessel, during the aforesaid voyage, all such lawful goods and merchandise as the said part of the second part, or agent, may think proper to ship. And the said part of the second part, for and in consideration of the covenants and agreements to be kept and performed by the said part of the first part, do covenant and agree with the said part of the first part to charter and hire the said vessel as aforesaid, on the terms following, that is to say: First, the said part of the second part do engage to provide and furnish the said vessel with cargoes of lawful merchandise, or at least sufficient for ballast, during the voyage, to include from New York two steam boilers, which are to be taken under deck, by part of the first part, to be put on board free of expense to said vessel, and to be discharged in like manner; captain assisting with his crew, the masts, purchases, blocks, &c. Secondly, the said part of the second part do further engage to pay to the said part of the first part, or agent, for the charter or freight of said vessel during the voyage aforesaid in manner following, that is to say, the sum of 3,000*l.* British sterling, with its equivalent, payable as follows: 1,500*l.* at Shanghai, on correct discharge of the cargoes at Hong Kong and Shanghai, less the advance hereinafter provided for, payable in approved bank bill on London as customary, or in cash equivalent thereto, at the captain's option, and 1,500*l.* on correct discharge of return cargo in the United States, or in the United Kingdom, or on the continent as named, payable in satisfactory bill on London, or in cash equivalent thereto. 1,000*l.* or its equivalent in currency at current rate of exchange, optional with the part of the first part, to be advanced in New York by part of the second part on this charter on the signing of the charter-parties, and subject to the payment by part of the first part and by said vessel, with the premium of insurance to Hong Kong and Shanghai and four months' interest to be deducted therefrom."—(Then followed clauses as to loading, &c.)—"Privilege to part of the second part of passengers in the cabin at 200 dollars for each adult, payable before sailing of the ship, also the privilege of such deck-freight as the ship can safely carry. Stevedore of part of the second part to be employed in loading the vessel, part of first part paying customary rates therefor, provided he does not charge more than any one else. Bills of lading to be signed by part of first part or agent, at any rate of freight, without prejudice to this charter. Draft of water subject to New York Board of Underwriters. Vessel to be consigned at port of discharge to charterer's agent, and subject only to a commission of 2*l.* 10*s.* per cent., payable to the said agent on the amount earned by the vessel up to arrival at Shanghai to agent there, and on the amount due on final discharge of cargo in United States or United Kingdom, &c. to agent there. Vessel if moved a second time in New York in loading to be done at expense of part of second part. To the true and faithful performance of all the foregoing covenants and agreements, the said parties, each to the other, do hereby bind themselves, their executors, administrators and assigns, and also the said vessel, freight, tackle and appurtenances, and the merchandise to be laden on board each to the other in the penal sum of the amount of this charter."

The sum of 1,000*l.* was paid at New York according to the terms of the contract, and on the charter-party was indorsed a receipt by the shipowner's agent in these terms: "New York, Sept. 15, 1863.—Received on the within charter (of the bark De Jex) the sum of 1,000*l.*, therein specified as the advance to be made on the signing of the same. The said 1,000*l.* is to be deducted by Messrs. Frazar & Co., of Shanghai, to whom this vessel is consigned in China, from the amount of the charter-money due as specified, or correct discharge of cargo at Hong Kong and Shanghai," &c., "and this 1,000*l.* is to be held by Messrs. Frazar & Co. subject to the order of Messrs. Dehon, Clark & Bridges, of New York."

The vessel proceeded from New York to China, and there discharged her outward cargo; and Messrs. Frazar & Co., the charterers' agents at Shanghai, then paid the balance of 500*l.* on the 1,500*l.* payable there. The master, however, requiring further funds for the purposes of the ship, Messrs. Frazar & Co. refused to advance any further sum on account of the freight; but agreed to advance him 459*l.*, on condition that the ship should take home for them a certain amount of cotton, under bills of lading making freight payable to them or their agent at the port of discharge. Accordingly, cotton was shipped on board the De Jex, for which the master, on the 21st of May 1864, gave the following bills of lading:—

"Shipped by Frazar & Co. on board, &c., 691 bales of cotton, to be delivered, &c., at the port of Liverpool, unto order, or his or their assigns, he or they paying freight for the said goods, to Messrs. Reynolds, Mann & Co., Liverpool (the plaintiffs), as per margin: 691 bales, at 3*l.* 15*s.* per ton of 50 cubic feet."

The following receipt was signed by the master on the 28th of May 1864 :

"Received from Messrs. Frazer & Co., on account of the charter of the barque De Jex, 959l. 8s. 3d., charter-party dated at New York, the 11th of September 1863."

Messrs. Reynolds, the plaintiffs, received the charter-party, and at the same time the bills of lading, the freight on which amounted to 981l. 9s.

On the arrival of the ship at Liverpool, in November 1864, the balance due on the charter freight was 1,040l. 11s. 9d.; and the plaintiffs, to whom it was consigned, docked the ship, and disbursed between 300l. and 400l. on her account. They then claimed the goods consigned to them, and as the freight, per bills of lading, was payable to themselves, they insisted on a delivery of the goods freight free.

The defendant's solicitors, acting under the 194th section of the Mersey Docks Consolidation Act, 1858, served the following notice on the harbour board :

"To the Mersey Dock and Harbour Board.

"Stanley Dock.

"On behalf of Josiah Jex, ship's husband of the barque D. Jex, now discharging in the Stanley Dock.—We hereby give you notice to detain and keep the cargo brought by the said vessel in the warehouses belonging to the said board until the freight and charges for the same are paid and satisfied, of which we will give you due notice, or until a sufficient deposit is made to cover such freight and charges; and we hereby give you notice not to pay over to any person or persons the said freight or deposit without our consent on behalf of the said Josiah Jex."

The plaintiffs deposited with the dock board 1,100l., being the sum insisted upon by the board, though more than the amount of the bill of lading freight on the 691 bales of cotton consigned to them, and then commenced an action against the dock board to recover the 1,100l.

An interpleader summons was taken out, and the defendant substituted for the dock board as defendant. Owing to the disbursements made by the plaintiffs as consignees of the ship, and by subsequent arrangement, 750l. was paid to the plaintiffs, and 350l. only was retained in court.

On the above facts, a verdict was entered for the plaintiffs, with leave to the defendant to move to enter it for him.

A rule nisi having been obtained accordingly, on the ground that the defendant had a lien upon the cargo,

E. James and Holker shewed cause.—

The agents of the charterers at Shanghai, Messrs. Frazer & Co., were bound to advance 500l., but they were not bound to advance more. They then, as independent merchants, made an independent contract with the master, whereby they agree to advance a further sum on condition that the master shall take goods for them to the home port, freight being made payable to agents of their own. They had notice of the charter-party, and the question is whether the master, in taking advances from them for the purposes of the ship, had not power to bind the owners to the extent of the advance? The master had a right to receive the money, and he was authorized, under this charter-party, to give these bills of lading, assigning the cargo by way of security.

[BLACKBURN, J.—It is an unusual proceeding. I never heard of a bill of lading being made payable to a third person. I do not say it cannot be done.]

In Shand v. Sanderson (1), Pollock, C.B., in delivering judgment, says, "What is the meaning of the expression 'without prejudice to this charter-party'? It means, not that a right of lien must be presumed, but that the charter-party is not to be considered as waived, and that all rights created by it are to exist as a matter of contract, though they do not attach on the goods by way of lien." There is no reason why freight should not be assigned.

[CROMPTON, J.—You make the whole freight payable to A. and B, and say that they are trustees for the difference when they may be insolvent persons.]

The case already cited and Foster v. Colby (2) seem to shew that bills of lading may be signed for nominal freight, and they appear to authorize the borrowing of money for the ship in this manner without compelling the master to have recourse to the more expensive course of bottomry.

(1) 4 Hurl. & N. 381, 389; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 278.

[SHEE, J.—In Foster v. Colby (2) Watson, B. explains why on certain cargoes bills of lading are given as nominal freight, or no freight at all.]

In Pearson v. Göschel (3), it was held that, under the circumstances there stated, the master had authority to enter into a new contract binding on the shipowner.

[BLACKBURN, J. — The plaintiffs' case would be advanced, if it could be shewn that the captain can in any way pledge the freight, except by maritime contracts well known in Courts of Admiralty.]

This is not the case of a pledge. The charter-party must be looked at to ascertain the extent of authority given to the master; and it is submitted that here, where the contract was for a lump sum, it was the intention of the parties that the captain should take goods on board free of the shipowner's lien.

[BLACKBURN, J.—In Maude and Pollock on Shipping, p. 104, it is stated, "Although the immediate control of the ship as to her employment is vested in the master, he has no power to alter the voyage, or to vary the rate of freight at which goods are to be shipped, in contravention of the agreement made between his owner and the freighter, or to make freight payable beforehand, or to any person other than the owner;" and reference is made to the case — The Sir Henry Webb (4). The charter in that case was different from the present, and there, as well as in Dewell v. Moxon (5), all that appears is, that the freight cannot be pledged for a debt, and that goods cannot be taken on board freight free. But here the ship is let to the charterer for a lump sum, and it was the intention of the parties that the shipowner's right to freight should be confined to the 2,000*l.*, and that the right to freight on the other goods should be to secure the balance of the lump sum only, so that if the whole amount of the lump sum were paid no claim should be made for freight on the 491 bales.

Temple, in support of the rule, was proceeding to shew that the present case was decided by Pearson v. Göschel (3), when he was stopped by the Court.

CROMPTON, J.—The question in this case is, whether the master could give bills of lading whereby, for an advance of about 500*l.*, he bound the owners to carry certain goods, with the stipulation that the lender's nominees should receive the whole of the freight. In the first place, I am not aware that there is any authority for such a proposition, and it is admitted that there is none; and in the next place it is against the principle by which all such cases are governed. The shipowner is entitled to his lien for the freight; but by such a contract as the present it would be possible for the owner to be deprived of all right of lien whatever. The charter freight may be, as here, for a lump sum, or for freight at a higher rate than the bills of lading freight. But the result of the present contract would be that the shipowner would lose his lien for the charter freight due to him at Liverpool, and receive instead the bill of lading freight only, these bills of lading being given for a much smaller amount. The master, however, cannot deprive the owner both of the charter freight and his lien for it by substituting bills of lading, giving a remedy of a different character. The shipowner is entitled to the 1,100*l.*, and it cannot be made payable to A. B. Under these bills of lading the money could only be sued for by A. B. or by parties claiming under them, and if A. B. proved insolvent, the result would be loss of the lien to the shipowner. This is not like the case of hypothecation or bottomry, where the party lending is entitled to his money on arrival of the ship. The law maritime makes such a transaction a remedy for the advance only, and it does not give it the effect which the present case would have. There is, therefore, no difficulty in such a case, but in the present there is a loss cast upon the owner: the loss of his freight or of the lien which is to secure it. No case being cited to shew that this can be done, we are not prepared to hold now for the first time that it can be done. Not only is there no authority for this proposition, but the case of Walshe v.

Proves (6) is a direct authority the other way. There it was held, that it was not competent to the defendants to procure the master to execute a charter-party which excluded the right of the owners to freight, which is incident to the vessel. It would be, indeed, difficult for us to say that in addition to the known methods by which security for advances may be given, this novel mode could also be allowed. I am of opinion, therefore, that this rule should be made absolute.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. In this case, the defendant had entered into a charter-party by which freight was to be a lump sum. Had this stood alone, the captain would have had a lien for the whole of the freight. But a power is inserted, as usual, that the captain may enter into contracts limiting the owner's right to freight. Mr. Holker's argument is that the master has thereby power to make what contracts he pleases. There is nothing to shew that such extensive authority is thereby conferred. The captain has entered into a contract making freight payable to Messrs. Reynolds. So that bills of lading are given for goods by which the freight is made payable to third persons. What power has the captain to make such a contract? In Grant v. Norway (7), it is stated by the Court,—“The authority of the master of a ship is very large, and extends to all acts that are usual and necessary for the use and enjoyment of the ship, but is subject to several well-known limitations. He may make contracts for the hire of the ship, but cannot vary that which the owner has made. He may take up money in foreign parts, and under certain circumstances at home, for the necessary disbursements for repairs, and bind the owners for repayment. But his authority is limited by the necessity of the case, and he cannot make them responsible for money not actually necessary for those purposes, although he may pretend that it is. He may make contracts to carry goods on freight, but cannot bind his owners to carry freight free.” The judgment also cites with approval a passage from Smith's Mercantile Law, to the effect that “the authority of the master is to perform all things usual in the line of business in which he is employed.” The question is there put by the Court: Is it usual in the management of a ship carrying goods on freight, for the master to give a bill of lading for goods not put on board, as had been done in that case? So the question here is, whether it is usual in the management of such a ship, to make freight payable to third persons? There has never been found such a case; it is an entire novelty. The captain in my opinion has gone quite beyond his authority as master; he had no right to do as he has done, and our judgment is therefore in favour of the shipowner.

SHER, J.—I am of the same opinion. In the case of Dewell v. Moxon (5), Mansfield, C.J. inquires whether, the plaintiff having obtained the use of the owner's ship without his consent, the owner is not entitled to a quantum meruit for freight; and Lawrence, J. adds, “As to the extent of the captain's authority, suppose a butcher's servant should give away his owner's mutton to persons who dress it and eat it, would not the butcher be entitled to payment?” This case is commented on in Abbott on Shipping, 9th ed. p. 106, where it is stated, that an engagement to carry goods free of freight will not be within the scope of the captain's authority; and the same may be said of the present case.

EVANS v. PROSSER.

Award—Rule to pay Money—Attorney accepting Service of Rule Nisi—Personal Service.

The Court will not make absolute a rule nisi on a defendant to pay money pursuant to an award unless there has been personal service, or unless it be shewn that personal service cannot be effected because the party is keeping out of the way to avoid service. An acceptance by the attorney of the defendant of the service of the rule nisi, and a consent by him to the rule being made absolute, are not for this purpose equivalent to personal service.

In this case a rule nisi had been obtained, calling on the defendant to pay the plaintiff money pursuant to an award.

The clerk to the plaintiff's attorney went to the defendant's abode to serve the rule nisi, but finding that the defendant had gone to a place thirty miles off, he followed there, but when he reached the place the defendant had gone away to some other place, where the agent was unable to follow him at the time. The defendant was not keeping out of the way to avoid service. The plaintiff's clerk, not being able to find the defendant, saw the defendant's attorney, who stated that he was perfectly willing to accept service of the rule nisi for the defendant, and he indorsed on the original rule produced to him an acceptance of service of the rule for the defendant, and a consent that the rule might be made absolute.

R. G. Williams on these facts moved to make the rule absolute.

BLACKBURN, J.—The practice is that there must be personal service of the rule nisi to pay the money, or it must be shewn that every effort has been made to effect personal service, and that the party is keeping out of the way to avoid service. Here the defendant is not served personally, nor is he evading service. There may be some hardship, on both sides, not to make the rule absolute, as it may put them to some additional expense. But to make this rule absolute on the consent of the defendant's attorney would, I fear, be establishing a bad precedent. The rule cannot be made absolute, but may be enlarged to chambers.

 1865. } RICKETS v. THE METROPOLITAN
 Feb. 3. } TAN RAILWAY COMPANY.*

*Lands Clauses Consolidation Act —
 Lands injuriously affected by Railway Works —
 Temporary Obstruction of Highway — Loss of Trade — Compensation.*

If a railway company during the execution of their works under their special act place a bridge on a highway, up and down and over which bridge passengers must pass, instead of along the level highway, and so render the access to a public-house more difficult, and passengers are thereby deterred from going that way, and there is in consequence a loss of trade to the public-house, the tenant of the public-house cannot sustain a demand for compensation, under section 68. of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, on the ground that his land has been injuriously affected by the works; for no action would have lain against the company had they not been authorized by their special act; and even if an action might have been supported, still no compensation is claimable, since the damage, if any, is of a personal character, and not an injury to the land.

So held in the Exchequer Chamber (reversing the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench) by Erie, C.J., Pollock, C.B., Channell, B. and Pigott, B.; dissentientibus Byles, J. and Keating, J.

Senior v. the Metropolitan Railway Company (1) and Cameron v. the Charing Cross Railway Company (2) overruled.

Error was brought in this case by the defendants, to reverse the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, in favour of the plaintiff, on a special case.

The following were the material facts. The plaintiff was the lessee of a public-house situate in Crawford Passage. Along Crawford Passage and across Coppice Row was a public footway. The defendants, for the purpose of their works, placed a hoarding in Coppice Row, and placed steps to enable the foot-passengers to pass up on one side and down on the other side of a bridge over the hoarding, and they did this in accordance with their duty under their statutes, and after twenty months restored the premises to their original state. After this bridge had been so erected, the number of passengers passing to and fro along Crawford Passage diminished; the refreshments sold by the plaintiff were diminished in proportion; and the jury must be taken to have found that the bridge and steps formed the motive which turned the passengers in another direction and prevented the sale of refreshments which would otherwise have been bought by them, and so caused the loss of profit.

Hawkins (G. Rockfort Clarke with him), (Nov. 28, 1864,) for the appellants, the railway company.—The plaintiff is not entitled to any compensation. The obstruction was authorized by the act, and as soon as the tunnel was made, the obstruction, such as it was, was removed. The company, pursuant to the act, made a substituted road before commencing the works. No road was stopped up here, for the public could pass by a bridge. The only loss alleged is the loss of custom by foot-passengers. The first objection to this inquisition is, that if the plaintiff has any right to compensation, it is by action under section 55. of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, which gives an action to a party who suffers special damage by obstruction of a public way. Secondly, there is no legal injury, and therefore no ground for compensation, for the house or land of the plaintiff has not been injured, only his trade. In all the cases which can be cited, it has been found that the house had been injured. Thirdly, the injury is too remote; it is common to all the Queen's subjects. Every one may claim, if the plaintiff may claim. His injury is not of a different character from that of others. The test is whether an action would have lain supposing the obstruction had been made without the sanction of parliament. Here no action would have lain. There is, in fact, no obstruction for foot-passengers. No action would lie because the road was made muddy or cut up by contractors' carts. No action lies for the plaintiff merely because a customer dislikes passing over a bridge to him.

D. D. Keane, for the respondent, the claimant.—The plaintiff was entitled to compensation. Loss of profits of land forms a ground of compensation. This house was depreciated by the injury to the trade. There was evidence of it, and the jury must be deemed to have found it. In Senior v. the Metropolitan Railway Company (1) Pollock, C.B. says, that loss of profits by loss of business is a loss to the goodwill of the business, and that the goodwill is part of the value of the property; therefore loss to the goodwill is an injury to the property. If a company take a man's lease and freehold, and he carries on a business, the company must give him compensation for the land, for the lease and for the loss of business. If, then, the company do not want the freehold nor the lease, that is, the whole occupation of the tenant, but take his business away, they ought to give him compensation for that. If a man's land is taken, inquiry is always made whether the business can be carried on equally well at some neighbouring place. If so, the loss of business comes to nothing. To diminish a man's trade by obstructing access to his house is injuriously affecting the land which he uses for the purposes of trade. The damage is not too remote. In an action for slander, loss of casual customers by reason of the slander would be special damage, as well as loss of regular customers. There is no distinction in principle between a permanent and a temporary obstruction as a ground of compensation. The words of the statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 18. s. 68. contain no limitation. In Rose v. Groves (3) it was decided that an innkeeper could maintain an action for the special injury of his waterway being obstructed by some timber in the river Thames, which was an obstacle to the river and also an indictable nuisance. In Gatke's case (4) it was held, that injury from a temporary nuisance by putting up a hoard was a ground of action. Wilkes v. the Hungerford Market Company (5) shews that an action lies for keeping thoroughfares improperly closed, and so diminishing the amount of business done in the shop. The improper obstruction of the footway was a nuisance, an indictable nuisance, but also actionable on account of the special damage by reason of the temporary obstruction of the business and loss of customers. In The Caledonian Railway Company v. Ogilvy (6) the obstruction caused by the railway was held only a personal inconvenience, and one that was common to the owner and the rest of the Queen's subjects. But had the complainant been a trader, and had there been an injury to his trade, the decision would have been different. The house is an essential thing to carrying on the business of a trader, and therefore the injury to the business is an injury to the house. The Railways Act, section 55, does not apply, for it only gives an action if another sufficient road is not made. Here another sufficient road was made, but the injury was not compensated for by the making the new road.

Hawkins replied.

Many other cases were cited and commented on in the argument, but all of them are noticed in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

On the 3rd of February the following judgments were delivered.—

ERLE, C.J.—The judgment I am about to read is the judgment of the Lord Chief Baron, Mr. Baron Channell, Mr. Baron Pigott, and myself. — [His Lordship stated the facts as above set forth.]—These being the facts, a question was raised whether the plaintiff is shewn to be entitled to compensation in respect of land, or any interest therein, which has been injuriously affected by the execution of the defendants' works. The plaintiff contended that the house was injuriously affected within the statute by that which caused a loss in the trade carried on in the house; and he further argued that a damage to the goodwill of the trade carried on in his house ought to be held to be an injurious affection of the house within the statute, because, if the house had been taken by the defendants under the statute, the goodwill of the trade carried on in it at the time would have been a subject for compensation according to usual practice, and he cited Chamberlain's case (7), and two cases founded thereon—Senior v. the Metropolitan Railway Company (1) and Cameron v. the Charing Cross Railway Company (2).

For the defendants, it was contended, that upon these facts, if there had been no statutes for the defendants, the plaintiff would have had no cause of action against them for special damage caused by the obstruction of a highway, and if there would have been no cause of action there was not a right to compensation: and, secondly, that even if upon these facts an action could have been maintained for such a special damage if there had been no statute, still the plaintiff is not entitled to compensation, because the special damage is to his personal interest in his stock in trade, and not to his estate in land, no compensation being given unless land, or an interest therein, has been injuriously affected.

As to the first point, namely, that upon these facts, if there had been no statute for the defendants, the plaintiff would have had no cause of action against them for special damage caused by the obstruction of a highway, we assume it to be clear that there is no title to compensation under the statutes for an obstruction of a highway, unless without the statute an action would have lain for the obstruction and the special damage, according to In re Penny v. the South-Eastern Railway Company (8). We assume, further, that although an action would lie, it does not follow that there would be title to compensation, because an action would lie for a special damage to a personal interest, yet no compensation is given under the statute unless land has been injuriously affected—see Lord Cranworth's judgment in The Caledonian Railway Company v. Ogilvy (6).

Then, first, do these facts shew that an action would have lain? An action lies where the exercise of the right of way by or on behalf of the plaintiff has been obstructed, and a greater damage has been caused to him thereby than is caused to the Queen's subjects in general by obstructing them in the exercise of their right. This position is not disputed, but the following cases exemplify its application. In Iveson v. Moore (9) the plaintiff was prevented, by the defendant's obstruction of the highway, from using the way for carting coals from his colliery, which coals were deteriorated by the delay. In this case the law on actions for obstructions of highways is well discussed. In Maynell v. Saltmarsh (10) the plaintiff was prevented by the defendant's obstruction from carrying his corn, and so the corn became damaged by rain. In Hart v. Basset (11) the plaintiff, a farmer of tithes, was prevented by the defendant's obstruction from carrying them home, and several grounds of special damage are suggested by Lord Holt in Iveson v. Moore (9). In Fineux v. Hovenden (12) the special damage mentioned as an example is damage caused directly by the obstruction of the plaintiff in the use of the way. In Greasley v. Codling (13) the plaintiff was prevented by the defendant's obstruction from carrying his coals. In Paine v. Patrick (14) the plaintiff's damage was not actionable, and the example of actionable damage is put thus: "A particular damage to maintain the action ought to be direct, and not consequential, as, for instance, the loss of his horse, or by some corporeal hurt by falling into a trench on the highway." In Chichester v. Lethbridge (15) the obstruction was held actionable, because the plaintiff was personally opposed by the defendant in an attempt to abate the obstruction and use the way. In Rose v. Miles (16) the plaintiff was obstructed in his use of the navigable water, and was damaged by being obliged to unload his barge and carry the goods over land. In all these cases the plaintiff was exercising his right of way, and the defendant obstructed that exercise, and caused particular damage thereby, directly and immediately, to the plaintiff. Here there has been no obstruction to the exercise of the right of way by or on behalf of the plaintiff; neither he himself, nor any one standing in a legal relation to him, such as servant, agent, tenant, or any other legal relation which gave to the plaintiff a legal interest in their use of the way, has been obstructed; but some unknown travellers, having a free option to pass from north to south either by Crawford Passage or any other pass, have chosen some other pass, because they did not like the steps at Coppice Row. The plaintiff has no cause of action against the defendants by reason of any obstruction direct to himself. The travellers who have chosen to turn out of their path to avoid the steps have no cause of action against the defendants in respect of the obstruction; and it seems unreasonable that an obstruction which created no cause of action either for the plaintiff or the travellers separately should, by indirect consequence, become a cause of action to the plaintiff, because the travellers exercised their choice as to their path and as to their refreshment, a choice in which the plaintiff had no manner of legal right. The plaintiff relied on Wilkes v. the Hungerford Market Company (5) as an authority in his favour. The case was argued, and the judgment is on the point that the action lay for the loss of custom to a shop caused by the obstruction of a highway at some distance therefrom. But it must be observed that the case is peculiar. The obstruction complained of in the declaration was lawful by the special statute of the defendants; but this defence was overruled, because a substituted way had not been opened before the stoppage, and, ultimately, the action was sustained on the ground that there had been unreasonable delay in removing a hoarding, which was lawful in its inception, but was continued too long, in respect of which it is not clear that an indictment would lie; and although the damage appears to be indirect, and the cases above cited were referred to, leading, as it seems to us, to a decision in the defendants' favour, the Court gave judgment for the plaintiff, and held the loss of profit to be the "direct, natural, necessary and immediate consequence of the obstruction." We have found no other precedent of an action being maintained for an obstruction of a highway, where the plaintiff was not obstructed in the exercise of any right vested in him, and the damage was not a more direct, necessary, natural and immediate consequence of the obstruction than appeared in Wilkes's case (5). If the same question were raised in an action now, we think it probable that the action would fail, both from the effect of the cases which precede Wilkes's case (5), and also from the reasoning in the judgment in The Caledonian Railway Company v. Ogilvy (6). There a railway crossed a highway on a level, and the highway was stopped, by two gates, for trains to pass, and the plaintiff lived near those gates, and suffered frequent inconvenience; but the judgment is, that he could maintain no action for this inconvenience, as it was the delay common to all who were exercising their right at that time; and although from his proximity the inconvenience to the plaintiff was frequently repeated, yet it was always the same in kind, and was not actionable special damage; and because an action would not have lain, therefore the plaintiff had no right to compensation from the railway. And Lord Cranworth adds the limitation above suggested, that even if an action lay, still, that compensation would not be due, unless injury was to the land. These are our reasons that an action would not have lain, and so the claim for compensation fails.

But, secondly, even if the action would have lain for this obstruction, whereby the plaintiff was damaged in his trade, still such damage did not accrue to the plaintiff in his capacity of owner of an estate in land, and the title to compensation to which the statute relates is only in respect of land, or an interest therein, which has been injuriously affected. Here the plaintiff has a term in the house, and the point is, whether the house is shewn to be injuriously affected because the profits of the plaintiff's trade carried on therein are diminished by reason of the obstruction. The trading carried on in the house is entirely distinct from the estate in the house. The procuring of refreshment and the sale thereof, and the profit thereon, may either continue or cease, without affecting the plaintiff's interest in the house. If his licence was taken away, the business would cease, but the house and the estate therein would be the same as before; and it is clear, that an estate in the house is not essential to the sale of refreshments, as many kinds are sold in the street by persons having no interest in the land where they sell. The statute limited the liability to compensation in respect of injuries to definite rights of a permanent nature, that is, to rights in land. The public has a valuable interest in, and derives much advantage from the works of public companies. The capital invested in them is therefore protected, within certain limits, and we are to see that those limits are not exceeded; and in support of this view we refer again to Lord Cranworth's words in Ogilvy's case (6) above cited. As to the argument, that compensation is in practice allowed for the profits of the trade where land is taken, the distinction is obvious. The company claiming to take land by compulsory process, expel the owner from his property, and are bound to compensate him for all the loss caused by the expulsion; and the principle of compensation, then, is the same as in trespass for expulsion; and so it has been decided in Jubb v. the Hull Dock Company (17). There a brewery had been taken by the defendants, and the plaintiff claimed to be compensated for the loss of his business as a brewer; and the Court held that he was so entitled, expressly on the ground that the premises had been taken; and distinguished that case from The King v. the London Dock Company (18), where compensation for loss of custom to a public-house was held to have been properly refused, upon the ground that in the latter case no part of the premises of the claimant had been taken or touched by the company. But the present claim under section 68. of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, is made in respect of lands injuriously affected, where no land has been taken, and if it was held that a claim could be sustained against a company for the loss of profit which a jury could attribute to an obstruction of a highway in the execution of their works, the liabilities in a dense population would be innumerable. The common law limited the remedy for obstructions of public rights to indictment, unless there was special damage, to prevent innumerable actions, and the same reason applies in full force to prevent innumerable claims on account of an alleged loss of profits caused by obstructing a thoroughfare.

We consider that the authorities support this conclusion, notwithstanding the recent cases in the three Courts to the contrary, viz., Senior v. the Metropolitan Railway Company (1) in the Exchequer, Cameron v. the Charing Cross Railway Company (2) in the Common Pleas, and this case in the Court below; for these cases are all founded on the supposed effect of the judgment in the Exchequer Chamber, in Chamberlain's case; and if that judgment has been misunderstood, these cases, so far as they are founded on that misconception, are to be corrected. In Chamberlain's case (7) the damages were given by the arbitrator on account of the damage done to the plaintiff's house by the railway works; and there was no claim, and there could be none, in respect of loss of actual profits by the obstruction, because the houses had never been inhabited, and some of them were not completed. It is true that the arbitrator gave as a reason for the damage that the number of passers along by the houses in question would be diminished, and that therefore they were less fit to be let for shops; and this reason is referred to in the judgment. But it is certain, if the case is examined, that the houses themselves of the then plaintiffs were found to be injuriously affected, and for that injury alone the compensation was awarded. The same principle of compensation which prevailed in that case has been often sustained, and is totally distinct from the loss of profits of a trade by an obstruction of a thoroughfare. The principle is, that the value of a house is affected by the relation of its situation to the adjoining highway, that is, by the convenience of the private rights of ingress and egress from the one to the other, and by the circumstances of the highway itself tending to make it useful and agreeable to the occupier of the house. If a house on a level with a commodious, beautiful, well-frequented street either be lifted or sunk by the railway twenty feet above or below the level of that street, the house would be injuriously affected, both for pleasure and profit, by reason of the change in the access to and from the house; or if a house fronting to a street of that description should be turned round so as to front to a dark back alley, the house would be injuriously affected—the site of the house would be altered for the worse. In these cases here suggested, the house is supposed to be removed to make the meaning more clear. But if, instead of lifting or sinking the house, or turning its front from a grand street to a bad alley, the street is lifted or sunk or changed in its character, the relation of the house to its highway is affected precisely to the same degree as it would be by altering the relative position of the house itself in respect of that highway. Such is the principle of Chamberlain's case (7). The frontage had been to a wide, well-frequented road, leading direct to and from important towns. By the execution of the railway works, it was made to front a dumb alley sunk below the level of the substituted thoroughfare over the railway bridge, along which the stream of passengers would be compelled to flow. Frontage gives the value to building ground. There the railway company took away valuable frontage, and substituted that which was very inferior; and therefore it was held that they had injuriously affected the house, both in its frontage and in its access to and from the effective thoroughfare of the locality. This principle has been acted on in other cases where compensation had been awarded to claimants in respect of their access to the highway being affected. Thus, in The Queen v. the Eastern Counties Railway Company (19), the compensation was held to be due to the claimant, because his land adjoined the road, which had been lowered by the railway, so that his private right of access to the highway had been injured. To the same effect are the Irish cases, Moore v. the Great Southern and Western Railway Company (20) and Tuohey v. the Great Southern and Western Railway Company (21). Upon this principle also the case of Baker v. Moore (22), cited by Mr. Justice Gould in Iveson v. Moore (9), would have stood if the plaintiff had succeeded. There the defendant built a wall, obstructing the access from a street to the Thames, and the plaintiff sued for the damage to his houses in the street from the loss of that access; but as he failed to shew that he had the houses in the street, he failed in his action. So also, in The Queen v. the Great Northern Railway Company (23), a ferry, belonging, by prescription, to the plaintiffs' land, was taken away by the railway works, and compensation was granted because the ferry and the access thereto were a private right, and the loss thereof was an injury to the land. We do not think it useful to make further citation of cases where compensation was granted, and to point out that in each there was injury to an estate in land. The general conclusion which we draw from this review is, that there is no precedent of compensation for an injury to goodwill, or for a loss of profit in the business carried on upon the land, where no land has been taken; that the compensation for the goodwill of business carried on upon land actually taken is granted expressly on the ground that the occupier is expelled therefrom, and is distinguished thereby from a claim by an occupier from whom nothing has been taken. So far the authorities for the negative proposition are clear, namely, that there is no precedent for supporting such a claim as the plaintiff makes. Then The King v. the London Dock Company (18) is a direct affirmative decision on the very point now in question, namely, that a claimant is not entitled to compensation for loss of profit in his business by reason of the obstruction of the highways in the neighbourhood of his house, whereby the passengers that would have come and purchased refreshment but for the obstruction, were prevented from so doing. The decision is, that there was no injurious affection of an interest in land, although the highways were permanently obstructed without substitution. In that case, Wilkes v. the Hungerford Market Company (5) was distinguished from the case before the Court, because Wilkes maintained an action for the damage done to his trade, and an action is not confined to an injurious affection of an interest in land, but will lie for an injury to the person or personal property caused by the obstruction of a highway. The case of The King v. the London Dock Company (18) has been often cited in all the Courts, and uniformly as a binding decision standing on sound grounds. We would also refer again to The Caledonian Railway Company v. Ogilvy (6), for a judgment on the point, that the land is not injuriously affected, because a highway leading to the land is obstructed, and thereby inconvenience is caused to the owner, and others resorting to the land. We would also refer to The King v. the Bristol Dock Company (24), as supporting the principle that compensation should not be given for a damage common to the inhabitants of the neighbourhood generally. These are the affirmative authorities against maintaining the present claim. The words of the statute seem to us to accord with these authorities, limiting the right to compensation to an injurious affection of an interest in land, contradistinguished from injuries to the person or personal property; and expediency seems strongly on the side of the view we take, namely, that companies making works which the legislature has sanctioned on account of their public convenience should be relieved within certain limits from liability to action, as well as indictment in respect of their works. On these grounds, even if there was no statute for the defendants, and if an action would lie for a loss of the profit to a business, still no compensation is due for such loss of profit as an injurious affection of an interest in land, because such loss does not affect that interest. The result is, that the judgment will be reversed on each of the two grounds above mentioned.

KEATING, J. — I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench should be affirmed. The defendants, in the execution of the works authorized by their act, interfered with certain approaches to the public-house of the plaintiff, rendering the same less convenient, and thereby causing such a diminution in the number of his customers as to cause him in his business of licensed victualler damage which the jury estimated at 100*l.*; and the question is, whether such loss of customers, under the circumstances stated in the case, can form the subject of compensation within the 68th section of the Lands Clauses Act. That an action would have lain against the defendants by the plaintiff in respect of the injury to his public-house, by the withdrawal of the customers, if the company had not been protected by their act, I cannot bring myself to doubt. The case of Wilkes v. the Hungerford Market Company (5) has never, that I am aware of, been at all shaken, and appears to me to decide the point; for there is no real difference between that case and the present. So likewise in the case of Senior v. the Metropolitan Railway Company (1), which is almost identical in its facts with the present, the Court of Exchequer necessarily held that an action would have lain, as they decided it to be a case for compensation; see also the judgment of Mr. Justice Willes in Cameron v. the Charing Cross Railway Company (2). Indeed, the case of Chamberlain v. the West London, &c. Company (7) seems to conclude the matter; for although in that case the obstruction was permanent, yet that could only be a question of degree, and immaterial upon the point whether an action would lie. In none of these cases were the houses themselves injured, but in all the complaint was of an obstruction interfering with the trade carried on, or which might be carried on therein, and so causing damage by the injuriously affecting an interest in the land. If, then, the injury found by the jury to have been inflicted upon the plaintiff in this case by the acts of the defendants was an injury to his interest in or occupation of land for which an action might have been maintained against them if they were not protected by their act, then all the authorities, beginning at least as far back as Glover v. the North Staffordshire Railway Company (25), shew that the case is one for compensation. Indeed, the application of such a test to the construction of the statute is in itself so just and reasonable, that it would require strong authorities to displace those in its favour. It was suggested that the observations of Lord Cranworth, in the case of The Caledonian Railway Company v. Ogilvy (25), were opposed to this view, but when the case is looked at it will be found that his Lordship was referring to cases of personal inconvenience and injury not affecting land or any interest therein. So, also, the case of The King v. the London Dock Company (18) was decided upon the ground that the injury there complained of was not such an injury as the statute then under discussion contemplated—and see the observations of Crompton, J. in Chamberlain's case (7) as to the large words now to be found in the compensation clause of the more recent acts. An injury to the trade carried on, or, as it may be called, the goodwill of a house is an injury to that which is inseparable from it, and forms part of its nature, as was said by Willes, J. in Cameron v. the Charing Cross Railway Company (2), "Damage to a man's interest in land necessarily includes damage to the business which he carries on upon the land by diverting it from its accustomed channel. Such an interest is not merely personal, it is an interest which a man enjoys in respect of the land—a reasonable expectation of profit from the exercise of his abilities in some particular place by carrying on business there. That reasonable expectation of profit is commonly called 'goodwill,' and is a marketable thing." And in none of the numerous cases which have been decided upon this subject, and in which compensation has been held to be payable in respect of the land being injuriously affected, has the subject-matter of the injury more directly and immediately affected the value of the land than the goodwill of a public-house. Indeed, the case of Chamberlain v. the West End, &c. Railway Company (7), before referred to, seems to conclude the present case, for there the arbitrator had awarded compensation (amongst other things) in consequence of the company's having, by interfering with the access of the plaintiff's houses, rendered them less suitable for shops, as from the obstruction fewer persons would pass that way, and so the value was lessened. It is true that the obstruction in that case was permanent. Here it was not so.

(24) 12 East, 429.

(25) 16 Q.B. Rep. 912; s.c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 376.

But that can, I apprehend, make no real difference in principle between the two cases; for if the injury were direct to the situation of the house itself, its being caused by the temporary works of the company would not render it less the subject of compensation than if caused by works of a permanent character. Upon the whole, looking to the authorities and words of the statute, I am of opinion that the Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench, in the present case, have rightly construed them, and that their decision ought to be affirmed.

Pauper Lunatic—Order for Maintenance—Appeal—16 & 17 Vict. c. 97. ss. 96, 108, 128.

A lunatic pauper was sent from a parish into a lunatic asylum, and an order was subsequently made by Justices, under section 96. of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 97, directing the guardians of the union comprising such parish to pay the costs of maintenance to the treasurer, &c. of the asylum:—Held, by Cockburn, C.J., Mellor, J. and Shreeve, J., that the guardians upon whom the order was made could not appeal against such order, as it was a mere interim order necessary for the support of the lunatic until his settlement was adjudged to be in some particular parish, or until, by reason of its being impossible to ascertain the parish of settlement, the costs of maintenance were thrown upon the county.

Held, by Blackburn, J. (sedes vacante), that the guardians might appeal against the order.

[IN THE EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.]
 (Appeal from the Court of Queen's Bench.)
 1864. } GRAY AND WIFE v. PULLEN
 Nov. 29. } AND HUBBLE.*

Nuisance—Negligence—Principal and Contractor—Statutable Duty—Metropolis Local Management Act, ss. 77, 110, 111.

The defendant, the owner of a house in the metropolis, employed a contractor to make a drain from his house to the main sewer, under the powers given by the Metropolis Local Management Act (19 & 20 Vict. c. 120). The contractor made the drain, but filled up the ground so negligently where it crossed a public footway, that it subsided and left a hole, into which the plaintiff fell and was injured:—Held, by the Exchequer Chamber, reversing the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, that the defendant was liable for the injury; that the statutable power given, by sections 77. and 110. of the act, for making the drain also imposed on the defendant the duty of filling up the cutting across the footway properly, and that he was not excused by reason of his having employed to perform the work a contractor who omitted to do his duty.

This was an appeal, by the plaintiff, against the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, refusing the plaintiff leave to enter a verdict against the defendant Pullen.

The action was for an injury to the female plaintiff.

The defendant Pullen, the owner of a house in Deptford, within the limits of the Metropolis Local Management Act (19 & 20 Vict. c. 120), being desirous of making a drain from his house, under the powers of the act, employed the defendant Hubble to do the work. The latter carried the drain, by a deep cutting, across a public footpath and part of the roadway in front of the house into the main sewer. After the drain had been completed, the earth was reinstated in so insufficient a manner that a subsidence took place, leaving an open trench across the footway. Into this the female plaintiff, walking along the footway, fell and was injured.

The pleadings are set out in the report below (1). The first count charged the defendants with wrongfully digging a hole in the public highway; the second, admitting that the defendants were lawfully entitled to break open the highway for the purpose of making the drain, charged that they did not use due diligence in causing the surface to be made good, and in the mean time put up fences or lights to prevent accidents. Both counts alleged the injury to the female plaintiff through falling into the opening.

The defendant pleaded not guilty; and a second plea, to part of the first count, justifying the making the drain and hole, under the statute.

Under the direction of the learned Judge who tried the case, a verdict was found for the defendant Pullen. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs, with damages against the defendant Hubble.

J. Brown, for the plaintiffs, the appellants (Nov. 26, 1864).—The defendant Pullen, the owner of the premises, is liable as well as Hubble the contractor. It may be admitted that Pullen could not be liable at common law for the negligence of the contractor; but the Metropolis Local Management Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), under which the works were done, imposes the liability on the defendant Pullen as the owner. Now Pullen could have had no right to open a trench in a public highway, were it not for section 77, which empowers him to carry his drain into the sewer. But if he acts on this power, given him under section 77, he becomes, by section 110, responsible for the due reparation of the pavement. That section imposes a duty on him, and section 111. adds a penalty in case that duty be neglected. But that is not the only remedy. Any one damaged may sue. No part of the penalty goes to the party grieved—section 234; therefore the action remains when damage arises from disobedience to an act of parliament—Couch v. Steel (2). If a privilege is given and a duty imposed on the owner by statute, he cannot relieve himself by employing a contractor to do it—Hole v. the Sittingbourne and Sheerness Railway Company (3), and Pickard v. Smith (4).

H. James, contra.—The defendant Pullen is not liable for the default of Hubble. It is immaterial whether a man is entitled to do an act by force of the statute or of the general law—Overton v. Freeman (5). In Hole v. the Sittingbourne and Sheerness Railway Company (3) it does not appear that the bridge which the contractor built was not the very bridge which the company required him to build. He built a bridge that would not open, and the act required that it should open. If the person authorized to do the act employs a contractor to do a thing contrary to the statute, then the principal would be liable—Ellis v. the Sheffield Gas Company (6). Here the defendant Pullen employed Hubble to do only that which the act authorized. Pullen supposed that the contractor Hubble would perform his contract and fill up the hole properly. He was ignorant that it was not filled up. Hubble's negligence had nothing to do with the contract. In Pickard v. Smith (4) there is nothing to shew that the defendant contracted with the coal-merchant to watch the hole. It was there the duty of the defendant Smith to have the hole duly watched and guarded.

J. Brown, in reply.—The liability of a person at common law rests on negligence either of himself or of his servant. But here the liability rests not on negligence, but on statutory obligation. It is not contended that the statute has not imposed the duty under section 110, nor that Pullen would not be liable to a penalty under section 111. Had Pullen contracted to do the act, and had he employed some one else to do it, the negligence of the sub-contractor would be no answer for Pullen in an action against him. A parliamentary obligation is as great as the obligation of a contract.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court was now (Nov. 29) delivered by—

ERLE, C.J.—In this case the plaintiff declared for damage to his wife from falling into a drain, made in the highway by the defendant. The defendant justified making the drain under a power given by the Metropolis Local Management Act, to make a drain from his premises to a sewer. Upon the trial it appeared that the defendant had lawfully made the drain under that act, that is to say, a trench across the highway, which was the cause of the damage, and had employed a contractor both to make it and fill it up properly, and by the negligence of the contractor the drain was filled up improperly and so the damage was caused. At the trial the verdict was entered against the contractor and for the employer, on the ground that the employer was not responsible for the negligence of the contractor; and so it was decided in the Court below. This is an appeal from that judgment.

The appellant has contended that a duty was imposed on the defendant Pullen, as the owner of the premises, who caused the drain to be made across the highway, to fill up that drain in a proper manner. Section 77, authorizing the making of the drain, implies that the duty to fill it up was also imposed; and section 110. commands that the person who makes it shall fill it up properly. And the appellant contended that the person making the drain is responsible if the duty imposed on him by the statute is not performed, and damage is caused thereby, and that the complaint is of an omission to perform a duty imposed by statute, not of a wrongful act of commission by a contractor beyond the scope of his employment. He relied on Hole v. the Sittingbourne and Sheerness Railway Company (3), where the duty imposed on the defendants by statute was to make a bridge that would open, and they employed a contractor who made a bridge that would not open as the statute required; and the defendants were held liable, on the ground of their omission to perform the duty imposed by statute. There the Chief Baron says, in effect, that a party who undertakes that a work shall be done is not released from liability for breach of his undertaking because he employs a contractor to do it, and the contractor's neglect causes the breach. The obligation imposed by statute is analogous to that created by an undertaking. The omission to perform it is not excused by reason that the party employed a third person as contractor to do it for him, who failed; and he distinguished the case where a contractor in the performance of his contract does a wrongful act not according to his contract, and causes damage thereby: in that case the employer is not responsible. The distinction is also taken by Williams, J. in Pickard v. Smith (4) deciding that the employer allowing a coal-merchant to make an opening in a way for coal is responsible for the negligence of the coal-merchant's men in omitting to close the opening; for the employer was bound to see that the opening should be properly closed, and his omission to perform his duty is not excused by the omission of the agent whom the defendant had employed to act for him. For these reasons it appears to us that the defendant Pullen is not excused from liability for the omission to fill up the drain properly, on the ground that he had employed a contractor to do that duty for him, and that the contractor was negligent and left that duty unperformed. We think that the duty was implied in the grant of the power to open the drain in a highway in section 77, and was expressed in section 110, and that this statutable duty is created absolutely, and is not a duty created by section 111, imposing a penalty to be enforced solely by enforcing the penalty. The penalty imposed by section 111. appears to us to be a cumulative remedy. The question is, whether the verdict should be entered against the defendant Pullen, and we answer that question in the affirmative.

1864. } HELPS AND ANOTHER v. CLAY-
Nov. 10. } TON AND WIFE.

Solicitor and Client—Retainer—Husband and Wife—Costs of Marriage Settlement—Infant—Necessaries.

On the occasion of settling personal property upon a marriage, it is the professional usage for the lady's solicitor to draw the settlement and for the husband to pay for it, although the only property settled is the husband's. And where nothing has taken place to exclude such usage the husband is legally liable, in the event of the marriage taking place, to pay the lady's solicitor his costs of the settlement if the retainer was by the lady, or else to indemnify whoever on her part properly incurred expense by retaining a solicitor to prepare such settlement.

An infant, who has no property of her own to settle, may contract with a solicitor for the preparation of a marriage settlement by her intended husband, under which proper provision is made for her benefit, as such may be considered a necessary suitable to her estate and condition.

This was an action brought by the plaintiffs for money payable by the defendant Charlotte Mary Henrietta, whilst she was sole and unmarried, to the plaintiffs for work done and materials provided by the plaintiffs for the said Charlotte Mary Henrietta whilst she was sole and unmarried, at her request, for fees due and of right payable from the said Charlotte Mary Henrietta, whilst she was sole and unmarried, to the plaintiffs in respect thereof, and for money paid by the plaintiffs for the said Charlotte Mary Henrietta, whilst she was sole and unmarried, at her request.

The defendants pleaded, first, never indebted. Secondly, that at the time of contracting the alleged debt the defendant Charlotte Mary Henrietta was an infant. Thirdly, payment.

The plaintiffs replied to the plea of infancy that the debt was in respect of necessities, and upon this replication and the other pleas issue was joined.

The action came on to be tried, before Erle, C.J., on the 12th of February 1864, when by the consent of parties the jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs for 73*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.*, subject to the following

CASE.

The plaintiffs are attornies and solicitors practising at Gloucester. The defendant Capt. J. W. Clayton was, in the summer of 1862, engaged to be married to his present wife, then about eighteen years of age, and residing at Gloucester with her father, Col. Somerset, with whom she had always resided since her birth. On the 14th of August 1862, Col. Somerset called at the office of the plaintiffs, who had occasionally previously acted as his, Col. Somerset's, solicitors, with a letter from the defendant J. W. Clayton, containing proposals for a settlement in the terms following :

"11, Portman Square.

"Dear Col. Somerset,—I am not a rich man, but am able to settle on your daughter the sum of 10,000*l.* on my marriage. As all the rest of my property is entailed, provision is made under my father's will for my wife and children. I shall be much obliged if you will nominate a trustee, and I refer you to my solicitor, Mr. Charles Barnard, 4, Gray's Inn Place, Gray's Inn. I can also allow the young lady 100*l.* per annum for pin-money. I am, most respectfully yours,
J. W. Clayton."

Col. Somerset instructed the plaintiffs to take the necessary steps in the matter for the lady, his daughter, and named his cousin, Mr. Granville Somerset, as trustee on behalf of the lady, and requested Messrs. Helps to put themselves in communication with him. The plaintiffs acted accordingly, and Mr. Granville Somerset, on behalf of the lady, corresponded with them upon the requirements of the settlement. On the 14th of August 1862 the plaintiffs wrote as follows to Mr. Barnard, the then attorney for Capt. Clayton :

"August 14, 1862.

"Dear Sir,—We are instructed by our client, Col. Somerset, to prepare the settlement on the approaching marriage of his daughter with Capt. Clayton. We understand Capt. Clayton's father proposes to settle 10,000*l.* on the young people, and to allow the lady 100*l.* a year for pin-money. Col. Somerset has been asked to name a trustee, and we are instructed to name his relative, Granville Somerset, of 3, Tanfield Court, Temple, barrister-at-law. Will you kindly at once prepare proposals for the settlement and supply us with an abstract of any will or family settlement, if any such abstract should be required, to shew the title to the money? We understand the marriage is to take place very shortly, we shall therefore be glad to see you as soon as possible. We are, dear sir, yours very faithfully,

"Richard Helps & Son."

"Charles Barnard, Esq.,

"4, Gray's Inn Place, Gray's Inn, London."

To this letter Mr. Barnard replied as follows :

"4, Gray's Inn Place, Gray's Inn,

"August 18, 1862.

"Gentlemen,—I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 14th inst., and I would have answered it before, but that I was out of town. Capt. Clayton some time since instructed me as to the settlement, the draft of which I have already prepared and it is now before conveyancing counsel for settlement. I would submit, independently of the fact of my having prepared the draft, the doing so would devolve on me as representing the intended husband, whose money is to be settled,—from my instructions I did not understand the lady would bring anything into settlement. I will with the draft settlement forward you an abstract of the will of Capt. Clayton's father, under which the Captain takes an estate for life in certain freehold and leasehold estates, with trusts afterwards for the children of the Captain's marriage, and a power is also given to the Captain to appoint a life interest to his wife. You will also be furnished with an abstract of a settlement already made by Capt. Clayton in 1854 on his attaining his majority. This settlement he has the power of revoking on his contemplating marriage. I am, gentlemen, yours faithfully,

"Charles Barnard."

"Messrs. Helps & Son."

To this the plaintiff Richard Helps replied as follows :

"Somerset—Clayton.

"1, Barton Street, Gloucester,

"August 20, 1862.

"Dear Sir,—After I left you I discussed the question raised as to whose duty it was to prepare the settlement with my friend and agent, Mr. Charles Rose Lucas, of 8, New Square, Lincoln's Inn. He states that the lady's solicitor always prepares the settlement. Unless there are two, a personalty settlement and a settlement of the husband's real estate, the settlement on the intended wife is always prepared by her solicitor or the solicitor of her family, and her intended husband has the privilege of paying for her settlement. I am quite satisfied that this is the rule; but if you are not convinced, I shall be happy to leave the question to the President or Council of the Incorporated Law Society, and Mr. Lucas will arrange the matter with you to ask the question personally or by letter. I ought to have mentioned to you that Mr. Granville Somerset, the intended trustee for the lady, has serious objections to trust funds being invested in ordinary shares or stock in any railway, but would not object to Indian railway stock guaranteed by the Indian Government. Yours, very faithfully,

"Richard Helps."

"Charles Barnard, Esq."

The matter was accordingly referred to Mr. Cookson, and that gentleman decided that beyond all doubt the practice in the profession is, that the lady's solicitor should draw up the settlements and that the gentleman has the privilege of paying for them. In this decision Mr. Barnard acquiesced, and the plaintiffs prepared the settlements, and at the request of Mr. Barnard sent their bill to the defendant Capt. Clayton. Mr. Barnard did not, however, at any time previously to the plaintiffs sending in their bill as hereinafter stated, inform the defendant Capt. Clayton thereof, nor did he obtain his concurrence therein or assent thereto.

On the 1st of September 1862, the plaintiff Richard Summer Helps attended Miss Somerset at her father's house to make an appointment with her for the execution by her of the settlements, and on the 3rd of the same month the plaintiff Richard Helps attended with the defendant J. W. Clayton's then attorney, Mr. Barnard, at Tanfield Court, where Miss Somerset and her father, Col. Somerset, signed the settlements, after Mr. Richard Helps had explained to the defendant, Charlotte M. H. Clayton, that they had been approved by her relative and trustee, Mr. Granville Somerset. The agents for the plaintiffs had upon the same day attended upon Capt. Clayton at Mr. Barnard's office, and attested his execution of the settlement in duplicate. Save as above, the plaintiffs had no communication with the defendant Charlotte

M. H. Clayton on the subject of the said settlement.

The marriage took place on the 4th of September 1862.

In the month of April following the plaintiffs sent to the defendant Capt. Clayton their bill for the settlements, when it was returned to them accompanied by the following letter:

"April 24, 1863.

"Gentlemen,—I beg to return you the inclosed account: as I did not retain you to act for me I must decline paying it. I remain, gentlemen, your obedient,

"J. W. Clayton."

"Messrs. Helps & Son."

In consequence of this letter the plaintiffs took advice as to enforcing their claim against Capt. Clayton, and were advised that, although the defendant was liable to pay for his settlement, yet inasmuch as there was no privity between the plaintiffs and Capt. Clayton, that Col. Somerset should pay the amount claimed and that Capt. Clayton should be sued in the name of Col. Somerset as for money paid for his use. The defendant Richard Helps communicated this opinion to Col. Somerset, and requested him to pay the amount. Col. Somerset then gave to the plaintiffs a cheque for 73*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.*, the amount of the bill, and instructed the plaintiffs to sue the defendant J. W. Clayton for money paid to his use; but the plaintiffs in no other way than as above mentioned claimed the money from Col. Somerset, or from any person other than the defendant. An action was commenced accordingly, but before it came on for trial a case was submitted to counsel, who advised that the action as brought by Col. Somerset was not maintainable, and that Col. Somerset's daughter, the defendant Charlotte M. H. Clayton, was in point of law the employer of the plaintiffs, and that the money should be refunded to Col. Somerset. Acting upon this advice the plaintiffs returned the said money to Col. Somerset and brought the present action. The Court is to be at liberty to draw any inferences which a jury would be warranted in arriving at from the facts above stated.

On behalf of the plaintiffs it is contended, that the plaintiffs were retained by and on behalf of the defendant, Charlotte M. H. Clayton, and that the charge for the settlements was as for a necessary supplied to her, suited to her degree and condition, and so was a debt due from her at the time when she intermarried with the defendant J. W. Clayton, and for which the said J. W. Clayton is therefore liable as her husband.

On behalf of the defendants it is contended, that the plaintiffs were not retained by or on behalf of the defendant Charlotte M. H. Clayton, as alleged, and that the charges sought to be recovered by the plaintiffs are not for necessities supplied to the said defendant Charlotte M. H. Clayton, as alleged.

If the Court shall be of opinion that the defendants are liable, the verdict is to stand for the plaintiffs for 73*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.*; if otherwise, the verdict is to be set aside and a verdict entered for the defendants.

Gray, for the plaintiffs (June 25).—The first question is, whether the retainer of the plaintiffs to prepare the marriage settlement was made by Mrs. Clayton or by her father, Col. Somerset, as acting on his own account and not as her agent. The correspondence between the solicitors and the facts stated in the case shew that the plaintiffs acted in the matter as the solicitors for the lady, according to the usage and known rule in the profession, by which the intended husband is liable for the expense of preparing the settlement. The plaintiffs did not look to Col. Somerset as their debtor, nor did he ever make himself personally liable for such expense; but the work was done by the plaintiffs for Mrs. Clayton, and she is clearly shewn to have been privy to what was being done for settling the property on her marriage, and to have sanctioned the same by executing the deed of settlement. The law will imply from this that the work was done for her at her request. The only case bearing on this subject is Hayward v. Fiott (1). There, however, the husband had paid the expenses of his marriage settlement, and the amount in dispute was the expense of a deed of appointment executed by the father of the intended wife, by which he appointed the money to his daughter, which formed the subject-matter of the settlement; and Lord Denman left it to the jury to say whether the preparing such deed of appointment was done by the solicitor on the credit of the father, or of his daughter, who was the defendant's wife. The next question is, as to the plea of payment. There is no evidence to support such plea; what Col. Somerset did was merely to lend himself to an arrangement under which the plaintiffs might, as it was then thought, be better able to recover the amount from the defendant Capt. Clayton, but it was not money paid by him at the request of such defendant or of his wife.

[Huddleston, for the defendants, said he would not rely on the plea of payment.]

Then the only remaining question is, whether the settlement was such a necessary as would make Mrs. Clayton, although an infant, liable for the cost of preparing it. The case of Chapple v. Cooper (2) shews that the test whether the matter is one in respect of which an infant may make a binding contract is whether the infant derives any personal advantage from it. This was clearly a proper settlement and for the benefit of the infant, and she could therefore at law make a binding contract for preparing it.

[WILLIAMS, J. (3) referred to Rainsford v. Fenwick (4).]

Huddleston, for the defendants.—The question is one of fact, namely, to whom did the plaintiffs give credit? The presumption would certainly be that they gave credit either to Capt. Clayton or Col. Somerset rather than to the young lady. Now there is nothing to shew that the retainer was by any one else than Col. Somerset. The plaintiffs had previously acted for him as his solicitors, and he was the person who gave them the instructions for the settlement.

[WILLES, J.—This resembles the case of granting a lease, the custom being for the landlord's solicitor to draw the lease and for the tenant to pay for it. The case of Grissell v. Robinson (5) shews that where the landlord has paid his solicitor his charges for drawing the lease he may recover the amount from the tenant in an action for money paid to his use. It was probably on the authority of that case that the action was first brought by Col. Somerset against Capt. Clayton.]

It certainly was not until after that action that it was alleged that the plaintiffs had given credit to Col. Somerset's daughter. If the marriage had not taken place, would there have been any evidence of liability for these costs with which to have fixed the daughter? It is clear that had the plaintiffs in that event sued her for them, they would have been nonsuited. Then, if she was not liable for these costs before her marriage, her husband cannot be made responsible, as he never retained the plaintiffs or promised in fact to pay them their bill for preparing the settlement. Lastly, Mrs. Clayton being an infant at the time could not make any binding contract for the settlement. The settlement would be of no use to her until she married, and therefore it was no contract for her benefit for which previously to her marriage she could have been liable. In Com. Dig. 'Enfant,' (B. 5), it is said, "necessaries for an infant's wife are necessaries for him, but not if provided in order for the marriage," citing Strange, 168. In Smith v. Gibson (6), it appeared the plaintiff had paid a sum of money as a premium for taking his sister as an apprentice, and she had afterwards, but when still under age, expressed a hope that she would be able to pay him soon. She subsequently married, and in an action against the husband and wife to recover this money as money paid to the use of the wife before coverture, Lord Kenyon declared that this money could not be considered as necessaries, and that therefore the payment of it could not be enforced in such action.

Gray replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court was delivered on the 10th of November by—

WILLES, J.—This case was well argued at the Sittings after Trinity Term, by Mr. Gray, for the plaintiffs, and Mr. Huddleston, for the defendants, before my Brothers

(6) Peake Ad. C. 52: cited in Chitty on Contracts, 7th ed. p. 138.

Byles and Keating and myself, when we took time to consider. It was an action brought by solicitors to recover the costs of preparing a settlement upon the marriage of the defendants, claimed as a debt payable by the defendant Mrs. Clayton, her husband being made a defendant for conformity only. The pleadings raise two questions, first, whether there was any debt incurred by Mrs. Clayton in respect of these costs; secondly, whether, if it was incurred by her, infancy is a bar. The plea of payment was properly abandoned. These are the only questions; and they affect the liability of the wife alone. No question as to who is liable, if she be not, is directly in issue. The marriage took place in September 1862. At that time Mrs. Clayton was about eighteen, and up to that time she had from her childhood lived in her father's house as one of his family, and, as must be presumed in the absence of any statement to the contrary, upon the same terms as an unmarried daughter without property of her own usually lives under her father's roof, that is to say, at his expense.

The settlement was altogether of personal property of the husband, viz. 10,000*l.*, and 100*l.* a year for pin-money. It must be taken to have been a proper settlement, and such as was beneficial to the lady as well as the gentleman; and we should therefore feel little difficulty in dealing with the question of infancy, assuming that of retainer to be decided in favour of the plaintiffs.

The instructions for the settlement were given to the plaintiffs by the lady's father, who had occasionally previously employed them as his solicitors. At the time, he handed them the letter of the intended husband proposing the settlement, and referring to his solicitor.

A correspondence ensued between the plaintiffs and the solicitor named by the husband, in which each claimed the right to prepare the settlement. In the end, they agreed to refer the matter to Mr. Cookson, who decided that beyond all doubt the practice in the profession is,—the lady's solicitor should draw the settlements, adding that the gentleman should have the privilege of paying for them. Of the correctness of this opinion, as to settlements of personal property, such as that under consideration, no doubt was, or properly could be, suggested. Accordingly, the husband's solicitor gave way, and the settlement was prepared by the plaintiffs, under the direction of the trustee named by the father on behalf of the lady; and it was executed by both the defendants previously to their marriage. In allowing the settlement to be prepared by the plaintiffs, the husband's solicitor acted, it is true, without any positive or express authority from his client; but he did so in the exercise of a just discretion, and acting within the scope, as it appears to us, of his retainer to act for the intended husband, which involved an authority to do what was right and usual on his behalf in the business.

We think the reference by Capt. Clayton to his solicitor cannot properly be construed as excluding the ordinary usage. Indeed, his employing a solicitor of his own in the first instance, if he thought the settlement was to be prepared by that gentleman, shews that he knew the expense was in some shape to fall upon himself. He might naturally employ a solicitor to see that the settlement, by whomsoever it was prepared, was properly expressed. His reference to his "solicitor, Mr. Charles Barnard," in his letter proposing the settlement, moreover, was of itself a warrant for the lady's friends to deal with Mr. Barnard as having authority, acting on his behalf, to do and consent to all that was right and usual in such a transaction; and no secret instructions could affect that prima facie authority. That Capt. Clayton ought to pay the plaintiffs, therefore, we entertain no doubt. And we further consider that the duty to do so is not merely an honorary obligation on his part, but also a legal liability arising out of the ordinary course of business, by which in such a case the solicitor employed on the part of the lady is to prepare the settlement, and the gentleman is to pay the bill.

In order to determine the present case, it will be necessary to consider, in the first place, the origin of this liability, whether as upon an original liability of the husband to the solicitor, who is to be considered his for this purpose, or only as a liability to reimburse the expenses of the settlement which the lady or her father, or person standing in the place of a parent, may have incurred. We think the latter to be the correct view. The employment of the lady's solicitor to prepare the settlement is not a mere compliment or matter of patronage; it has also the substantial object of satisfying the lady's friends that all proper care has been exercised on her behalf by some person in whom they confide, and of giving a remedy for negligence by action against the solicitor. He does not the less act as the solicitor of the lady or her parent, because the intended husband is to be ultimately liable, in the event of the marriage taking place.

The proper conclusion, therefore, is, that the retainer is to be considered as that of the lady or her parent, as the case may be, but that usage makes the husband liable to indemnify whoever on the part of the wife has properly incurred expense by retaining the solicitor to prepare a settlement in the propriety of which the latter has so large an interest. This precise question is, as might be expected, bare of authority: but the ordinary case of a lease, which in practice is prepared by the landlord's solicitor, and paid for by the tenant, furnishes an analogy. In such a case, if the landlord pays, upon the default of the tenant, the former may upon the usage maintain an action against the latter for the money paid — Grissell v. Robinson (5). Such was the nature of the action brought by Col. Somerset in this case, to which there was no answer, if the retainer was by him on his own account, and not as agent on the behalf of his daughter. That action was abandoned, upon the notion that in point of law the retainer was by Mrs. Clayton before her marriage, and that the claim therefore should be made in the present form.

From the above it follows that either the defendant was liable in the abandoned action, or that the defendants are liable in this. It further follows that the liability turns upon the question whether the work was done upon the retainer of Col. Somerset as acting for himself or as agent for and on behalf of his daughter. In the former case, judgment for the defendants, upon the ground that Mrs. Clayton is not liable, though Capt. Clayton is. In the latter, judgment for the plaintiffs, upon the ground that Mrs. Clayton is liable.

The question upon which the decision of the case thus turns is one of fact, which a jury, upon ascertaining that Capt. Clayton was at all events ultimately liable, would probably make short work of. The parties, however, have substituted the Court for the jury; and we are bound to give a verdict upon that question of fact in accordance, so far as the form of the question allows, with the merits of the case, and such as, if given by a jury, we should not have felt dissatisfied with or set aside as being contrary to the weight of evidence.

Now, the evidence to make out that Col. Somerset was the proper and only client of the plaintiffs, was, his instructing them in person in the first instance, and naming the trustee, taken in connexion with the fact that the young lady was a minor and a member of her father's family, living as to all ordinary wants at his expense.

The evidence to prove Mrs. Clayton liable, on the other hand, was, that the instructions were given by her father and by the trustee on her behalf, that, knowing, as she must have done, that a settlement was being prepared, she authorized and ratified those instructions by signing the settlement when prepared, and that after all she was the person most and principally interested. The expense thus incurred was not part of the ordinary continuous outgoings for clothing, food, and such like, for which the paterfamilias would have the bills sent in to him as a matter of course. It was an occasion of a single and, though not extraordinary, exceptional character, in which it was not unreasonable or improbable that the person to be chiefly benefited should incur a liability which the fact of the marriage would transfer to the shoulders of the person who ultimately ought to bear it.

In these circumstances, we think it may justly be concluded that there was a retainer by Mrs. Clayton as a principal, through her father, who acted on her behalf as her agent, and disclosed his principal at the time.

Upon the remaining question, that of infancy, we have already stated our opinion. The principal contract of marriage was one which it was competent for an infant to enter upon. She had no property to settle, and would have had no certain provision without the settlement, and the preparation of the settlement was therefore beneficial, as securing to her, at her election, a proper provision, which may justly be considered a necessary suitable to her estate and condition.

It would be a perversion of the law for the protection of infants, to hold that under these circumstances an infant could not contract for the preparation of such a settlement. Whether the provisions in the settlement may be said absolutely to bind her, it is unnecessary to consider; because, so far as all other parties are concerned, she is thereby secured against want. For these reasons, our judgment is for the plaintiffs.

LINDLEY v. LACEY.

Evidence — Written Agreement — Parol Agreement.

The plaintiff agreed in writing to purchase certain furniture of the defendant, and by that agreement the defendant was authorized to settle an action of C. v. L. In an action, by the plaintiff, against the defendant, for not settling the action of C. v. L., evidence was offered and received of a distinct oral agreement to settle that action, made on the same occasion as, and immediately before the written agreement. The jury found that such an oral agreement was made:—Held, that the evidence was admissible, and that on the finding of the jury the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict.

This was an action tried, before Erle, C.J., at the Sittings at Westminster after last Easter Term.

The plaintiff was the keeper of a refreshment-house at No. 3, Agar Street, West Strand. The defendant had formerly occupied the same premises, and he underlet them to the plaintiff, and sold him the furniture therein.

Previously to the making of the agreement hereinafter mentioned the plaintiff had accepted a bill of exchange for 25*l.*, which became due on the 16th of June 1863; the plaintiff was sued on this bill by Chase, the holder of it, and thereupon the defendant said he would find the money to meet this bill if the plaintiff would persuade the landlord to forbear pressing for the rent of the premises, for which the defendant was still liable. The plaintiff did this, whereupon a further arrangement was discussed for the plaintiff giving up the premises to the defendant and a re-sale of the furniture. Ultimately, a memorandum of agreement was drawn up, but before signing it the plaintiff said, "Am I to understand Chase's bill is to be settled, because that is the groundwork of the whole?" The defendant replied that it should be settled, and the plaintiff then signed the agreement.

The agreement was as follows: "It is agreed by and between the parties hereto that Lindley shall sell, and Lacey shall purchase of Lindley, all the furniture, fittings, fixtures, utensils and other things now on the premises No. 3, Agar Street, aforesaid, for the sum of 145*l.*, to be paid for on Lacey finding a customer and being paid for the property, or on his receiving the amount of life policy, whichever event first happened, the said goods not to be considered as Lacey's property until the said sum of 145*l.* be paid to Lindley, but remain vested in Lindley until such sum of 145*l.* be paid, and be merely in Lacey's care on Lindley's behalf until paid for as aforesaid. In the mean time Lindley authorizes Lacey to settle the action Chase v. Lindley, and also to pay the rent now due to Mr. Phythian, such payments to be on account of the 145*l.* and form part of the same, but the whole of the goods to continue absolutely the property of Lindley until the sum of 145*l.* be satisfied. Lacey hereby releases Lindley from the tenancy of the premises from this day, and Lindley gives up to Lacey possession thereof. And it is declared by Lindley that he has full power and right to dispose of the goods to Lacey as aforesaid, that he has no judgment or incumbrance thereon which may vitiate the sale to Lacey, so that on the amount of 145*l.* being satisfied the goods shall then be the property of Lacey absolutely."

The defendant immediately took possession of the house and furniture under the agreement, but he did not settle the action of Chase v. Lindley, and soon after the sheriff seized the furniture under a fiat facias issued in that action, and sold it.

The plaintiff thereupon brought this action, and one count in the declaration alleged the breach of an agreement to settle the action of Chase v. Lindley. The defendant at the trial objected that the memorandum of agreement above set out did not contain any undertaking by the defendant to settle that action, and that parol evidence of any previous conversation to shew such an undertaking was inadmissible.

The plaintiff contended that evidence was admissible to shew a distinct preliminary agreement, and that whether or not there was such an agreement was a question for the jury.

The learned Judge so ruled, and asked the jury whether there was an agreement to the effect relied on by the plaintiff; and they found that there was such an agreement.

Leave was reserved to the defendant to move to enter the verdict for him, if evidence of the oral bargain was inadmissible (1).

Joyce having obtained a rule accordingly,—

Hayes, Serj. and Grantham shewed cause.—This evidence was admissible. The rule which excludes oral evidence to vary a written contract is not in question. The parties here made two distinct agreements: one relating to the action of Chase v. Lindley, the other relating to the sale of the furniture. This is like the cases of White v. Parkins (2), Harris v. Rickett (3) and Green v. Saddington (4).

[KEATING, J.—It is not unlike the case of Wallis v. Littell (5) in this court.]

The principle is the same. The question is concluded by the finding of the jury.

Joyce, in support of the rule.—The question is not concluded by the finding of the jury. It is a question of law whether the evidence is admissible. If such evidence is admitted, the entire rule which excludes oral evidence must fall to the ground. The written agreement is not silent on the subject of the action of Chase v. Lindley; it defines the intention of the parties in reference thereto; namely, that the defendant shall be authorized to settle it. That is inconsistent with his being under an obligation to settle it.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule ought to be discharged. The plaintiff and the defendant had considerable negotiation about a treaty for the sale of certain goods. The whole matter originated in the action brought by Chase against the plaintiff, on the acceptance of the latter. If this action had been allowed to proceed, in all probability the goods, which are the subject of the present action, would have been taken by the sheriff under a writ of fiery facias, and the good-will of the business would have been destroyed. To prevent this, the defendant proposed that the plaintiff should let him have these goods on credit, and it was ultimately agreed that this should be done. There was also a distinct agreement between the parties that Lacey should take up the acceptance held by Chase, and so stay the action of Chase v. Lindley. If that action had gone on, the furniture would have been seized, and the whole intention of the parties would have been frustrated. The jury believed the plaintiff; and his version of the transaction was, that there was a distinct collateral agreement that the defendant should take up the bill. The plaintiff asked the defendant, "Am I to understand that Chase's bill is to be settled?" and added, "that is the groundwork of the whole." The defendant answered that it should be settled. Afterwards the agreement was signed. It is clear that taking up Chase's bill was a distinct preliminary matter, which was to be done quamprius. I take the case to be, in effect, the same as if there was a written agreement ready to be signed, and that one of the parties said to the other, "If you will put your name to that, I will do so and so."

It is not necessary to go through the numerous cases. The question is, does it appear from the written instrument that it was meant to contain the whole that was intended to be binding between the parties? If so, nothing can be added to it. If this does not appear, then an agreement upon a distinct matter may be shewn to have been made orally, and may be enforced. In Harris v. Rickett (3) such an oral agreement was made before the written agreement. In Davis v. Jones (6) and Wallis v. Littell (5) the oral agreement and the written agreement were contemporaneous. Whether the oral agreement precede or be contemporaneous with the agreement is of no consequence, provided it be on a distinct collateral matter. What the plaintiff here said amounted to this: "I will not enter into any contract with you until Chase's matter is settled;" and the defendant thereupon promised that Chase's matter should be settled. I think that is a promise which, though oral, and though followed by a written agreement, the plaintiff is able to enforce.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. There is here a prior agreement relating to a bill of exchange, with which the subsequent written agreement did not, in any way, interfere. The jury have found that the defendant bound himself by a distinct oral agreement to take up Chase's bill, and upon this the written contract is wholly silent. Harris v. Ricketts (3) is therefore precisely in point. But, independently of that case, there is a series of cases, beginning with Davis v. Jones (6) and Pym v. Campbell (7), and followed very recently in Wallis v. Littell (5) in this court, which shew that evidence may be given of an oral agreement which constitutes a condition on which the performance of the written agreement is to depend; and if evidence may be given of an oral agreement which affects the performance of the written one, surely evidence may be given of a distinct oral agreement upon a matter on which the written contract is silent.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is, whether the facts shew that it was the intention of the parties to make a distinct preliminary agreement. I think the facts do shew that such was the intention. In effect, the transaction appeared to be this: the plaintiff was about to call his creditors together; that did not suit the defendant, and he proposed an arrangement for preventing this. The plaintiff, however, refused to enter into any arrangement unless Chase's bill was paid, and the action stopped. This the defendant agreed to by a separate and distinct oral agreement, and the negotiation which ended in the written agreement then proceeded. This is a distinct agreement, which the plaintiff is entitled to enforce.

v. NIEMANN.

Shipping — Bill of Lading — Charter-Party—King's Enemies.

The defendant by his bill of lading, signed at Odessa, undertook to convey a cargo from thence to the United Kingdom, to call at Cork or Falmouth for orders, for the plaintiffs, merchants residing at Odessa. The ship was a Mecklenburg ship, and the bill of lading contained the following clause, "the act of God, the king's enemies, fire and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers and navigation of what nature and kind soever excepted, unto order and assigns, paying freight for the said goods and all other conditions as per charter-party." In the charter-party the exception was for "the act of God, enemies, fire, restraint of princes, and all and every dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers and navigation of what nature or kind soever during the said voyage":—Held, that the words "the king's enemies" in the bill of lading must be understood to include at least the enemies of the sovereign of the carrier, namely, the Duke of Mecklenburg.

Held also, that, if the defendant required any further protection, he was not entitled to rely on the words "restraint of princes" in the charter-party, for that these words were not incorporated in the bill of lading, by reason of the reference to the charter-party therein contained.

The declaration stated, that the plaintiffs sued the defendant, for that, after the 14th of August 1855, certain persons in parts beyond the seas, to wit, Messrs. George Kellner & Co., at Odessa, delivered to the defendant certain goods, to wit,

3,325 chetverts fine Polish wheat, in bulk, and 850 dunnage mats, to be by the defendant carried and conveyed in a certain ship of the defendant's, from Odessa to Cork or Falmouth, for orders, and thence to one of certain ports as ordered, under a certain bill of lading signed for the same by the defendant, whereby the defendant agreed to carry the said goods, and deliver the same at the port of destination, (the act of God, the king's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers and navigation, of what nature and kind soever excepted,) to the order of the said persons, or to their assigns, paying freight for the said goods and all other conditions as per charter-party, dated Odessa, the 13/25th of October 1863, with average accustomed. That afterwards, and after the said 14th of August 1855, the said persons indorsed the said bill of lading to the plaintiffs, in order to pass the property in such goods to the plaintiffs; and that thereupon, and by reason of such indorsement, the property in the said goods passed to the plaintiffs. That the said ship proceeded with the said goods on board to Falmouth for orders, and was there duly ordered by the plaintiffs to proceed with the cargo to Limerick, and there deliver the said cargo, the same being a port to which the said ship was bound to proceed, agreeably to the terms of the said bill of lading and charter-party. General averment of performance of conditions precedent. Breach, that the defendant, although not prevented by any of the excepted perils, made default in obeying the said orders and proceeding with the said cargo to Limerick, in pursuance of the terms of the said bill of lading and charter-party, whereby the plaintiffs have lost the profits they would have gained if the defendant had proceeded to Limerick with the said cargo, agreeably to the said orders and the terms of the said bill of lading; and the plaintiffs have also thereby sustained great risk of the cargo heating and deteriorating in value.

Fifth plea, that the said charter-party was in the words, letters and figures following, that is to say, "Odessa, the 13/25th October 1863. It is this day mutually agreed between Captain H. F. Niemann, of the good ship or vessel Vorwarts, 3/3 French

* Decided in the Sittings after Trinity Term.

Veritas, of 3,500 chetverts wheat or thereabouts, under Mecklenburg colours, now in this port discharging her cargo of coals, and Messrs. George Kellner & Co., merchants and charterers of said vessel, that the said ship, being tight, staunch and strong, and in every way fitted for the voyage, shall receive from the said merchants a full and complete cargo of tallow, wheat, seed, or other stowage goods or grain, oats excepted, all or either at the option of the charterers, not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackle, apparel, provisions and furniture; and being so loaded, shall therewith proceed to a safe port in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, north-west coast of Ireland excepted, or on the continent, between Havre and Hamburg, both inclusive, Belgium excepted, or so near thereto as she may safely get, where the ship can always lay afloat, calling at Cork or Falmouth at the master's option for orders, (which are to be given by return of post in reply to the master's letter to the charterer's agents in London, or lay days to commence,) unless ordered direct at port of loading, and deliver the same, on being paid freight as follows: viz., from Odessa to the United Kingdom, 41s. 6d., to the ports between Havre and Hamburg, with 10% per cent. additional sterling money for tallow per ton of 20 cwt. gross delivered, stowage goods, seed or grain in proportion, according to the London and Baltic printed rates, being in full of all port charges and pilotages as customary. The freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo, all in cash, free of interest, discount and commission. The cargo is to be brought to and to be taken from alongside the ship at merchant's risk and expense, the captain rendering the usual assistance with his boats and crew (the act of God, enemies, fire, restraint of princes, and all and every dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers and navigation of what nature or kind soever during the said voyage, always mutually excepted). Indian corn pays same freight as wheat; mats for dunnage, if any required, to be furnished by charterers, wood, &c. by ship. Forty running days are to be allowed the said freighters (if the ship be not sooner despatched) for loading and unloading, and if one-third or more of the cargo consists of wool, ten additional lay days to be allowed, to commence in each case when in every respect ready and by the local authorities permitted to load or discharge, of which notice is to be given in writing to the charterer or his agent, and after the expiration of the said lay days, ten days on demurrage to be allowed, at the rate of 7% sterling per day, and payable day by day, detention by frost or quarantine not to be reckoned as lay days; cash for ship's use at Odessa, not exceeding 200% sterling, to be advanced to the master free of interest and commission, subject to insurance, and to be deducted from the freight upon payment thereof. It is further agreed that should the whole or any part of the cargo consist of grain or seed, and any part of it be delivered in a damaged condition, the freight shall be payable on the invoice quantity taken on board as per bill of lading, or half freight on the damaged portion, at captain's option. The charterer's liability to cease as soon as the cargo is shipped (provided it be of sufficient value to cover the freight at port of discharge), the master and owners having an absolute lien upon the cargo, for all freight, dead freight and demurrage. The ship is to be free of commission at port of discharge. Penalty for non-performance of this agreement, half amount of freight."

And the defendant says, that the said bill of lading was and is in the words, letters and figures following, that is to say: "Shipped in good order and well conditioned, by George Kellner & Co., to, in and upon the good ship called the Vorwarts, whereof is master for this present voyage H. F. Niemann, and now riding at anchor in the port of Odessa, bound for Cork or Falmouth for orders, 3,325 (three thousand, three hundred and twenty-five) chetverts fine Polish wheat in bulk, and 850 mats for dunnage, being marked and numbered as in the margin, and are to be delivered in the like good order, and well conditioned, at the aforesaid port of destination (the act of God, the king's enemies, fire and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers and navigation, of what nature and kind soever, excepted), unto order and assigns; paying freight for the said goods, and all other conditions as per charter-party. Dated Odessa, the 13/25th of October 1863, with average accustomed." Averment, that the owners of the said ship and the defendant were respectively subjects of the Duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, and the said ship was a Mecklenburg ship sailing under Mecklenburg colours, and that the default complained of was caused by the act of the enemies of the said Duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, being the king's enemies, within the true intent and meaning of the said bill of lading.

Sixth plea, that the said charter-party and bill of lading were respectively as in the fifth plea set out, and that the default complained of was caused by the act of enemies during the voyage, within the true meaning of the said charter-party.

Seventh plea, that the said charter-party and bill of lading were respectively as in the fifth plea set out, and that the default complained of was caused by the restraint of princes, during the voyage, within the true meaning of the said charter-party.

Second replication to the fifth plea, that the said charter-party and bill of lading were respectively made and signed at Odessa, in the empire of Russia, and that the said Messrs. George Kellner & Co. were not, nor were, nor was any or either of them a subject or subjects of the said Duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin.

The declaration, the pleas, and the replication were demurred to.

The plaintiffs' points were :

1. That the bill of lading expressly states that the goods are to be carried to the port of destination; and it appears by the declaration that the port of destination was to be determined by orders at Cork or Falmouth.

2. That the declaration shews that the ship was duly ordered by the plaintiffs, at Falmouth, to proceed to Limerick, and the plaintiffs, as the holders of the bill of lading, were the proper persons to give the orders.

3. That the declaration avers general performance of all conditions precedent, and consequently if any orders from a third party were necessary, they must be considered as having been given.

That the fifth plea is bad, for the following reasons :

1. That the enemies of the Duke of Mecklenburg are not the king's enemies within the meaning of the bill of lading, merely because the ship was sailing under Mecklenburg colours.

2. That the fact of one party to the contract being a Mecklenburg subject is no ground for putting a construction upon the words "king's enemies" other than that which prima facie belongs to them.

3. That the fifth plea, if good, is sufficiently answered by the second replication, which shews that the shippers were not Mecklenburg subjects, and that the contract was made in another country, videlicet, in Russia.

That the sixth and seventh pleas are bad, for the following reasons :

1. That the bill of lading itself specifies the perils from which the carrier is to be free, and the question of liability or non-liability of the shipowner is to be determined by reference to the bill of lading only.

2. That the words contained in the bill of lading, "other conditions as per charter-party," only apply to matters not expressly provided for by the bill of lading, and consequently, the exception of certain perils contained in the charter-party is not incorporated in the bill of lading.

The defendant's points were :

1. That the only orders which the defendant undertook to obey at Cork or Falmouth were the orders of the charterers, Messrs. Kellner & Co., and not the orders of the plaintiffs, or of the holder of any bill of lading.

2. That it does not appear that the said charterers or their agents gave the defendant any orders, or that the defendant disobeyed any orders given by them.

3. That the defendant did not, by the bill of lading, undertake to deliver at any port as ordered by the plaintiffs; and that if the plaintiffs rely on the charter-party imposing on the defendant any such obligation, the declaration does not shew that it contained any such stipulation.

4. That the plaintiffs are not entitled, as assignees of the bill of lading, to sue on a contract not contained in it. On the argument of the demurrer to the sixth and seventh pleas respectively, the defendant will contend that the same are good, on the ground that if the charter-party and bill of lading are to be construed together for any purpose, they must be so for all, and therefore, that the excepted perils mentioned in the charter-party, so far as they are not inconsistent with those in the bill of lading, must be given effect to. On the argument of the demurrer to the second replication to the fifth plea the defendant will contend that the same is bad, on the ground, amongst others, that it is immaterial of what country the charterers were, inasmuch as the exceptions of perils in the charter-party and bill of lading are inserted for the protection of the shipowner, and that, therefore, the exception of king's enemies must be read as meaning either any enemies whatever, or enemies of the sovereign of the country to which the ship and owner belong.

Honyman (Lush with him), for the plaintiffs.

Mellish, for the defendant.

Honyman, in reply.

WILLES, J.—This is an action on a bill of lading upon a ship bound from Odessa to the United Kingdom, to call at Cork or Falmouth for orders, and the declaration states that the order was given (we must now assume properly given) and that that order was disobeyed.

The defendant relies upon two points: first of all, he says, he was prevented from obeying the order given him by the act of the enemies of his sovereign the Duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, and he says that the bill of lading contains an exception which includes the acts of such enemies. That is the first point. The other point on which he relies, failing the first, is this: that the bill of lading was given to convey goods upon a voyage in respect of which there was a charter-party, and by the terms of the bill of lading the charter-party is incorporated therewith, so that the defendant is entitled to rely on the larger exception in the charter-party, which he says includes the act of the enemies of his sovereign, and also includes certain other acts by which in a subsequent plea he says he was prevented from obeying the order which otherwise would have been lawful.

As to the first point, we agree with the argument which has been addressed to the Court on the part of the defendant. It turns on the construction to be put on the words in the bill of lading "the king's enemies." It is necessary to take into consideration the circumstances under which the bill of lading was signed in order properly to apply those words. It appears that a bill of lading was signed at Odessa in the empire of Russia, and the shippers appear to be merchants there; otherwise, we have no account of their nationality. There is no reason for coming to the conclusion that they were either English, or Russians, or Germans; the ship was a Mecklenburg ship; her owners were Mecklenburg people. The destination of the vessel was English. You are to choose between three persons who will equally satisfy the word "king" in the document. You have the Emperor of Russia, who strictly would not be called a king; you have the Queen of England, who strictly would not be called a king, although I believe that Queen Elizabeth in much more formal documents was more than once spoken of as a king; and you have the Duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, who in strictness may also be said not to be a king. But the word "king" in these documents frequently denotes a sovereign capable of making war, or upon whom war could be made, and each of the three persons I have mentioned was equally a king in that sense. Taking into consideration the persons who made the contract, and the place where it was made, Odessa, is that any reason for saying that it is the enemies of the Emperor of Russia? Then you have the destination—England: are you, therefore, to say it must mean the Queen's enemies, although neither of the parties appears to have been an English subject? The person who signed this document and made this stipulation for himself, was a subject of the Duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, and that appears to be an abundantly sufficient reason why he was stipulating against dangers which might happen to him, from his own enemies rather than the enemies of other people. It expresses that by saying my king's enemies, my sovereign's enemies, the enemies of the Duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin. I own therefore it appears to me that the good sense of the case is that "the king's enemies" at least includes the enemies of the sovereign of the person who made this stipulation in the bill of lading. Accordingly, if it was owing to the enemies of that sovereign prince that the order was not obeyed, and we must take it to be so on this record, judgment ought to be for the defendant.

The other question turns on the meaning of the expression in the bill of lading, "paying freight for the said goods and all other conditions as per charter-party." Now, if that means that they are to be bound by all other conditions as per charter-party, of course the exception in the charter-party would be introduced; but if it only means paying freight for the said goods, and fulfilling all other conditions as per charter-party, then it would only incorporate such matters as would be fulfilled by the shipper, and not an exception which was at variance with the exception in the bill of lading. That is the question upon the second set of pleas, and if it should be necessary for us to give our judgment upon that, I shall be prepared to state my opinion in the morning. Counsel will then be good enough to say whether, upon this point, they require the formal judgment of the Court.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the word "enemies," at least, includes the enemies of the carrier. If it is not specially directed to the enemies of the carrier, at all events it includes them. The "king's enemies" means the enemies of the carrier's sovereign, whatever title he may enjoy, whether queen, emperor, president, duke, doge, or aristocratic assembly; and lest there should be anything left out, "restraint of princes," I should conceive, comprehends every case of interruption by lawful authority, leaving, as has been observed in the course of the argument, the case of pirates to be provided for under the other exception. It has been settled by the highest authority that pirates are to be reckoned amongst the dangers of the seas. In a case of Pickering v. Barkley, in the 24th of Charles the First, before Rolle, Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, the question arose in an action on a charter-party, under seal, and Hale contended that to be robbed by pirates is a danger of the sea, even as tempestuous winds and shelves and rocks are; and Rolle said, "I suppose that pirates are perils of the sea," and the report continues thus:—and to this purpose a certificate of merchants was read in court that they were so esteemed amongst merchants. Yet the Court desired to have Granly, the Master of the Trinity House, and other sufficient merchants, to be brought into court, to satisfy the Court visâ voce Friday next following. Judgment was given this term nil capiat per billam, because the taking by pirates are accounted perils of the sea; and the same law is laid down in Barton v. Walliford, in Comberbach's Reports, p. 57, in the 3rd of James the Second. So that those three exceptions, the king's enemies, restraint of princes, and perils of the sea, seem to include every species of vis major; and by the technical rules of our law it is necessary to guard against incidents of this nature by express words.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. The exception being introduced in favour of the carrier, the contract appears to be simply this: I will carry your goods safely in my ship, if I am not prevented from doing so by the enemies of my sovereign.

On the 25th of June the following judgment was delivered:—

WILLES, J.—We disposed of the first question yesterday. The other question is, whether the exception in the bill of lading is to be considered as expanded by the exception in the charter-party. That depends on whether the words "all other conditions as per charter-party" are to be taken as introducing into the contract by the bill of lading all the provisions of the charter-party; or whether, looking to the preceding words, "paying freight for the said goods, and all other conditions, as per charter-party," they are not to be taken as limited by the context to conditions ejusdem generis with that for the payment of the freight, namely, conditions to be performed by the person who receives the goods at the port of discharge. It is merely a question of construction; and it is enough to say that the latter is the construction which, upon consideration, we adopt. With reference to the convenience of trying this cause, and, if necessary, to enable Mr. Mellish's clients to take the opinion of a Court of error upon the point whether the words in the charter-party were or were not incorporated in the bill of lading, it is better to keep these pleas together, and to give judgment on those two for the plaintiff. Mr. Mellish's client will keep the judgment that was given for him yesterday upon the fifth plea.

The other members of the COURT concurred.

Judgment accordingly.

1864. { INCHBALD v. THE WESTERN
Nov. 10. { NEILGHERRY COFFEE, TEA AND CINCHONA COMPANY (LIMITED).

Contract—Performance.

*The defendants, a public company, employed the plaintiff, a broker, to dispose of their shares on the terms, that he should be paid 100*l.* down, and 400*l.* in addition, upon the allotment of the whole of the shares of the company. The plaintiff disposed of a considerable number of shares, when the defendants wound up the company:—Held, by the Court, which had power to draw inferences of fact, that the plaintiff was prevented earning the 400*l.* by the act of the company, and was therefore entitled to recover a proportion of the 400*l.

This was an action tried, before Williams, J., at the Sittings in London after Easter Term.

The declaration contained the common counts for work, labour and commission as a broker; and also a special count alleging that it was agreed between the plaintiff and the defendants that the plaintiff should become stockbroker to the defendants in and about the selling and disposing of shares in the said company for reward to the plaintiff in that behalf, to be paid by the defendants, that is to say, 100*l.* to be paid down, and 400*l.* in addition on the allotment of the whole of the shares of the said company; and thereupon, in consideration of the premises and that the plaintiff then promised the defendants to fulfil the said agreement on his behalf, the defendants then promised the plaintiff to permit and suffer him to act as such broker, and to sell and dispose of the said shares for the defendants as aforesaid. General averment of conditions precedent. Breach, that the defendants, without any reasonable cause or reason, wrongfully refused to permit the plaintiff to act as such broker, or to sell and dispose of the said shares for the defendants as aforesaid, whereby the plaintiff was prevented from earning the said sum of 400*l.* so to be paid to him in addition as aforesaid.

The defendants pleaded to the first count never indebted and payment, and to the second count, non assumpsit and a traverse of the breach.

The plaintiff was a stockbroker, and the defendants were a company formed for the purpose of acquiring property and carrying on the operations which their name indicated in the East Indies.

Towards the end of the year 1862, after communication with the plaintiff, the board of directors passed a resolution that the plaintiff should be appointed stockbroker to the company on the following terms, namely, 100*l.* to be paid down and 400*l.* in addition on the allotment of the whole of the shares of the company.

The plaintiff accepted the appointment, and was paid the 100*l.* He immediately proceeded to take measures for disposing of the shares of the company. The capital consisted of 50,000*l.* in 10,000 shares. An arrangement was made for the purchase of the property, by which the vendor was to take 2,000 shares in part payment, leaving 8,000 shares to be disposed of in the market.

A considerable number of these shares had been applied for previously to the month of January 1863, when, at a meeting of the directors, at which the plaintiff was present, some of the directors expressed an intention of taking up the remainder of the shares amongst themselves.

In the month of May following, in consequence of the authority of the person with whom the directors had dealt for the purchase of the estates not having been ratified, the directors sent a circular to the shareholders informing them that the company would be wound up and the deposits returned in full with interest.

The directors had been for some time aware of the difficulty about the purchase, but neither then nor at any other time had any communication with the plaintiff on the subject.

The plaintiff, however, having heard that the company was wound up from another quarter, demanded payment of the 400*l.*, but the defendants refused to pay him anything; he, thereupon, brought this action for a breach of the agreement contained in the resolution. The defendants relied for their defence on the fact, that all the shares had not been allotted, which was the event upon which the 400*l.* was to become payable.

It was agreed that the verdict should be entered for the plaintiff, and that the whole question of whether the plaintiff was entitled to recover, and what amount, should be reserved for the opinion of the Court, with power to draw inferences of fact.

E. James, in Trinity Term, obtained a rule calling upon the plaintiff to shew cause why the verdict should not be entered for the defendant, on the ground that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover.

Karslake and H. James shewed cause.—The plaintiff is entitled to recover on the principle of Planché v. Colburn (1) and Prickett v. Badger (2). That principle is, that if A. contracts with B. to do something for the benefit of B, for reward to be paid by B, and B. himself prevents the execution of the contract, the result is the same as if the contract had been executed. The payment which was to have been due upon the execution of the contract may be enforced, and the non-performance cannot be set up as a defence.

[WILLES, J.—In Moffatt v. Laurie (3) the plaintiff agreed to perform certain services as an architect for the defendants, the owners of certain land, for which no charge was to be made; but in the event of the land being disposed of for building purposes, the plaintiff was to be appointed architect. There it was held, that the plaintiff could not recover from the defendants, although they had themselves put it out of their power to dispose of the land for building purposes by disposing of it in some other way.]

It is a question of construction; there, taking the contract with the surrounding circumstances, the Court thought that the intention was to leave the defendants perfectly free as to the mode in which the property was to be disposed of. It would be unreasonable that a man should be bound to dispose of a large estate in a particular manner merely to enable an architect to earn his commission. Here the reasonable construction is, that the company when they appointed the broker impliedly undertook to give him an opportunity of earning the reward for his trouble in placing the shares.

Prentice, in support of the rule.—Taking this as a question of construction, the defendants are entitled to succeed. The money is payable on the allotment of the whole of the shares of the company. That is not done. Then, how can the plaintiff recover? Not on the special contract, for that is not performed. Not on the implied contract which generally arises from the performance of a service at the request of another, because the circumstances of this case shew that no such contract was intended by either of the parties. It must, therefore, be upon some contract which is supposed to arise out of the wrongful act of the defendants in winding up the company. But in doing this they were bound to consider the interests of the shareholders as well as of the plaintiff. It cannot be supposed that the directors when they made this contract intended to bind themselves to carry on the concern at all events, and at any sacrifice. He referred to Simpson v. Lamb (4) and Story on Agency, s. 324.

ERLE, C.J.—This action was brought to recover the sum of 400*l.* on a contract with the defendants, which is contained in a resolution of the board of directors, that the plaintiff should be appointed stockbroker to the company, on the terms of receiving 100*l.* down, and 400*l.* in addition on the allotment of the whole of the shares of the company. It is admitted that all the shares were never allotted, and therefore according to the terms of the contract the plaintiff is not entitled to recover. But ever since the case of Planché v. Colburn (1) it has been held, that the plaintiff may recover, if the other party to the contract has by his own act prevented the plaintiff from fulfilling the requirements of it. I am of opinion that in this case the defendants by winding up the company rendered it impossible for the plaintiff to become entitled under the contract, and that, therefore, according to the rule of law I have mentioned, he is entitled to recover something.

The question remains to be considered, to what damages the plaintiff is entitled. This is a question left to us by arrangement; and I do not, for this purpose, take any notice of the form of the declaration, but apply the universal rule, and give the plaintiff as near as I can what he has lost by the wrongful act of the defendants.—[The learned Judge then stated the facts of the case as bearing on the question of damages, and continued:—] Making the best estimate we can, we think that 250*l.* is a proper compensation, and the verdict will, therefore, be entered for that sum.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. A party who enters into a contract is bound to perform it, not in the sense of a merely literal performance of it, but so as to permit the other party to have the full benefit which it was intended he should have. This may be illustrated by the case in Bulstrode, where a man sold a horse, which he poisoned before delivery; that was held to be no performance, because one party had done that which had deprived the other of the benefit of his contract. I apprehend that wherever money is to be paid by one person to another on a given event, the party under an obligation to pay is liable to the party who has a right to receive the money, if he does that which effectually prevents the latter from receiving the money; and that it makes no difference whether, independently of this prevention, it was certain that the given event would happen or not. To the extent of the value of the chance of the event happening before the prevention, the party who was to receive the money is injured by the party who was to pay it, and to this extent the former has a right to recover. This is a clear proposition both of good sense and of law. The case is not governed by any peculiar principles of agency, but upon the more general principle that each party is entitled to the full benefit of his contract without hindrance from the other.—[The learned Judge then stated the facts of the case as bearing on the question of damages, and said:—] I agree that 250*l.* would be a proper sum.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. In the course of the argument I asked Mr. Prentice what he considered to be the obligation of the defendants, and he said that it was not that all the shares should be allotted, but that they should commit no act and make no default on their part which should prevent their being allotted. Now, the cause of their shares not being allotted was the winding up of the company, which was clearly the act of the company, and so would fall within Mr. Prentice's proposition. I do not, however, say that the defendants may not go behind that cause, and shew, if they can, that that act was imposed upon them by some necessity, which relieves them from the responsibility which they prima facie incur with regard to the plaintiff. But when they attempt to do so, I find that all is uncertain and doubtful. We are compelled, therefore, to fall back on the proximate cause, the winding-up, and say that that was the act which prevented the plaintiff from earning his money, for which the defendants are responsible.

The question remains, to what damages the plaintiff is entitled? He is clearly entitled to something more than nominal damages and to something less than 400*l.* The observations I have made shew that it is impossible to ascertain with arithmetical accuracy what that intermediate sum is, but we must perform as well as we can the functions of a jury, and I agree that the sum which has been mentioned is a proper sum.

KEATING, J.—This is a peculiar case in some respects. The plaintiff has not done what he contracted to do. That is not contested, but it is said that he was prevented by the defendants. As my Brother Byles has pointed out, that is unquestionable in its literal sense. But the act of prevention was itself caused by an event which would very materially have affected the chance of the plaintiff ever earning this money. On the whole, I think the Court has a right to deal with this question according to the justice of the case, and on this ground I concur in the judgment of the Court.

Rule to enter verdict accordingly.

Nov. 9. } ROBINSON v. COLLINGWOOD.

Bills of Sale—17 & 18 Vict. c. 36.
ss. 2, 3.—Declaration of Trust.

Under the Bills of Sale Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 36.) ss. 2. and 3, it is not necessary that the vendee should state on the bill of sale the name of the person who really advances the money, unless there be some trust in favour of the vendor, although the circumstances be such that a Court of equity would hold the vendee to be a trustee only.

This was an interpleader issue, tried, before Williams, J., at the Sittings in London after last Easter Term.

The issue was whether certain furniture and other goods, which had been seized by the sheriff of Middlesex, were the property of the plaintiffs so as to prevent their being taken under a fiery facias at the suit of the defendant.

In the year 1861, judgment was obtained in an action against one Berkeley, upon which a writ of fiery facias was issued to the sheriff of Middlesex. The sheriff accordingly took possession of certain furniture and other effects at Berkeley's residence; Robinson, the plaintiff in this action, thereupon paid the sheriff 138*l.* 14*s.*, the amount for which he had levied, and the sheriff executed a bill of sale to Robinson. Shortly afterwards Berkeley in consideration of the sum of 32*l.* assigned to Robinson, the plaintiff in this action, all the residue of the furniture and effects at his residence. Both these sums of money were advanced by one Montague, and though Robinson had the bills executed in his own name, he was, in fact, acting as the solicitor of Montague in the transaction. In the year 1863, Collingwood, the defendant in this action, obtained judgment in a second action against Berkeley, upon which a writ of fiery facias was likewise issued to the sheriff of Middlesex. Under this writ the sheriff took possession of the furniture and effects at Berkeley's residence, but the plaintiff claiming them under the two bills of sale above mentioned, the sheriff interpleaded; whereupon this issue was directed.

The only question was, whether the bills of sale were valid.

The defendant objected that they were not so, because the provisions of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 36. s. 2. were not complied with.

That section requires that if a bill of sale be made or given subject to any defeasance, condition, or declaration of trust, not contained in the body thereof, such defeasance, condition, or declaration of trust shall, for the purposes of this act, be taken as part of the bill of sale, and written on the same paper as the bill of sale before a copy is filed; and the defendant objected that under this provision it ought to have been shewn on the bill of sale that the plaintiff was only a trustee for Montague, as in equity he would have been held to be.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, leave being reserved to the defendant to move to enter the verdict for him, if the Court should be of opinion that the objection to the bills of sale was valid.

Bovill having obtained a rule accordingly,

Henry James shewed cause.—It is not denied that, as between Montague and the plaintiff, the plaintiff was only a trustee for Montague. But the 2nd section of the Bills of Sale Act does not relate to such an implied trust. It relates to trusts between the vendor and vendee under the bill of sale. This is neither a defeasance nor a condition, nor is it a declaration of trust. No trust was declared; all that could be stated was, that Montague advanced the money. What interest could the creditors of the vendor have in knowing that?

Bovill and Keane, in support of the rule.

—The intention of the legislature was to insure the true nature of the transaction appearing on the register. It would very often be most important to the creditors to know who really advanced the money. If it was a stranger, it might be bona fide; but if it was a relation or near friend, there would be a suspicion that the vendor retained some hold on the property. The 3rd section requires the name, addition, and description of the person to whom or in whose favour the bill of sale is given to be stated. This bill of sale was really given in favour of Montague.

[Henry James.—That provision only applies to bills of sale executed by the sheriff.

ERLE, C.J.—No, it applies to all bills of sale.]

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that these bills of sale were valid, notwithstanding the provisions which have been relied on contained in the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 36. That statute requires that, if a bill of sale be given subject to any defeasance, condition, or declaration of trust, such defeasance, condition, or declaration shall be registered together with the bill of sale. The object of this provision was to prevent creditors being defrauded by sham bills of sale, by which the whole interest of the grantor is apparently transferred, whereas in reality he retains some interest in the subject of the transfer. But provided the grantor retains no interest, it does not make any difference to a creditor whether the grantee under the bill of sale holds the property for himself, or in trust for some one else. The relation in which Robinson stood to Montague is of no importance to the defendant or any other creditor. This is not a matter which in my opinion is required to be mentioned on the bill of sale by reason of the provisions contained in this act of parliament. I, therefore, think that this rule ought to be discharged.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The argument of Mr. James clearly shews that the trusts intended by section 2. of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 36, are trusts in favour of the grantor of the bill of sale. If it were otherwise, it would be highly inconvenient; because if a number of persons chose to advance money on a bill of sale and were desirous of taking the security in the name of one only, who was to hold as trustee for the rest, it would be necessary to explain all this on the registered bill of sale. I think the words "any defeasance, condition, or declaration of trust," refer to such defeasances, conditions, or declarations as are usually found appended to bills of sale, and which affect its operation as between the grantor and grantee. These alone are within the mischief aimed at; and these it is which in my opinion the act requires to be registered. I agree with the opinion expressed by my Lord in the course of the argument, that when the third section requires the name of "the person to whom or in whose favour" the bill of sale shall have been given to be mentioned, that includes all bills of sale by whomsoever given, and not only bills of sale given by the sheriff executing process. But I do not think that affects this case, because I think this bill of sale was given in favour of Robinson, within the meaning of those words. I do not think there was any necessity for the transaction between Robinson and Montague to appear.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is clear that the object of the statute is accomplished by putting on the register all declarations of trust as between the grantor and grantee. To require the grantee to state where he got the money to purchase the goods might enable a creditor to make some useful inquiries; but I do not think that that was what was intended by the statute. In truth, there was here no declaration of trust; all you could state would be the facts from which it is provable that a Court of equity might infer a trust.

Rule discharged.

Mortgage of Goods—Rights of Mortgagee as Owner—Action by subsequent against a prior Mortgagee for Misconduct in Sale of Goods—Deed—Description of Grantee.

B, in consideration of a sum of money lent to him by the defendants, who carried on business under the name of "The City Investment and Advance Company," assigned by deed certain goods of his to the said company to hold as their own proper goods; nevertheless, by way of mortgage for securing the repayment of the said loan, with full power to the mortgagees to sell the goods, and out of the proceeds to reimburse themselves the said loan and costs of sale, and to pay the residue, if any, to B:—Held, that the property in the goods passed by such deed to the mortgagees, and that the plaintiff, who claimed the same goods under a subsequent assignment to him from B, could not maintain an action against them for selling the goods without taking reasonable care to obtain the best prices for them.

Held, also, that the defendants need not be described in the deed by their christian names or surnames, and that the conveyance of the property to the company as above mentioned, operated as a conveyance to the defendants on its being ascertained that they were the persons described under the name of such company.

The third count of the declaration stated that, by indenture, bearing date the 2nd of February 1864, made between one William Dolby of the one part, and the plaintiff of the other part, and duly registered under the Bills of Sale Act, the said William Dolby did grant, bargain, sell and assign to the plaintiff all the goods, farming stock, growing crops, agricultural implements, live and dead stock, and every other article which then were in or about a certain farm called the Horse Grove, at Rotherfield, and more fully set forth in the schedule to the said indenture, for the purpose of securing to the plaintiff the repayment of the sum of 650*l.* then advanced by him to the said William Dolby, which said sum was at the time of the committing of the grievances hereinafter mentioned, and still is due and unpaid, of all which the defendants had notice. That the defendants claimed to have a charge or lien upon the said goods, chattels and effects, as a security for an alleged debt due to them from the said William Dolby, and to have a power to sell the said goods, chattels and effects to satisfy their said debt; and thereupon, and whilst the said indenture continued in full force and effect, and the said sum of 650*l.* so advanced as aforesaid remained due and unpaid, the defendants proceeded to sell and dispose of the said goods, chattels and effects granted and assigned to the plaintiff as aforesaid, on pretence of satisfying the said alleged debt due to them from the said William Dolby as aforesaid, whereupon it became and was the duty of the defendants to use all reasonable care and diligence in and about selling and disposing of the said goods, chattels and effects, and in and about preventing a sale thereof at an undervalue. Yet the defendants did not use reasonable or any care or diligence in and about selling and disposing of the said goods and effects, or in and about preventing a sale thereof at an undervalue, but so carelessly and negligently conducted themselves in the premises, that the said goods, chattels and effects were sold at an undervalue and for prices grossly insufficient and inadequate, and not more than sufficient to satisfy the defendant's said debt, although the defendants ought to and might have obtained for the same a much larger sum, and sufficient not only to satisfy the said alleged debt, but also to leave a large balance towards the satisfaction of the sum of 650*l.* so due and owing to the plaintiff as aforesaid; whereby and by reason of the premises the plaintiff was altogether deprived of the benefit of his said security and of the said indenture.

Pleas, inter alia, fourthly, to the third count, a traverse of the assignment of the goods by William Dolby to the plaintiff. Fifthly, to the same count, that before and at the time of the making of the said indenture, and thence until and at the time of the alleged sale and disposal of the said goods, farming stock, growing crops, agricultural implements, live and dead stock, and other articles, the same respectively were the goods of and belonging to the defendants, and at the time of the said indenture the same were not, nor were any of them the goods of, nor did they, or any of them, belong to the said William Dolby, nor had the said William Dolby at that time the power to grant, bargain, sell or assign the same, or any of them, and that the defendants sold and disposed of the same as in the third count mentioned in their own right.

The following are the facts of this case as they were proved at the trial, before Erie, C.J., at the Surrey Spring Assizes, in 1864.—

The defendants carried on business in London, under the name of "The City Investment and Advance Company," the defendant Sharpe describing himself as the secretary. They were in fact the only members of the company. On the 10th of December 1863, one William Dolby, a farmer at Rotherfield, in Sussex, borrowed a sum of 400*l.* of the defendants, and as security for its repayment the said William Dolby assigned his farming stock and effects to the defendants by a bill of sale of that date. This bill of sale was an indenture made between the said William Dolby of the one part, and the City Investment and Advance Company of the other part, by which, in consideration of 400*l.* lent by the said company to the said William Dolby, the said William Dolby bargained, sold, assigned and transferred unto the said company, their executors, administrators and assigns, all and singular the household furniture, books, plate, linen, live stock, implements, crops, goods, chattels, effects and things of him the said William Dolby, then being in or upon the house, premises, and lands, situate at Horse Grove, Rotherfield, aforesaid, then occupied by him the said William Dolby, and all other goods, chattels and effects of the said William Dolby in and about the aforesaid house and premises, or which might thereafter come into and upon any part of the aforesaid house and premises, either in substitution or otherwise, during the time any money might be due from the said William Dolby, his executors, administrators or assigns, under or by virtue of the said indenture, to hold the said goods, chattels and effects thereby assigned unto the said company as their own proper goods and effects; nevertheless by way of mortgage for securing the repayment of the said loan by instalments as therein mentioned (the first of such instalments being payable on the 10th of January 1864). The indenture contained a power of sale, by which it was declared to be lawful for the said mortgagees, either immediately or whenever they should think fit, to sell and dispose of the said goods, &c., in the house or on the premises where the same then were or to remove and sell the same whenever and wheresoever they should think proper, either by private contract or by public auction, together or in parcels, for such price or prices as could be reasonably had or gotten for the same, or to have the said goods, &c. valued by a competent person and to purchase them at such valuation, and out of the proceeds in the first place to retain to and reimburse themselves the said loan or so much thereof as should then remain due, together with all costs of sale, &c., and to pay over the residue or surplus thereof (if any) to the mortgagor, his executors, administrators or assigns.

This bill of sale was not registered under the Bills of Sale Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 36); but default having been made in payment of the first instalment, the defendants, on the 3rd of February 1864, took possession thereunder of the stock and effects on Dolby's said farm. On the 6th of February the landlord of the farm dis-trained for 350*l.* rent then due, and caused the goods distrained on to be advertised for sale by auction on the 12th of the same month, and the defendants engaged the auctioneer to continue to sell for them after enough had been realized to pay off the distress. Dolby, unknown to the defendants, had, on the 2nd of the same month of February, executed a bill of sale of the same goods and chattels to the plaintiff as security for a loan of 650*l.*, which bill of sale was afterwards duly registered; and on the 8th of February the plaintiff sent a man to take possession, and afterwards, on the 11th of February, he paid off the distress for rent and the auctioneer's charges for preparing for the sale, such charges with the rent amounting to 382*l.* On the evening of that same day the defendants instructed fresh auctioneers (as the landlord's auctioneer declined to sell for them), and, availing themselves of the previous advertisement for sale, sold the property by public auction on the 12th and 13th of February, by which they realized the sum of 388*l.* 16*s.* 2*d.*, after deducting expenses of sale and also a sum of 167*l.* 15*s.* 6*d.* paid to the sheriff in satisfaction of the claim of an execution creditor. This sum of 167*l.* 15*s.* 6*d.*, having been paid into court to abide the event of an interpleader issue between the plaintiff and such execution creditor, formed no part of the dispute in the present action. One of the lots which had been bought in at the sale was afterwards disposed of for 18*l.*, which made the nett proceeds received by the defendants from the sale amount to 406*l.* 16*s.* 2*d.*

At the trial, the plaintiff contended that the fifth plea was not proved, because the bill of sale relied on by the defendants assigned the goods to them only quâ an incorporated company, and this point was reserved to the plaintiff in the event of his not obtaining the verdict.

The plaintiff under a count for money paid to the defendants' use, sought to be repaid what he had expended in paying out the landlord's distress for rent; but the learned Judge ruled that he was not entitled to recover this.

The plaintiff also claimed damages of the defendants for not conducting the sale in a proper manner or taking reasonable care in the sale. The learned Judge left it to the jury to say whether the defendants had exercised reasonable discretion in not putting off the sale and in the mode in which they conducted it. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for 582*l*.

A rule nisi was afterwards obtained by Lush to enter a verdict for the defendants or a nonsuit, pursuant to leave reserved, upon the ground that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence, and also that the damages were excessive. On shewing cause against this rule, the plaintiff was to be at liberty to argue the point reserved to him on the trial.

Hawkins, Joyce and Morgan Lloyd now shewed cause against the rule.—The plaintiff has a right to maintain this action, at all events as to the third count, and to complain of the reckless manner in which the property was sold.

[ERLE, C.J.—The difficulty in your way is, whether there was any duty which the defendants were under to the plaintiff, the holder of the second bill of sale.]

The defendants were aware of the advances which had been made by the plaintiff, and that he had paid out the landlord's distress for rent. The bill of sale of the goods to the defendants did not prevent Dolby from afterwards disposing of his equity of redemption. The power of sale stipulates that the defendants are to pay over the residue which may remain after satisfying the loan to Dolby or his assigns, and this dealing with the residue shews that the bill of sale was never intended to pass all Dolby's interest in the goods to the defendants. It was in fact only a pledge or security for the repayment of the loan, and never gave the defendants any other right than that of pawnees with a power of sale. The authorities shew that there is a difference between a mortgage of lands and a pledge of goods. This is pointed out in Ratcliff v. Davies (1), where it is said, "for the mortgagee hath an absolute interest in the land, but the other hath but a special property in the goods to detain them for his security." And in Franklin v. Neate (2) it was held that the pawnor of a chattel still retains his property in it (though qualified by the right existing in the pawnee), which he has a right to sell, and by the sale to transfer that property to the buyer; and if the pawnee, on the buyer's tendering him the amount due, refuses to deliver it up, the buyer may maintain trover to recover it. It follows therefore from this that if the bill of sale to the defendants gave them a right to the goods only as security for their debt, the law would impose a duty on them to take care of such goods, and if they sold them under their power of sale, then to get the largest possible price they could reasonably get for them. The following cases were referred to as to the effect of the bill of sale being that of a pledge only—Reeves v. Copper (3), The Lancashire Waggon Company v. Fitzhugh (4), Mears v. the London and South-Western Railway Company (5), Johnson v. Stear (6) and Pigott v. Cubley (7). Next, the defendants are not properly named in the bill of sale. It is an assignment to "the City Investment and Advance Company," and conveys therefore no property in the goods to the defendants. In Com. Dig. tit. 'Fait,' (E 3.), it is said, "If Edmund executes a deed in which he is named Edward, and he be sued by the name of Edmund alias dict. Edward, &c., he may plead non est factum and shall avoid the deed." The case of Williams v. Bryant (8) is an instance of a bond being good where the party entered into it by the name by which he was then known. Here there was no evidence to shew that it was known that the defendants carried on their business under the name of the company to which the goods were assigned. On the contrary, it would rather appear that the company was held out as a corporate body, of which one of the defendants was secretary. It is submitted that the defendants had no right to assume such a corporate name, and at least they must take under the grant in the bill of sale by that name by which they could sue.

that the defendants cannot take under the assignment in their bill of sale, because the assignment is made to the City Investment and Advance Company, it is submitted that they can do so, and that it is sufficient if they be described by the name under which they traded. Who is to say that the company mentioned in the deed is a corporation?

[WILLES, J.—The case of Cooch v. Goodman (9) shews that the Court will take notice of what is a corporation.]

There is nothing on the face of this instrument or in the facts of this case to shew that this company must necessarily be considered as a corporation. Then it is said this bill of sale, though in the ordinary form of a mortgage, did in effect operate only as a pledge. That is not so; it conveyed the property in the goods to the defendants, and was to all intents and purposes a mortgage, and not a pawn of the goods. The difference between a mortgage and a pawn is thus pointed out by Mr. Smith in his notes to Coggs v. Bernard (10): "from all this it will be seen that a pawn differs on the one hand from a lien, which conveys no right to sell whatever, but only a right to retain until the debt in respect of which the lien was created has been satisfied,"—"and on the other hand from a mortgage, which conveys the entire property of the thing mortgaged to the mortgagee conditionally, so that when the condition is broken the property remains absolutely in the mortgagee; whereas a pawn never conveys the general property to the pawnee, but only a special property in the thing pawned." Burnet, J., in delivering his opinion in Ryall v. Rowles (11), says,—“It was contended that pawns by the Roman and English law required delivery, but that hypothecation or mortgage did not. As to the Roman law, there was an authority cited—Just. Inst. lib. 4, tit. 6, s. 7,—which passage, if it stood alone, might go a good way to prove what it was cited for.” He afterwards quotes authorities to shew that delivery was not necessary by the Roman law, and then adds, “But supposing that distinction true, it could have no influence in the present case, unless the Roman hypothecation and English mortgage were the same, which they are not. No property was transferred in the hypothecation; an English mortgage is an immediate conveyance, with power to redeem, and equity at any time admits redemption notwithstanding forfeiture; but that does not alter the conveyance, therefore there is no comparison between them.” If this were then a mortgage to the defendants, as it is submitted it was, it is clear they had ample power to sell the goods as they might please, and the plaintiff, who claimed under the mortgagor, could have no better right than the mortgagor to complain of the mode in which the sale was conducted.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be made absolute. In this action the plaintiff has recovered a verdict for a sum of money, whereby he may be indemnified for what he has paid in getting rid of a distress for rent put upon goods which had been assigned to him. The difficulty is, whether one can find any law by which the plaintiff may be entitled to keep that verdict. I have come to the conclusion that there is no law authorizing us to decide in the plaintiff's favour. He has brought this action against the defendants for selling goods to which he claims to be entitled. The defendants have pleaded that the goods were their property, and that they sold them in their own right; and in support of such plea they have relied on an instrument, which is, in terms, a conveyance of the goods to them, by which the property therein is vested in them, subject to certain rights of the mortgagor in the event of his paying the mortgage-debt. Now, if the property in these goods passed to the defendants by that instrument, their plea is sustained. We have searched the authorities in order to see whether we would be warranted in regarding the transaction as substantially that of a pawn of these goods to the defendants, by which they would be only pawnees, and the plaintiff, as the party claiming under the pawnor, would have a cause of action. But I am of opinion that that view of the matter is entirely excluded by the instrument itself, and that therefore the plea is proved. Another point which has been raised is, that as the deed conveyed the goods to the City Investment and Advance Company, and not to the defendants by name, the property in the goods did not pass to the defendants. There is no doubt that Dolby considered that there was a company, and the defendant Sharpe held himself out as the secretary of such company, and Dolby intended to convey the goods to that company. It is clear that individuals may carry on trade under any name they may choose to adopt; and I do not see why they may not do so under the name of the City Investment and Advance Company. If they usurp the title of a corporation, the law may punish them for it; but as between them and the plaintiff in this action, the deed was a conveyance of the goods to them in the name of that company, and I cannot say that the deed was on that account inoperative.

WILLIAMS, J.—I am of the same opinion. I have tried in vain to remove the difficulties in the way of the plaintiff, because I think the case is one which has been hard upon him. With respect to the deed assigning the goods from Dolby to the defendants, it is said it is inoperative, because of the necessity to name a grantee, to enable a deed to have an operation. I apprehend, however, that it is settled a grant may be good, though the grantee be not named by his christian name or surname. In Shep. Touch. 236, after stating the consequences of a mistake in the christian name or surname of the grantee, it is stated: "And yet if the grant do not intend to describe the grantee by his known name, but by some other matter, there it may be good by a certain description of the person, without either surname or name of baptism," and, it is added, "id certum est quod certum reddi potest." I am of opinion that the meaning of the grant in this deed is to convey the goods to the persons using the style and name of the "City Investment and Advance Company." They may, or may not, be a corporation; but when it has been ascertained that the persons answering to that description are the defendants, the grant operates accordingly to convey the property to them. The next question is, what is the effect of the deed if the grant has that operation? Now, if it be competent to make a mortgage of personal property, this deed has done it. It conveys the property from the grantor to the grantees in the most full and absolute terms, so as to make them the owners of the chattels, subject only to the condition of its being defeated on performance by the grantor of certain matters. That is a mortgage according to its most strict definition; but it is said that there cannot be a mortgage of personal chattels, and that the deed must therefore operate as a pledge. Why so? There is nothing illegal in such a mortgage; and the books, moreover, draw a distinction between a mortgage and a pledge of personal chattels. The case of Flory v. Denny (12) is an express authority that there may be a mortgage of a personal chattel without a deed; so that there would seem to be nothing contrary to law in holding that there may be a mortgage of such chattels. Unless, then, the condition for defeating it is performed by the grantor, the property in the goods is absolutely vested in the mortgagee; and a Court of law cannot look to any other owner of such goods than the mortgagee. When, therefore, Dolby made the bill of sale to the plaintiff, he had nothing to assign, and the plaintiff, consequently, cannot now complain in a Court of law of the way in which the mortgagees, who were the absolute owners of the goods, have dealt with them. It is true that there is a covenant in the mortgage deed, by which the mortgagees, if they are guilty of misconduct in the exercise of the power of sale, are answerable to the mortgagor; and it may be that an action on that covenant may lie against them, or that in a Court of equity they may be considered as trustees for the mortgagor, or those who, like the plaintiff, are identical with the mortgagor; and that in such Court there may be a remedy for any abuse by the mortgagees in the exercise of the power of sale. We, however, sitting, as we do, in a Court of law, cannot look at the defendants otherwise than as the absolute owners; and therefore no such action as the present one can lie against them.

Bankruptcy — Liability of Bankrupt Shareholder — Calls — Money payable on a Contingency — Bankruptcy Law Consolidation Act, 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 106), s. 178.

The liability of a shareholder of a joint-stock company to pay future calls is not a liability to pay money on a contingency within section 178. of the Bankruptcy Law Consolidation Act, 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 186), and consequently such shareholder's bankruptcy is no bar to an action for a call made subsequently to such bankruptcy.

Action for calls. — Plea, that before action the defendants became bankrupt within the meaning of the statutes in force concerning bankrupts, and that the causes of action in the declaration mentioned accrued before the defendant so became bankrupt. Issue thereon.

At the trial, before Byles, J., at the London Sittings after last Trinity Term, the following were admitted to be the facts of the case: The company now suing for calls had been incorporated in September 1857, under the Joint-Stock Companies Acts of 1856 and 1857, and were being wound up under an order for winding up voluntarily made on the 14th of May 1861. The defendant was a holder of twenty shares of 10*l.* each in the company, in respect of which 2*l.* 10*s.* only had been paid up on each share. A call of 5*l.* 10*s.* per share was made on the 4th of July 1861, and the present action was brought to recover this call, amounting on the twenty shares to 110*l.* The defendant was adjudged bankrupt on the 3rd of November 1860, and he obtained his certificate on the 4th of February 1862. A verdict was entered for the plaintiffs for 110*l.*, the amount claimed, with leave to the defendant to move to set the same aside and to enter a verdict for the defendant if the Court should be of opinion that the bankruptcy was a defence to the action. A rule nisi to that effect having been obtained, —

Kemp now shewed cause. — The question is, whether the claim in respect of this call is a debt or liability within the meaning of sections 177. and 178. of the Bankruptcy

Consolidation Act, 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 106), and as such provable under the defendant's bankruptcy. The case of The South Staffordshire Railway Company v. Burnside (1) decided that such a claim for calls by a railway company was not a debt due on a contingency within the 6 Geo. 4. c. 16. s. 56, which section is precisely similar to section 177. of the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106.

[Archibald, for the defendant, admitted that after that decision he could not contend that the claim in the present action was a debt payable upon a contingency within the 177th section.]

The same principle which governed that case is equally applicable to sect. 178. To be "a liability to pay money upon a contingency" under that section, it must be a liability capable of being valued. How could the value be ascertained or the sums fixed for which the claim was to be made under the bankruptcy? Until a call is made this cannot possibly be done. The case of Thomas v. Hopkins (2) is in point. There a schoolmaster sued for a quarter's schooling of the defendant's son, which was contracted to be paid quarterly; the defendant having become bankrupt during such quarter, it was held that his liability to pay on the quarter-day was not a liability on a contingency within the 178th section.

They apply to the case of a guarantie; there there is a debt, but the liability of the guarantor to pay it depends on the contingency of the debt not being paid by the principal debtor. There is a distinction between a debt on a contingency and a contingent debt. Until the Bankruptcy Act of 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 134. s. 154), a liability to pay, or indemnify against the payment of, premiums upon a policy of insurance, was not a liability within this 178th section — Warburg v. Tucker (3). In the present case there was no debt until the call was made; and at the time of the defendant's bankruptcy it was contingent whether the defendant would be liable to pay anything more to the company; indeed it was possible that no call ever would have been made if the company had not become insolvent.

Archibald, in support of the rule.—The present case, it is submitted, comes within section 178. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1849. It is distinguishable from the case of Warburg v. Tucker (3), which was the case of unliquidated damages for breach of a covenant to pay premiums; but in Young v. Winter (4) this Court held that a liability on the defendant's covenant to repay the plaintiff the premiums which he had paid to keep the policy alive, was a liability to pay money on a contingency within the 178th section, and such holding was not decided to be wrong by the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Warburg v. Tucker (3), as upon that point it became unnecessary to express any opinion. The 153rd and 154th sections of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 134), which enables proof to be made in respect of unliquidated damages and premiums upon policies, though they do not apply to the present case, where the bankruptcy was under the previous statute, yet they serve as a declaration of the legislature that the Bankruptcy Act, with regard to discharging the bankrupt from liability, should have the largest possible interpretation put upon it. This company was registered under the Joint-Stock Companies Acts, 1856 and 1857, and by section 22. of the act of 1857 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 47), a call is to be deemed a debt to the company; but in the case of winding up any such company the 75th section of the act, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 89, declares that the liability of a contributory is to be a debt from him at the time his liability commenced, though payable at the time the calls are made for enforcing such liability. The legislature therefore assumes that there is such liability on the part of the shareholder, and converts it into a debt when the company is being wound up, which would then be provable under section 177. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1849.

[KEATING, J.—When the company are being wound up, calls may with certainty be expected to be made. BYRNES, J.—Here there were two uncertainties, first, whether any call would ever be made; and, secondly, whether the defendant would be a shareholder at the time such call was made.]

With respect to contingent liabilities Lord Justice Turner said, in Ex parte Barwis (5), that “the 178th section was introduced into the act for the purpose of enabling claims founded on such liabilities to be worked out. That shewed that it was the intention of the legislature to exonerate bankrupts as far as practicable from such liabilities; and it was the duty of the Court to endeavour to carry into effect the intention of the legislature.” In that case a joint and several covenant had been entered into by a principal debtor and his surety, that the principal would pay a sum of money by certain instalments with interest on specified days, and the surety having become bankrupt before all the instalments became payable the creditor was allowed to claim against the bankrupt's estate in respect of the amount of the instalments not then due, as upon a contingent liability under the 178th section. It was decided by this Court, in Boyd v. Robins (6), that the liability of the defendant on a guarantee given by him which was revocable at his option on giving notice in writing, was a contingent liability within the 178th section. That case was afterwards reversed on error (7); but the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber does not conflict with the general principles decided by this Court. In Parker v. Ince (8), a covenant in a deed of separation by a husband to pay to his wife's trustees a certain annuity during the joint lives of himself and wife, but which covenant was to cease in the event of future cohabitation, was held not a liability to pay money on a contingency provable under the husband's bankruptcy, for there no value could be set upon it, as it was impossible to say that the husband and wife might not come together again. But in the case of one of two makers of a promissory note, who have signed as sureties for a third maker, the liability to contribution upon the contingency of the co-surety paying the note on default of the principal, has been held to be a liability within the 178th section—Adkins v. Farrington (9). It is only sought in the present case to relieve the defendant in respect of the liability to pay the call which has been made. If the contingency does not arise so that the claim can be converted into a proof within six months of the filing of the petition, the claim may be expunged, as is provided for by the 178th section.

[BYLES, J.—If a shareholder is not discharged by his bankruptcy from his liability to pay future calls, how can he protect himself?]

Kemp.—By becoming bankrupt every time a call is made. That course has been adopted.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. This is in effect an action by a company against a shareholder for calls; in fact, the action is for a call made under the winding up of the company, but the principle is the same as if the call had been by a continuing company. Now the party required to pay the call was adjudged a bankrupt on the 3rd of November 1860, and the order for winding up the company was made on the 14th of May 1861, and the call itself was made on the 4th of July 1861, so that the action is for a call made in July 1861, on a shareholder who had become bankrupt in November 1860. Does then the certificate, which the bankrupt obtained in February 1862, constitute a bar to the company's enforcing payment of that call? The call being made after the bankruptcy would not, under ordinary circumstances, be provable under the bankruptcy; but the question turns on the construction of the 178th section of the Bankruptcy Consolidation Act, 1849, which enables a party, with whom a liability to pay money upon a contingency has been contracted, to make a claim, and, after the contingency has happened and the demand has been ascertained, to prove such demand. That is, where there is such a liability to pay money upon a contingency, the party who has contracted it may become clear of it, on his becoming bankrupt, as the person with whom it was contracted may prove his claim against the bankrupt's estate. Now, was the liability of this shareholder to be called on to pay money to the company a liability to pay money upon a contingency? The words of the statute at first sight would seem to declare that he is to be discharged from such liability; but after looking at the authorities, I am of opinion that the legislature has not stated with sufficient clearness that he is to be discharged. Where a person holds shares in a continuing company his liability to pay must depend on more than one contingency, and no liability attaches which is dependent on a single contingency, which is required to bring it within the 178th section. The authority which authorizes my coming to this conclusion is that of Parker v. Ince (8), where the Court of Exchequer said that, as the money was payable only under several contingencies, the case did not come within the protection of the 178th section. The case of Adkins v. Farrington (9) was that of contribution between sureties, and at the time the plaintiff paid the balance there was a certainty as to what was the amount of deficiency which had to be made good by the sureties, and the judgment of the Court therefore was that he ought to prove for that amount, because, as I gather from the report, there was there one sum and one contingency. The case of Ex parte Barwis (5), was where money had been borrowed on mortgage with a covenant by the debtor and his surety to repay the money with interest by instalments on certain specified days. The surety had become bankrupt before all the instalments were due, and it was held that the creditor had a right to prove for the balance against the bankrupt's estate. That case is the nearest case in favour of what has been contended for by Mr. Archibald, but it does not, I think, go so far as is required for the purposes of the present case, because a continuing company, in order to prove against the estate of a bankrupt shareholder, must say we expect this shareholder will be called on to contribute to the full amount of his shares, and the claim must depend on the state of the affairs of the company, whether they are likely to fail or not, and a variety of contingencies, and because it would be unjust to hold that they have no right to make calls unless they come forward and disclose the state of their affairs. It is said that this imposes the hardship on a shareholder of being obliged to continue with an undefined liability; but I will only say that if he has not the means, his remedy must be to pay each call by a fresh bankruptcy. For these reasons I have come to the conclusion that the defendant's bankruptcy on the present occasion is no bar to this action.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The questions which arise on these sections of the Bankruptcy Act are thorny ones. At first I thought that this case fell within the words of the 178th section; but the decisions which have been referred to go to this extent, that where the contingency is several and not one, the words of the act are not satisfied. Here there was a contingency, first, whether any call would ever be made, and secondly, whether the bankrupt would then be liable to pay it, because it was uncertain whether he would be a holder of shares or not at the time the call was made. If ever, therefore, there was a case in which the existence of several contingencies would prevent its being a contingent liability under this 178th section, the present is that case. Then, again, if the bankrupt is to be discharged at all it must be from all liabilities, and then we are driven to this absurdity, that the bankrupt may hold the shares (for the assignees may not think proper to accept them) and yet be discharged from all past and future calls in respect of them. On the other hand, until Mr. Kemp pointed out that a fresh bankruptcy toties quoties would of course discharge him from future calls, there seemed no end to the shareholder's liability. The balance of authority coincides with the balance of convenience, and I therefore think this rule should be discharged.

KEATING, J.—This 178th section of the Bankrupt Act is not free from difficulty, but after looking at the authorities which have been cited, I agree with the rest of the Court in thinking that this rule should be discharged.

Rule discharged.

1864. } FITTON v. THE ACCIDENTAL
June 18.* } DEATH INSURANCE COMPANY.

Insurance against Injury by Accident—Construction of Policy—Condition.

A policy for insuring the payment of a sum of money in case the insured should be injured by accidental violence and die from the direct effect of such accident, was subject to the following condition: "this policy insures against all forms of cuts, stabs," &c., "when accidentally occurring from material and external cause, where such accidental injury is the direct and sole cause of death to the insured," "but it does not insure against death or disability arising from rheumatism, gout, hernia, erysipelas, or any other disease or cause arising within the system of the insured before or at the time or following such accidental injury":—Held, that the insurers were liable under such policy where the insured died from hernia caused solely by external violence.

This was an action, by the administrator of John Fitton, deceased, on a policy effected by the deceased in his lifetime with the defendants, for securing the payment of 1,000*l.* in the event of his death by accident. The declaration set out the policy in hæc verba, of which it is only necessary to give the following:

"Now this policy witnesseth, that in case the said insured shall be injured by accidental violence, and shall, within three calendar months of its occurrence, die from the direct effect of any such accident, the company shall be liable to pay to his executors or administrators the sum of 1,000*l.* sterling, three calendar months after proof has been given of such accidental death to the satisfaction of the directors, or in case such accidental violence shall wholly disable the insured from attending to business, shall be liable to pay to him a sum at the rate of 6*l.* per week during the continuance of such disability, for a period not exceeding in all six calendar months, or in case such accidental violence shall not wholly disable the said insured, but shall partially disable him, or render him in part unable to attend to business, shall be liable to pay to him a sum not exceeding in the whole one quarter of the sum payable in respect of the whole or entire disablement." "Provided also that this policy and the insurance hereby effected are and shall be subject and liable to the several conditions, restrictions, stipulations and notice hereupon indorsed, so far as the same are or shall be applicable, in the same manner as if the same respectively were here repeated and incorporated in this policy." The declaration then set out the conditions and stipulations so referred to in the said policy, of which the following is alone material for the present purpose: "This policy insures against all forms of cuts, stabs, tears, bruises, concussions, crushings, gunshot wounds, poisoned wounds, sprains, ruptured tendons, broken bones, dislocations, burns and scalds, the effects of explosions and chemicals, frost-bites, bites of mad dogs, serpents or insects, the action of lightning, suffocation by choking, drowning, hanging when accidentally occurring from material and external cause, where such accidental injury is the direct and sole cause of death to the insured, or disability to follow his avocation; but it does not insure against death or disability arising from rheumatism, gout, hernia, erysipelas, or any other disease or cause arising within the system of the insured before or at the time, or following such accidental injury, (whether causing such death or disability directly or jointly with such accidental injury,) nor against death or disability arising from prize-fighting, duelling, the hands of justice, from intentional self-injury, whether under the influence of insanity or not, nor from injuries sustained on a railway whilst travelling otherwise than in a passenger carriage, nor whilst acting in violation of the by-laws of the railway company, nor from injuries received in the wanton and voluntary exposure of himself to obvious and unnecessary risk or injury, nor from injuries received whilst in a state of intoxication, or whilst performing any unlawful act, nor against death or disability arising accidentally from anything administered or act performed for the treatment of disease, whether surgical, medical or otherwise, except from surgical operations performed for the treatment of injuries enumerated in the first part of this clause, for which compensation under this policy would be otherwise payable, nor against injury occasioned by any invasion, foreign enemy, civil commotion, popular riot, or by any military or usurped power whatsoever, and in no case against death or disability occurring beyond the period of three months from the date of injury."

The declaration then averred that after the making and entering into of the said policy and agreement, and within the period of one year from the date thereof, and whilst the same was in full force and effect, and whilst the said John Fitton was insured thereby, the said John Fitton was injured by accidental violence within the true intent and meaning of the said policy and agreement, to wit, by accidentally falling with great force and violence upon and against the floor of a certain room. And further, that the said John Fitton did within three calendar months of the occurrence of the said accident and injury, and whilst the said policy and agreement was in full force and effect, and whilst the said John Fitton was insured thereby, die from the direct effect of such accident within the true intent and meaning of the said policy and agreement, and that all conditions necessary to be performed, and all things necessary to happen, and all times necessary to elapse, to entitle the plaintiff as such administrator as aforesaid to the performance in all things of the said policy and agreement by the defendants, and to entitle him to be paid the said sum of 1,000*l.* therein mentioned, and to maintain this action against the defendants were performed and did happen and did elapse long before the commencement of this suit, and that nothing hath at any time happened to disentitle the plaintiff as such administrator as aforesaid to the performance in all things of the said policy and agreement, or to be paid the said sum or to maintain this action; yet the defendants have not paid the said sum of 1,000*l.* or any part thereof, and the same always hath been and still is wholly unpaid.

Plea, that the injury and accidental violence to the said John Fitton in the declaration mentioned, was as follows, and not otherwise; that is to say, the said John Fitton accidentally fell with violence on the floor of the said room and thereby became and was immediately ruptured in his bowels and afflicted with strangulated hernia in his abdomen, whereupon a surgical operation was necessarily performed on the body of the said John Fitton, for the purpose of relieving him from the said strangulated hernia, and the said John Fitton afterwards, and within three calendar months of the said accident and injury, died from the said hernia, and from the said surgical operation performed as aforesaid for the treatment thereof and the effects thereof, and not otherwise or from any other cause.

Demurrer to such plea and joinder in demurrer.

Coxon (Mellish with him), for the plaintiff.—The question is, whether death from hernia which has been superinduced by external cause is within the exception mentioned in the first condition of this policy, so as to exempt the defendants from liability. It is submitted that the words "or any other disease or cause arising within the system of the insured" override and govern what immediately precedes it, and that "hernia" in such exception means hernia arising from some internal cause in the system, and not hernia which may arise from external violence.

[WILLES, J.—It would be a most illusory policy if it were not so.]

Yes; it would be a fraud on the assured, and such a construction would in fact not tend to the benefit of the company.

J. Brown, for the defendants.—It is simply a matter of bargain between the insurers and the insured, and as in the cases which this company insure there is no previous examination by a surgeon, and it has been found by experience that accidental violence does not produce hernia unless there exist a previous weakness of the parietes of the abdomen (Druid's Surgeon's Vade-Mecum, p. 468), it has been deemed only a proper condition, by way of protecting the company, to exclude from the risk insured against death produced by hernia, whether caused by accidental violence or not. As to the words in the exception "arising within the system," it is submitted that they mean no more than arising on any part of the body of the insured, for erysipelas exhibits itself on the surface. If "hernia" in this exception is to be confined to hernia arising within the system there would be no necessity to mention it, for the insurance is against accidental injury, and it cannot be supposed, therefore, that hernia, unconnected with accidental injury, could be contemplated.

Mellish, in reply.—Gout and rheumatism never arise except from an internal disease, but hernia and erysipelas may or may not do so, and the condition should therefore be read so as always to except death from rheumatism or gout, but to except death from hernia or erysipelas only when these should arise within the system. If, however, there is any ambiguity in the condition, then the utmost that can be said is, that the policy applies and not the condition, which latter, if ambiguous, must be construed most strongly against the company.

WILLIAMS, J.—I confess to having had considerable doubt in this case. The point is a remarkably simple one, namely, whether the provision in the first condition, that the company does not insure against death arising from hernia, means hernia generally, or whether "hernia" is governed by the words following, "arising within the system of the insured before or at the time or following such accidental injury," and does not therefore mean hernia arising from an external act. If we decide that the company are liable where the death was caused by hernia arising from external violence, the plea is bad. Now, according to the best interpretation I can put upon such condition, I think it means only to exempt the company from liability where the hernia has arisen within the system of the insured. Hernia is not a disease which in all cases arises within the system; and I think that where it does not arise within the system, in that case this condition does not apply, and, consequently, the plea is bad.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is, I think, important that there should be a tendency rather in favour of the assured than of the company insuring, where there is any ambiguity in the language of a policy of insurance. No doubt this is a valuable company, and that it has saved many persons from want; but it would be valueless in many respects if the contention which has been made in this case on behalf of the company should prevail, and that the company should be protected from loss where death has been caused by an injury from accidental violence, if it should appear that the immediate cause of the death was hernia though such hernia was the result of the accident. I agree with my Brother Williams that the terms of this policy are large enough to include this case, and that we should therefore give our judgment for the plaintiff.

BYLES, J.—Here the injury to the assured was plainly within the words of the policy. Then there is this exception contained in the first condition, “but it does not insure against death or disability arising from rheumatism, gout, hernia, erysipelas, or any other disease or cause arising within the system of the insured.” That must, however, be read with what precedes it, namely, “this policy insures against all forms of cuts,” &c. (not including in that list “gout, hernia, &c.”) when accidentally occurring from material and external cause where such accidental injury is the direct and sole cause of death to the insured.” I therefore agree that the proper construction is that which has been put on it. The exception says also, it is to apply to such disease whether arising “before or at the time or following such accidental injury, whether causing death or disability directly or jointly with such accidental injury,” and this hernia may do. I have one other observation to make, that neither of these latter words includes the case of an injury which is the causa causans, whereas there are words in the part before this which would do so. For these reasons, I am of opinion that the present case comes within the policy, and not within the exception.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

a certain wood of the plaintiff, so negligently controlled and restrained his said dogs near to the said wood that they entered the said wood and hunted and destroyed the game therein. It was proved at the trial that the defendant had a dog of a peculiarly mischievous disposition, being accustomed to chase and destroy game on its own account, and that that vice was known to the defendant, who, notwithstanding, allowed the dog to be at large in the neighbourhood of the plaintiff's said wood, and that the dog consequently entered the wood and did the damage complained of:—Held, that the declaration was proved in an actionable sense, and was also good after verdict.

Quære—whether the owner of a dog is answerable in trespass for every unauthorized entry of the animal into the land of another.

The second count of the declaration stated, that on divers days and times the defendant then knowing that certain of his dogs were accustomed to hunt for and pursue game, and also then knowing that the plaintiff preserved and had game in the wood and plantation of the plaintiff hereinafter mentioned, so negligently kept the said dogs near to the said wood and plantation, that through and by reason thereof the defendant's said dogs broke and entered the said wood and plantation of the plaintiff, called Hockering Wood, situate at, &c., and trod down, damaged and destroyed the herbage, soil and underwood thereof, and ran about, hunted and chased therein, and hunted, chased and pursued, drove about and disturbed, and killed and destroyed the game, pheasants, hares and rabbits which were in the said wood, by reason whereof large quantities of the said game, &c. were greatly terrified, affrighted and caused to leave the said wood and plantation and were injured; and by reason of the premises the plaintiff hath been and is seriously damaged and injured, and the plaintiff's right to shoot and sport in the said wood and plantation hath been spoiled and damaged, and divers monies heretofore expended and laid out in and about and incident to the raising, rearing, feeding, taking care of and watching the said game, &c., became and were wholly lost to the plaintiff; and the plaintiff was thereby caused to incur greater expense

READ v. EDWARDS.

Negligence—Mischievous Animals—Dogs accustomed to hunt Game—Scienter.

The declaration stated, that the defendant knowing that certain of his dogs were accustomed to hunt for and pursue game, and also knowing that the plaintiff preserved game in than he would have done in and about the watching and taking care of the said wood, game, &c.; and the plaintiff hath also thereby been deprived of the said game, &c., and of the enjoyment thereof, and of having such pleasure and recreation therein, as otherwise and but for the premises he would have had; and also thereby the plaintiff hath been deprived of divers great gains and profits which otherwise and but for the premises he would have derived, and which might and would have accrued to the plaintiff therefrom, and from the disposal thereof.

To this count the defendant pleaded—first, not guilty; thirdly, that the dogs were not the defendant's; fourthly, that the wood and plantation were not the plaintiff's; fifthly, so far as related to the alleged right to shoot and sport, that the plaintiff had no right to shoot or have sport as alleged; sixthly, that the defendant did not know that the said dogs were accustomed to hunt for and pursue game, nor did he know that the plaintiff preserved and had game in the said wood and plantation. Issue thereon.

The cause was tried, before Cockburn, C.J., at the Norfolk Spring Assizes for 1864, when it appeared that the plaintiff occupied Hockering farm and wood in Norfolk, where he preserved and had pheasants and other game, and that the defendant, who had a farm close to the plaintiff's, was the owner of a pointer which had entered the plaintiff's wood and had injured and destroyed the game therein. It was proved that this dog had not merely the propensity common to many dogs of chasing and pursuing game, but that it had the habit of going out and hunting game on its own account, and that the defendant, although he was aware of this and had been cautioned about it by the plaintiff's gamekeepers, allowed the dog to remain loose, in consequence of which it got into the plaintiff's wood and injured the game there in the way complained of. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, damages 5*l.*, which was entered for the plaintiff for the second count only. A rule nisi was afterwards obtained to set the same aside, and to enter a verdict for the defendant, on the ground that there was no evidence in support of the declaration, and also to arrest the judgment on the ground that the second count disclosed no cause of action.

Hayes, Serj. and Metcalfe shewed cause against such rule.—This second count may be treated as a count in an action on the case for not restraining a dog known to his owner to have a mischievous propensity. The evidence fully supported this, for it shewed that the dog had the propensity to hunt for game on the plaintiff's preserve, and that the defendant had been informed of this and had yet neglected to properly prevent the dog from exercising such mischievous propensity.

[WILLES, J. referred to a case in the Year-Book, 20 Edw. 4. (1)].

(1) The following is the case referred to in the Year-Book, 20 Edw. 4, fo. 10 b :

In trespass for entering plaintiff's close and depasturing his herbage with his beasts,—

Per Gery (for defendant).—Action not maintainable, for defendant says that all the men of D had had common in 200 acres of moor from time whereof memory is not to the contrary, and that the plaintiff's land is adjoining to the 200 acres in which they were put, and that they entered in the land of the plaintiff without defendant's knowledge, and immediately the defendant knew it, he drove them out; wherefore he prays judgment, &c.

Briggs.—This is no plea; for if they wish to prescribe, he ought to prescribe in a certain name—as of a town corporation.

Brian.—As far as this is concerned, the plea seems good enough; but it appears to me that the plea is naught for another cause; for when he put his beasts in the common, he ought to use his common so that they do no wrong to another man; and if the land in which he ought to have this common is not inclosed, as it is here, he ought to keep his beasts in the common and out of the land of another.

Littleton.—I think so too; for I understand that this is the law: if a common road lies over the land of divers men, and if a drover come with his beasts, and some of them go out of the way, he shall be punished in an action of trespass; and so here.

Townsend.—Then we say that we put in our beasts, and they were driven out of the common by wild beasts; to wit, dogs.

Brian.—What is this to the purpose?

Townsend.—In that case he may have an action against the master of the dog.

Nele.—Have you in your country wild dogs? This is wonderful.

Brian.—Notwithstanding you may have an action against the dog's master, still the plaintiff may have an action against you; as if I bail goods to a man to keep, and a stranger takes them out of his possession, I may have an action against him or against my bailee.

Genny.—We traverse generally not guilty.

Brian.—That is right; for you or the dogs [gy. dog's master!] should be punished, for the plaintiff is injured wrongfully.

The effect of that case is that the owner is bound to restrain his animals from straying beyond the common, and that case seems also to assume that if a dog drove them off the common an action would lie against the owner of the dog.

[WILLIAMS, J. referred to Cooke v. Waring (2).]

In Hartley v. Harriman (3) the declaration was not proved; but the Court held that if the owner of the dog knew it was accustomed to bite sheep, he would have been responsible for its having done so. An action lies for discharging guns near the decoy pond of another, with design to damnify the owner by frightening away the wild fowl resorting thereto—Keeble v. Hickeringill (4), Carrington v. Taylor (5). It is true that an action does not lie for disturbing a rookery, because a man can have no property in rooks, or any right to have them resort to his trees—Hannam v. Mockett (6). But with regard to game, the owner of the land on which the game is kept has such a qualified property in the game whilst it is on his land as will enable him to maintain an action for disturbing it; indeed, when the game has been started and killed on his land, his property in it becomes absolute—Sutton v. Moody (7), Rigg v. the Earl of Lonsdale (8), Blades v. Higgs (9), The case of Swans (10), The Queen v. Head (11) and The Queen v. Pratt (12).

O'Malley and Keane, in support of the rule.—No action will lie for negligently keeping a dog because he is accustomed to hunt game. The case of Cox v. Burbidge (13) shews that the gist of the cause of action is the keeping, and not the neg-ligently keeping, an animal known to have a mischievous or ferocious propensity, that is to say, the owner will be liable for the consequences if he keeps a ferocious bull, or a dog which he knows is accustomed to bite sheep or to bite hogs—Boulton v. Banks (14); but what is there in the law which prevents a person from keeping a dog accustomed to pursue and bite game? When the game has been started and killed on the land, there is, no doubt, a property in such dead game in the owner of the land; but there is no such property in live game; and there is nothing, it is submitted, which makes it unlawful for a person to keep dogs which hunt live game, nor is the owner of a dog liable for a trespass committed by the dog in going after game, where the trespass has not been encouraged by him, but was on his part involuntary. In Brown v. Giles (15) Park, J. was of opinion that a dog jumping into a field without the consent of its master was not a trespass for which an action would lie; and in Millen v. Fandrye (16) the defendant's dog chased the plaintiff's sheep; the defendant called him off, and it was held no action lay. It is stated in The King v. Huggins (17): "There are, indeed, cases of murder where no act was done by the persons guilty; as the letting loose a wild beast, which the party knows to be mischievous, and he kills a man"; and in Mason v. Keeling (18): "There is a great difference, it is said, between horses and oxen, in which a man has a valuable property, and which are not so familiar to mankind, and dogs; the former the owner ought to confine, and take all reasonable caution that they do no mischief, otherwise an action will lie against him; but otherwise of dogs before he has notice of some mischievous quality." The only scienter which is alleged in the declaration in the present case is, that the dog is accustomed to hunt for and pursue game; but that is not a vice in a dog which imposes on its owner the obligation to fasten it up and restrain it.

The judgment of the Court (19) was (July 4) delivered by—

WILLES, J.—We discharge the rule to enter a verdict for the defendant, because the declaration was proved, and that in a sense in which there was a cause of action. The question was much argued, whether the owner of a dog is answerable in trespass for every unauthorized entry of the animal into the land of another, as is the case of an ox; and reasons were offered, which we need not now estimate, for a distinction in this respect between oxen and dogs or cats, on account of, first, the difficulty or impossibility of keeping the latter under restraint; and, secondly, the slightness of the damage which their wandering ordinarily causes; thirdly, the common usage of mankind to allow them a wider liberty; and, lastly, their not being considered in law as absolutely being the chattels of the owner, so as to be the subject of larceny. It is not, however, necessary, in the principal case, to answer this question, because it was proved at the trial that the dog which did the damage was of a peculiarly mischievous disposition, being accustomed to chase and destroy game on its own account; that that vice was known to its owner, the defendant; and that he, notwithstanding, allowed it to be at large in the neighbourhood of the plaintiff's wood, in which there was game; so that the entry of the dog into the wood, and the destruction of game, was the natural and immediate result of the animal's peculiarly mischievous disposition, which his owner knew of, and did not control.

As to the property damaged being game, we think this is no answer to the action, because the law recognizes in the proprietor of land a qualified right to game whilst it is upon the land.

We also discharge the rule to arrest the judgment, because after verdict the declaration may be read as capable of being, and therefore must be taken to have been, in fact, proved in an actionable sense.

Rule discharged.

April 21; } RONNEBERG v. THE FALKLAND
May 26.* } ISLANDS COMPANY.

Damages—Remoteness—Costs of Litigation.

The plaintiffs were owners of a vessel chartered as a general ship from London to Valparaiso, with liberty to touch at the Falkland Islands. She had on board goods consigned to the defendants at the Falkland Islands, and 400 barrels of gunpowder for Valparaiso. When she arrived at the Falkland Islands it was necessary for her to unload her gunpowder before she could enter the harbour. The defendants accordingly lent the captain a vessel in which temporarily to stow the powder. Subsequently, the defendants removed the powder into another vessel, which was not a proper one for the purpose, and the latter vessel went down with the powder on board. The captain went on to Valparaiso, and not having delivered the gunpowder or otherwise satisfied the consignees, he was sued by them. The captain defended the action and was defeated, incurring considerable costs in so doing:—Held, that, though the defendants were liable to the plaintiff for the value of the gunpowder, they were not liable for the costs incurred in defending the action at Valparaiso (1).

This was an action tried, before Erle, C.J., at the Sittings in London after Hilary Term, 1864.

The declaration contained a count on a contract, by the defendants, safely and securely to keep certain gunpowder; breach—that the defendants did not safely and securely keep the said gunpowder; and also a count on a contract by the defendants to use due and proper care and diligence in the keeping of certain gunpowder intrusted to them by the plaintiff. Breach—That the defendants did not use due and proper care and diligence in the keeping of the said gunpowder. The declaration also

* Decided in Trinity Term.

(1) It is difficult to say whether the ratio decidendi in this case was, that the conduct of the captain in defending the action at Valparaiso was imprudent, or that the costs incurred in that action are too remote to be given as damages. Each ratio is sufficient, and each is referred to.

alleged, as special damage, that, by reason of the said several premises, the plaintiff had incurred and become liable to pay, and had paid, large sums of money by way of damages to the owners of the said goods, and were compelled to pay the said parties their costs of obtaining the said damages, and had thereby incurred heavy costs himself from the claim of the said parties.

The facts were, that the plaintiff was owner of a vessel, called the Johanna Ohiffa. This vessel was chartered by Smith & Co., merchants, in London, as a general ship, for a voyage from London to Valparaiso, with liberty to touch at Port Stanley, in the Falkland Islands. Part of her cargo consisted of 400 kegs of gunpowder to go to Valparaiso, and she had also on board a consignment of goods for the defendants at Port Stanley.

When the ship arrived at Port Stanley she was not allowed to proceed to the usual landing-place on account of her having gunpowder on board, and accordingly an arrangement was made by the captain with the defendants that the powder should be taken out and placed on board a vessel belonging to the defendants, called the Fairy, after which she could proceed to the usual landing-place and deliver the defendants' goods. This was accordingly done. Subsequently the defendants, being desirous to make use of the Fairy, transferred the powder to another vessel of theirs, called the Lily. This was a vessel which was only half-decked, and a gale coming on, she went down with the powder on board. The captain knew of the removal of the powder, but did not express either assent or dissent.

When the Johanna Ohiffa arrived at Valparaiso, the consignees of the powder instituted proceedings and arrested the ship on account of the non-delivery of the powder. The captain appeared and defended the action, and judgment was pronounced against him for 312*l.*, the value of the powder. In these proceedings he also incurred costs to the amount of 99*l.* 12*s.* The proceedings in the court at Valparaiso were put in evidence at the trial.

The defendants contended that the powder was put on board the defendants' vessels for the convenience of the captain alone; that the defendants were under no obligation with respect to keeping the gunpowder, and that it was entirely under the control of the captain, to whom the defendants had lent their vessels; that the captain, not objecting, must be taken to have assented to the powder being transferred from the Fairy to the Lily, so that no obligation was cast upon the defendants by that transaction. The defendants also contended that the plaintiff was, at any rate, not entitled to recover the costs of defending the action at Valparaiso.

The learned Judge told the jury that if the defendants, without the consent of the captain, removed the gunpowder into a vessel which was not proper for the reception of it, they were liable for any injury arising from that act, and that, if they thought the Lily was not a proper vessel wherein to stow the gunpowder, they ought to find for the plaintiff for the value of the gunpowder. He also told them that if they thought the conduct of the captain was reasonable and prudent in defending the action at Valparaiso, they might give the plaintiff the costs of that litigation as damages in this action.

The jury found for the plaintiff. They stated their opinion that the Lily was not a proper vessel wherein to stow the gunpowder; that the captain was aware of the removal of the gunpowder, but that he did not assent to it. They gave damages 312*l.* for the value of the gunpowder, and 99*l.* 12*s.* for the costs of the litigation at Valparaiso.

Leave was reserved to the defendants to move to reduce the damages by the amount of the costs.

Karslake, in Easter Term, April 21, moved accordingly, and also for a new trial on the ground that the learned Judge ought to have told the jury that the defendants, as gratuitous bailees, were not liable; and that the captain, having known of and not objected to the removal, must be taken to have assented to it.

WILLIAMS, J.—As to the second part of the application, there will be no rule. Whatever might have been the case if the goods had remained on board the Fairy, the result of the removal of them to the Lily is clearly to render the defendants liable. This was either a trespass in removing the goods to an improper place without the consent of the owner, or, at least, it cast upon the defendants the ordinary duties of bailees, namely, to take reasonable care of the goods. This they have not done. There is no pretence for saying that the jury ought to have been told, as a matter of law, that the captain having stood by and not objected to the removal of the powder, must be taken to have assented to it. Upon the point of damages, we think there should be a rule to shew cause.

Lush and Honyman (May 26) shewed cause against the rule.—The party who does the wrong is responsible for all the consequences of his wrongful act, provided the party who suffers the wrong or those who represent him have done that which prudent persons can reasonably be required to do—Tindall v. Bell (1) and Broom v. Hall (2). The jury here have found that the conduct of the plaintiff was prudent. There is no question here of remoteness; the proceedings at Valparaiso were the direct and natural consequence of the loss of the gunpowder.

Karslake and Pollock, in support of the rule.—The plaintiff is not entitled to recover these damages. There is no case in which in an action for breach of a contract of bailment the plaintiff has been held to be entitled to recover more than the value of the goods. Whether the captain was right in defending the action or not has nothing to do with the question. Even if the defence had been successful, the plaintiff would have been entitled to recover as against the defendants the full value of the gunpowder. But he cannot recover any more. The cases relating to a warranty, referred to in Mayne on Damages, p. 29, stand on an entirely different footing. A. sells a horse to B. and warrants him to be sound; B. sells him to C. with a similar warranty; C, finding the horse unsound, sues B. in an action for breach of warranty, and B, acting upon the faith of the warranty given him by A, defends the action; then when B. in his turn sues A. for the breach of warranty, he may recover not only the costs and damages which C. has recovered against him, but also his own costs and damages in defending the action, if that defence was prudent. But, as pointed out by Parke, B., in Walker

v. Hatton (3), that is because A. was led by B. to believe that the horse was sound; if A. was aware of the defect in the horse when he defended the action, or by reasonable diligence could have discovered it, he could not recover, as was held in Wright v. Chamberlain (4).

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the rule to reduce the damages should be made absolute.—[The learned Judge stated the facts of the case, and continued]—The jury having found that the Lily was an improper vessel in which to stow the powder, there is a breach of duty on the part of the defendants, notwithstanding that they are gratuitous bailees. The question is for what damages they are liable. They are clearly liable for the value of the powder, which is taken to be 312*l.*, but in addition to that the plaintiff claims the costs of defending a claim made by the consignees of the powder at Valparaiso. The captain was called upon by virtue of his contract to deliver the goods, and as he was unable to do so, and failed to satisfy the claim of the consignees, the ship was arrested and proceedings instituted to recover damages for the breach of contract. The captain must have known that to an action on a bill of lading, it was no answer that he had delivered the goods into the hands of some one else, who had destroyed or lost them. Nevertheless, he defended himself against the claim and failed. But the costs of this defence in no way arose from the loss of the gunpowder in that sense, that they are damages which may be recovered against the persons who are responsible for that loss. In Tindall v. Bell (1), the Court of Exchequer held, that the plaintiff could not recover as damages the costs of litigation which arose out of the injury unless those costs were such as a prudent man would have incurred; and they were also of opinion, that the costs there claimed as damages were not such as a prudent man would have incurred. What is decided in that case is, that at least the conduct of the plaintiff in incurring the costs claimed as damages must be prudent. But in this case I think the damages are too remote.

WILLIAMS, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is, whether the act of the captain in incurring costs at Valparaiso is a consequence of the wrongful act of the defendants for which they are liable. I think there is no evidence to shew that the conduct of the captain was prudent in this respect. The costs incurred in upholding a defence which was wholly untenable were a useless and wasteful expenditure of money, and I do not think the defendants ought to be called upon to reimburse them.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. In order that the plaintiff may be entitled to recover these costs, he must shew that the conduct of the captain in defending the action at Valparaiso was reasonable. It certainly would not have been so here, and I am of opinion that the plaintiff has not made out his claim for special damage.

(Appeal from the Court of Common Pleas.)

1864. }
June 18. } TOBIN v. HAFORD.*

Marine Insurance—Time Policy—Valued Policy—Total and Partial Loss.

A policy of insurance for twelve months on ship and cargo, the ship being intended for the barter trade on the coast of Africa, contained a stipulation that "outward cargo should be considered homeward interest twenty-four hours after arrival at the first port or place of trade." By a subsequent clause the policy was declared to be "on the ship valued at 2,000l., cargo valued at 8,000l." There was liberty given to the insured "to discharge, load, unload, reload, sell, barter, exchange and trade" any part of the cargo. The ship arrived at a place on the coast of Africa and there discharged a large part of her cargo, and after a stay of more than twenty-four hours proceeded towards other ports in order to take in other cargo; before arriving at her next port of destination she was totally lost:—Held, that the insurers were not liable to pay the whole 8,000l., but a proportion only; that the valuation in the policy was applicable to what was substantially a full cargo, whereas here there was not substantially a full cargo.

Held, also, that the proportion of the 8,000l. which the underwriters were liable to pay, was to be ascertained by finding the proportion which the goods on board at the time of the loss bore to a full cargo, and if this proportion could not be found, that then the underwriters would be liable as upon an open policy underwritten for 8,000l.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff against the decision of the Court of Common Pleas, making absolute a rule to enter a verdict for the defendant pursuant to leave reserved. The facts and arguments are set forth in the report below (1).

The following is a short summary of the case. The action was on a policy of insurance on a vessel called the Shark, for twelve months, commencing from the date of the vessel's leaving the port of Liverpool, on any kind of goods and merchandises, and also on the body of the ship. It was provided in the policy that it should be lawful for the ship to proceed to touch and stay at any ports or places, with leave to discharge, load, unload, reload, sell, barter, exchange and trade all or either goods or property upon the coast of Africa and African islands, &c., without prejudice to the insurance. The outward cargo was to be considered homeward interest, twenty-four hours after arrival at the first port or place of trade. The policy was declared to be on the ship for 2,000l. and on the cargo for 8,000l. The defendant had underwritten the policy for 100l.

The ship sailed in due course and arrived at Kinsembo, on the coast of Africa. She had then on board a cargo, the prime cost of which was 6,226l. 5s. 6d., and she landed there a portion, the invoice cost of which was 3,952l. 8s. 3d. A few days afterwards, without taking in any fresh cargo, she sailed away, and while on her way to Congo, for the purpose of taking in fresh cargo, and during the time insured against, she was totally lost by perils of the sea. The defendant paid into court 20l. in respect of the loss of the ship, and

* Decided in the Sittings after Trinity Term, coram Pollock, C.B., Crompton, J., Bramwell, B., Channell, B., Blackburn, J. and Shee, J.

43*l.* in respect of the loss of the cargo. The plaintiff contended that the underwriters were liable as for a total loss of the cargo, and that they were bound to pay the whole 8,000*l.*, and consequently that the defendant was bound to pay the whole of the 100*l.* without any reference to the proportion, which the cargo lost bore to the cargo with which the ship had started on her voyage.

A verdict was entered for the plaintiff for 37*l.*, the difference between the amount paid in and the amount claimed, leave being reserved to the defendant to move to enter a verdict for himself.

Bovill (J. Brown with him) (June 17), for the plaintiff, the appellant, contended that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the whole sum of 8,000*l.* in respect of the loss of the cargo; that the policy was framed to meet the case of a shifting cargo, and that it was the intention of the parties that that sum should be deemed and taken to be the value of the goods on board at the time the ship went down.

Mellish (Lush and Sir G. Honyman with him), for the defendant, the respondent, urged that, although the plaintiff would have been entitled to receive the 8,000*l.* if there had been a whole cargo on board, yet as the goods on board at the time of the loss were only a portion of a cargo, the plaintiff was entitled to recover only such a proportion of the 8,000*l.* as the portion of cargo on board at the time of the loss bore to a complete cargo.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I believe, with the exception of my Brother Bramwell, who entertains some doubt upon the matter but does not differ from our judgment, that we are all of opinion that the judgment of the Court below ought to be affirmed, for the reasons stated in the judgment of that Court. I will merely add, for my own part (the rest of the Court not being responsible for what I say), that the question as stated by Mr. Mellish seems to be, what is the meaning of the word "cargo"?—whether "cargo" means the goods that may accidentally be on board the vessel at a particular moment, or whether it is used with reference to the anticipation of that which the vessel is really afterwards to carry. Applying to the word the ordinary rules of construction, I think there cannot be a question that it must mean, not the accidental goods that may happen to be on board, which no doubt may be called the vessel's "cargo" in one sense, but that it must have reference to something more, to be derived from the known employment of the vessel. The "cargo," in my opinion, means the entire quantity of goods which are expected to be put on board.

CROMPTON, J.—I am of the same opinion, for the reasons stated by my Brother Williams in the Court below, and now given by the Lord Chief Baron.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am sorry to say that in my mind there is considerable doubt, to which I would desire to give expression. I have not the courage to differ from the opinion of the learned Judges in the Court below, and of my Lord and my learned Brothers now present, but I think that my own unassisted judgment would not have come to the same conclusion at which they have arrived. This is a policy on the ship and goods, and a valued policy on goods; and it is upon a voyage where the ship is to sail with more or less cargo in her, and come back with more or less cargo in her. The character of the trade is such that it is impossible for the assured to say at any time what is the quantity of cargo on board, and what its nature and value,—probably he can tell when she goes out what she carries—or when she is finally on her voyage home, what she has got; but as to the intermediate ports he cannot tell beforehand, or by advice, what is to be given to him. In order to guard against that, he says, I will effect a policy for 8,000*l.*, whereby it is to be assumed that the ship has always on board 8,000*l.* worth of goods. It is said that it is a reproach to this policy that it is wagering: no doubt it is; but the justification of it is, that it is the least gaming speculation that the assured can enter into. If he had had no policy at all, his voyage would have been of a more wagering and speculative character, and in no other possible way, according to his account, can he insure himself. Therefore, although this is wagering, it has the merit of being the least wagering transaction that can be entered into in relation to the matter in hand. Now, documents ought to be construed not so much in relation to extreme improbabilities, but rather with reference to what is likely to happen. It was probable that the vessel would always have on board a substantial cargo; that at one place she might put out goods to a considerable amount, and at another place she might take in probably what was worthless. We have not delegated to us the power to make this instrument, but merely to construe the agreement for the parties. Then, what construction ought it to receive? It is a policy on ship and goods, and manifestly, but for the statement of value, it would be a policy upon whatever goods are on board at the time: because the shipper is at liberty to put some goods out and take some in, and put those out again, and again take others in. The ship is valued at 2,000*l.*, and the cargo valued at 8,000*l.* Making every allowance as I do for the unmethodical way in which the policy is drawn, it seems strange that the introduction of the word "cargo" (by which I believe the parties meant no more than goods) should make the policy mean that it is not to be a valued policy upon the goods, but that it is to be a valued policy on a sort of entity, or thing, which is called a cargo, and that it is afterwards to be found out what proportion the actual goods on board bore to this cargo. Then, avowedly, there is not only considerable difficulty in applying that rule, but it really is an impossibility, because the word "cargo," as certainly was conceded by Mr. Mellish yesterday, does not mean a full cargo. If the vessel had taken a partial or not a full cargo out with her, and was totally lost,—so if she was lost on her final voyage home with not a full cargo, it is conceded, as I understand, that the whole 8,000*l.* would have been recoverable. Therefore, the word "cargo" here does not mean a full cargo. Then, what other meaning is to be given to it? It is said that it is an intended cargo, or a destined cargo, the cargo which it was right she should have at the time, and not an incomplete cargo. Why so? It possibly may be, that if the ship got to a port and a quantity of cargo was there for her, and after she had got some on board, was blown out to sea and lost before she had got the residue on board, it might possibly be said that there was not the intended cargo on board, and that the intended cargo in that sense was not lost. Supposing that is so, why in this particular case had the vessel not got on board her cargo? She had got on board everything that it was intended she should have there; she was not in a state of incompleteness in any sense. She had gone out with a great quantity of goods, and had landed some of them at this place, Kinsembo, and then she was lost with the residue. Suppose that she had started with the residue only on board, and landed none at Kinsembo, if I understand Mr. Mellish's concession right, the plaintiff would have been entitled to recover the whole 8,000*l.*, for she would then have had on board her destined and intended cargo, and having put none of it out there would have been a loss of the cargo within the meaning of the policy. It seems strange that because she takes out something more, and that additional portion is landed at this place, the plaintiff cannot recover the 8,000*l.* Suppose the vessel had taken something on board at Kinsembo; suppose she had filled up with a variety of goods of small value, it is, I believe, admitted that she would have had her destined cargo on board. It seems to me singular that taking in those few comparatively worthless goods at Kinsembo should make her have her cargo on board. All these circumstances would have made me think (of course I cannot think so now, after the unanimous judgment of the Court of Common Pleas and of my learned Brethren here) that this word "cargo" was simply identical with "the goods"; and, consequently, that the true construction of the policy would have been in conformity with what has been contended on behalf of the plaintiff.

Then, with respect to the authorities. The reasoning of the Court in Shaw v. Felton (2) is, I think, in favour of the plaintiff. In Forbes v. Aspinall (3) the Court expressly say, that because the intended cargo was not on board the whole of the freight was not the subject of the loss, and that they must take such a proportion as the cargo put on board bore to the intended cargo.

(2) 2 East, 109.

(3) 13 Ibid. 323.

I think that that case is in the plaintiff's favour, because here the whole of the intended cargo was on board. A similar remark applies to the case of Rickman v. Carstairs (4). I think, therefore, if I had been left to myself upon the authorities I should have decided this case in favour of the plaintiff. I am at a loss to understand the meaning of the Court of Common Pleas, confessedly acknowledging that the fact of this being a valued policy must be left out of consideration in apportioning the loss. However, I must, of course, concur with the judgment of the Court.

BLACKBURN, J.—Agreeing as I do with the majority of this Court, that the Court of Common Pleas were right in their decision, and right also in what I understand to be their reasons, I would wish to say with regard to the real point to be decided, that in my mind the fact that this is a valued policy is a mere accident, and has nothing to do with the question. The question of whether there was a total or a partial loss is independent in this case, as in my mind it ought to be in every case, of whether the policy was valued or not valued. The question in all cases is, what is the subject-matter that is covered by the insurance? Let us see whether the whole of the subject-matter is lost, in which case it would be a total loss, or whether only a part is lost, in which case it would be a partial loss, the amount of which would depend on the proportion which the part that was lost bore to the subject-matter of the insurance. Then, if that is a valued policy, the value being admitted, the sum when reduced to figures is proved. If it be an open policy you must prove the value of the whole of the subject-matter. It would come to the same result after it is proved, and it being a valued policy only dispenses with the proof. However, in my mind the question comes to be, what is the subject-matter of insurance in the policy? The policy itself is made up, as every policy ought to be, of a printed form originally intended for an ordinary voyage policy altered to meet this peculiar African trade, and further altered into a time policy for twelve months. Thus much appears clear enough, that this is a policy partly on the ship (with which we are not now concerned), and partly on the cargo. To my mind it is immaterial whether it said on cargo or on goods,—goods, I think, would mean cargo, cargo would mean goods. It means, in my opinion, the goods which, on such a voyage, would be all that are to be carried by the vessel as her cargo, and if it had been the word “goods,” the same would have been meant. The facts appear to be this: that this ship sailed on this time policy from Liverpool, and that it attached on the cargo which she had on board. The nature of the adventure on which she was bound to the coast of Africa, was that the cargo taken on board at Liverpool was intended to be substituted and exchanged by barter for cargo the produce of the coast of Africa. There are words in the body of the policy intended to meet that state of things, and which, no doubt, were framed in those terms when originally the natives were in the habit of carrying on the barter from their canoes alongside the ship, and as the master parted with the European goods which the natives wanted to receive, he obtained from the natives the produce of their country in exchange. The effect of the words in the policy is, that it is to continue to attach to what is substituted for the goods originally put on board: that this policy on the cargo that went out is to be also on the cargo that comes in the place of it afterwards. In this case it appears that the cargo that went out from Liverpool to Africa arrived on the coast of Africa, and that 57 per cent. was safely landed, and the ship was lost with the other 43 per cent. on board. Nothing being substituted for the 57 per cent. which had left the ship, it seems very clear that, as nothing had been put on board to take the place of that which was safely landed, only 43 per cent. was lost of that on which the risk had originally attached. That is in effect what was decided in the Court below. Had other produce been partially put on board, it might have been a troublesome question, not of law but of fact, whether that which was partially put on board was the whole of what was intended to be substituted, or only a part of it. When the question arises it will be time enough to consider it. But the Court below had evidently that present to their mind, and they expressly point to that where they speak of the datum value of the full cargo intended to be put on board. Had some other produce been put on board and the ship then lost, I hardly know how one could then get at this datum, except by a compromise or agreement between the parties. But that difficulty does not apply to the present case, for it seems to me to be clear enough that what was lost was 43 per cent. of the cargo, and no more. That being so, I think the decision of the Court below was perfectly right for the reasons I have stated.

Judgment affirmed.

1864. } BERRSFORD AND OTHERS v.
May 28.* } MONTGOMERIE AND ANOTHER.

Shipping—Merchant Shipping Amendment Act, 1862, s. 67.—Landing Goods entered for a particular Warehouse—Offer to take Delivery—Notice before Landing.

By the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act, 1862, (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63. s. 67.), a shipowner is empowered to land goods imported in his ship from foreign parts subject to the condition, that "if before the goods are landed the owner thereof has made entry for the landing and warehousing thereof at any particular wharf other than that at which the ship is discharging, and has offered and been ready to take delivery thereof, and the shipowner has failed to make such delivery, and has also failed at the time of such offer to give the owner of the goods correct information of the time at which such goods can be delivered, then the shipowner shall, before landing or unshipping such goods under the power hereby given to him, give to the owner of the goods twenty-four hours' notice in writing of his readiness to deliver the goods, and shall, if he lands or unships the same without such notice do so at his own risk and expense":—Held, that the owner of the goods when he makes an offer to take delivery of them must be in a condition to receive the same if the offer be then accepted in order to entitle him to the benefit of such condition.

Held, further, that when such offer is made, the shipowner, if he then fails not only to make delivery of the goods, but also to give such owner of the goods information of the time at which they can be delivered, is bound to give the twenty-four hours' notice above specified before he lands the goods, although he was never asked to give such information.

The first count of the declaration stated, that before and at the time of the grievances hereinafter mentioned the plaintiffs were owners of goods, to wit, of hides, within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1862, and were entitled, as agents for the owners thereof, to the possession of the same. That the defendants were shipowners within the said act, and were authorized to act as agents for the owners of a certain ship called the City of Edinburgh, and were entitled to receive the freight, demurrage and other charges in respect of the said ship. That the said goods were imported in the said ship from foreign parts into the United Kingdom in the said ship, and that before the said goods were landed or unshipped the defendants made entry of the said goods, within the meaning of the said act, for the landing and warehousing thereof at their wharf, called Pickle Herring Upper Wharf, which said wharf was not the wharf at which the said ship was discharging, and were entitled and ready and offered to take delivery of the said goods; of all which premises the defendants had notice. That all things were done, and had happened and existed, and all times had elapsed to entitle them to take such delivery, and to land the said goods, yet the defendants did not allow them to do so. That the defendants and all persons whose duty it was so to do failed to make such delivery, and failed at the time of such offer to give the plaintiffs correct information of the time at which the said goods could be delivered. That, without the consent of the plaintiffs, the defendants landed and unshipped the said goods at a wharf or place, to wit, at the London Docks, other than the plaintiffs' wharf, which had been named in the entry as aforesaid, and without giving to them, being the owners of the said goods and wharf as aforesaid, twenty-four hours' notice of their readiness to deliver the said goods, and did not bear or pay the expenses of landing and unshipping the same; and that, by reason of the premises, the plaintiffs were compelled and obliged, in order to obtain possession of the said goods, to pay divers large sums of money and the expenses which had been incurred by reason of such landing and unshipping as aforesaid, and also lost the use of, and had to pay large sums for the demurrage of divers barges and lighters which they had employed to take delivery of the said goods, delivery of which the defendants failed to make, and did not allow the plaintiffs to take, as in that count mentioned.

The defendants pleaded the general issue; and traversed, inter alia, that the plaintiffs were ready and willing and had offered to take delivery of the goods; and that they, the defendants, had notice as alleged.

The action was tried, before Byles, J., at the London Sittings after Hilary Term, 1864, when, without leaving any question to the jury, a verdict was entered, by consent, for the plaintiffs for 10*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*, with leave to the defendants to move to enter the verdict for them if the Court should be of opinion that upon the facts proved the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover, the Court having power to draw inferences of fact.

The plaintiffs were wharfingers, and the London Dock Company were the real defendants, the question being as to the construction of the 7th condition or paragraph in the 67th section of the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act, 1862, the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63. (1), and the rights of wharfingers thereunder.

The nominal defendants to the action were the agents of the ship, the City of Edinburgh, mentioned in the declaration, and in which, amongst other goods, were fifty bales of hides, the bills of lading as to which had been indorsed by the consignees to the plaintiffs. The City of Edinburgh arrived at the London Docks on the 24th of March 1863, and upon her reporting her arrival at the Custom-house, and before the hides (the goods in question) were landed or unshipped, the plaintiffs as owners thereof passed the entry at the Custom-house and obtained the usual order for the delivery of the goods overside the vessel into craft, to be landed at the plaintiffs' private wharf. This order was handed by the plaintiffs to their lighterman, of the name of Chapman, who sent it to the ship by the hands of his apprentice Caney. Accordingly Caney went to the vessel in the London Docks, and at 4 o'clock p.m. on the 26th of March 1863, he gave this order for delivery to the second mate, who was then on board in charge of the vessel, and at the same time applied for the goods. The mate said they were not ready, and Caney thereupon went away, and no information was given of the time when the goods would be ready, nor was such information asked for.

It appeared in evidence that Caney was a lad of only about eighteen, and that he had no lighter with him when he went to the vessel, but there was a barge belonging to his master then in the docks about 100 yards off from the vessel, and Chapman himself gave evidence that he had arranged with other men to use their craft in case of need. The ordinary working hours at the docks are from eight to four in the afternoon, but the legal hours for free goods are from six to six, and occasionally they work during those hours. At the time Caney delivered the delivery-order the crew had left the vessel.

On the 28th of March the hides, being reached in the course of unloading the vessel, were taken out and landed in the docks without twenty-four hours' notice

(1) The 67th section enacts, that "Where the owner of any goods imported in any ship from foreign parts into the United Kingdom fails to make entry thereof, or having made entry thereof to land the same or take delivery thereof and to proceed therewith with all convenient speed, by the times severally hereinafter mentioned, the shipowner may make entry of, and land or unship the said goods at the times, in the manner, and subject to the conditions following (that is to say):"

Amongst other conditions is the following, viz. "(7.) If at any time before the goods are landed or unshipped the owner thereof has made entry for the landing and warehousing thereof at any particular wharf or warehouse other than that at which the ship is discharging, and has offered, and been ready to take delivery thereof, and the shipowner has failed to make such delivery, and has also failed at the time of such offer to give the owner of the goods correct information of the time at which such goods can be delivered, then the shipowner shall, before landing or unshipping such goods under the power hereby given to him, give to the owner of the goods, or of such wharf or warehouse as last aforesaid, twenty-four hours' notice in writing of his readiness to deliver the goods, and shall, if he lands or unships the same without such notice, do so at his own risk and expense."

having been given to the plaintiffs, and the dock company afterwards refused to let the plaintiffs have the goods except upon payment of 10*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*, their usual landing and warehouse charges. The plaintiffs, having paid this sum under protest, brought the present action to recover it back; and the question was, whether they were entitled to the twenty-four hours' notice required by the 67th section of the act to be given by the shipowner before landing the goods by him under the powers of that section.

Giffard, for the defendants, having obtained a rule nisi to enter the verdict for the defendants pursuant to the leave reserved at the trial,—

F. M. White now shewed cause.—The plaintiffs offered and were ready to receive the goods, and complied with the terms mentioned in the 7th paragraph to section 67. of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63. so as to entitle them to the twenty-four hours' notice before the goods were landed by the shipowner. The cases of Gatliffe v. Bourne (2) and Howard v. Shepherd (3), shew that, according to the law as it stood before that statute, the shipowner was bound to wait a reasonable time for the consignee to claim delivery of the goods before landing them. The clause as to the twenty-four hours' notice was introduced into the act at the instance of the wharfingers, who might otherwise have been obliged to keep their craft about a vessel for a long time uselessly and at great expense. According to the statute, this notice must be given if the shipowner fails to give information when the goods will be ready for delivery. The act does not say if he refuses, which would imply a previous request, but uses the word "fail." Therefore, if he omits to give such information he must then give them twenty-four hours' notice.

Giffard and Murphy, in support of the rule.—The plaintiffs did not apply for the goods at a proper time, nor with the proper means and appliances for receiving them. A mere offer to take delivery of the goods will not satisfy the statute. There must be at the time it is made a readiness to take such delivery. Here the plaintiffs were not so ready as to entitle them to the benefit of the 7th condition in the 67th section.

What was done by them on the occasion was, in fact, only a colourable compliance with the statute. The offer to take the goods being made at 4 o'clock, the ordinary hour to leave off work, and when in fact the crew had left, was not a proper time to make it a good offer to satisfy the statute. It might have done to have made it at that hour if the crew were still there, but not otherwise —Startup v. Macdonald (4). Then, with regard to the other branch of this section, it is submitted the words "failed at the time of such offer to give the owner of the goods correct information," &c., import that such information had been previously demanded. If so, then as none was here asked there was no failure to give information.

ERLE, C.J.—In considering the evidence in this case, the balance to my mind is in favour of the plaintiffs' right to recover. The shipowner had a right to land the goods, unless the merchant brought himself within the 7th condition of the 67th section of the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act, 1862. The facts appear to be that certain hides being on board the ship, the City of Edinburgh, in the London Docks, the plaintiffs, the owners of the hides, made an entry and got the custom-house order for their delivery over the ship's side; they gave that order to a lighterman, and the lighterman sent it by a young man of the name of Caney, who went on board the ship to ask for the goods and gave the delivery-order to the mate, the person then in charge of the ship. The mate said the goods were not ready, whereupon the young man went away. Now, do these facts shew that the plaintiffs offered and were ready to take delivery of the goods? It is clear that they desired to take them to the wharf, and they sent the official document which entitled them to receive those goods, through the proper channel (viz. the lighterman) for taking goods from the ship to the wharf where they were destined. I cannot call this a colourable compliance with the statute. If what was done had occurred during the working hours, there cannot be the least doubt that a lighterman of the age of eighteen was just as able to receive a cargo of hides as a lighterman of the age of twenty-one, and a lighter which was lying ten or twenty yards off in the London Docks was just as effective for the purpose as if it had been touching the side of the ship. Great stress has been laid upon the fact of Caney being sent on board at 4 o'clock, whilst the practical working hours in the docks for many purposes cease at 4 o'clock. I think if the goods had been at the top and the working people had broken off at 4 o'clock, and Caney had then come, the mate would have said, "I accept your order, you shall have the goods, but at this moment the working hours have ceased; when they begin again the goods will be ready for you." Instead of that, Caney was told that the goods were not ready,—in fact, they were not ready until after the lapse of several hours on the following day. I therefore cannot come to the conclusion that there was anything to render this offer to receive the goods from being a readiness to receive them because it was made at 4 o'clock. If there is an offer to take delivery and a readiness to take delivery on the part of the merchant, and the shipowner at the time fails to deliver the goods, and fails to give correct information of the time when such goods can be delivered, then the shipowner must give twenty-four hours' notice of his readiness to deliver the goods. Here the shipowner failed to make such delivery, and at the time of the offer by Caney he failed to give information when they would be ready, and no twenty-four hours' notice was given; but, on the contrary, the goods were landed without such notice. I think the owners of the goods complied with all the statute requires in the 7th condition of section 67, and that this rule should be discharged.

WILLIAMS, J.—I have felt some difficulty in this case, not with reference to any question of law, but as to the conclusion of fact regarding one part of it. With respect to the law, I think Mr. Giffard's argument is correct, that there must not only be a failure on the part of the shipowner to deliver the goods when the delivery is asked for, but that the party who asks for it, must be in a condition to receive the goods if the offer be accepted. That brings it to a question of fact (as to which I have felt some difficulty), viz., whether there is evidence here that the owners of the goods were ready to take delivery of them. My Lord and my learned Brothers think that there is satisfactory evidence that such was the case, and I dare say I am wrong in coming to a contrary conclusion; but it is immaterial that I feel a difficulty in adopting the view they have taken of this question of fact. As to the remaining point, of law, whether there has been a failure to give the owners of the goods information of the time at which such goods could be delivered, it has been argued, on the part of the defendants, that in order to raise that question it is necessary not only that the shipowner should not have given to the owners such information, but that he should have been asked to do so, and declined to give it after having been so asked. I do not think that that is the proper construction of that part of the section. It appears to me that that passage was inserted in the statute in aid of and for the benefit of the shipowner. The 7th condition, taken generally, deprives him of the power conferred on him by the 67th section, and in the event of his not being ready to deliver the goods when the delivery is asked for, punishes him, as it were, by making him give twenty-four hours' notice of his being ready to deliver. Then, the meaning of this passage seems to me to be that the shipowner shall not be put to give such notice, if when he is not in a condition to deliver the goods at the time they are asked for, he gives information of the time when he will be ready to deliver them. But if, however, he fails to avail himself of this opportunity of giving the owner of the goods such information, he will be obliged to give the twenty-four hours' notice.

BYLES, J.—My Brother Willes, who has left the Court, is of the same opinion, and he has handed me his reasons in writing. He says, "It is now ascertained that Caney was an agent to offer to receive; that he did so offer, and that he made his offer to a person who had authority to receive that offer; that Caney was ready, that is, as ready as a reasonable man would be, to take the goods, and that the shipowners failed to give the owners of the goods correct information of the time at which the goods were to be delivered." I need add only that I quite agree in all the observations that have been made by the rest of the Court on the law of this case, upon which, indeed, the Court are unanimous.

Libel — Defamatory Matter — What amounts to.

The declaration set out a letter addressed by the defendant to the clerk of the guardians of a poor-law union in respect of an allowance by the said guardians towards the maintenance of his, the defendant's, mother, being also the mother of the plaintiff, in part of which letter it was stated, "who" (meaning the plaintiff) "has for years, without the slightest cause, systematically done everything she can to annoy me" (meaning the defendant), "and I am sorry to say my mother is only too glad to assist her" (meaning the plaintiff). "Some years ago they" (meaning the plaintiff's and the defendant's said mother and the plaintiff) "dragged me into Chancery," "and almost every term I am obliged to appear by counsel before the Vice Chancellor. They" (meaning the plaintiff's and the defendant's said mother and the plaintiff) "had no business to include me in the bill, as I make no claim to my late father's property; but of course it is a pleasure to my mother and Miss Fray" (meaning the plaintiff) "to put me to all the expense they" (meaning the plaintiff's and the defendant's said mother and the plaintiff) "can." "Doubting as I do my mother's extreme poverty, I think the proper test of it is an order for the workhouse, the expense of which should be borne proportionately between all her children, and as Miss Fray" (meaning the plaintiff) "is a lady of independence and a single woman, and can find the money for carrying on all sorts of law proceedings, she" (meaning the plaintiff) "should not be exempted":— Held, on demurrer, that the declaration was good, as the publication of the above letter tended to disparage the plaintiff's character, and was therefore libellous.

The declaration stated, that the defendant falsely and maliciously wrote and published of the plaintiff, in the form of a letter addressed to the clerk to the guardians of a certain poor-law union, in respect of an allowance by the said guardians towards the maintenance of his, the defendant's, mother, being also the mother of the plaintiff, the words following, that is to say:

"I" (meaning the defendant) "do not know what grounds she" (meaning the said mother of the plaintiff and the defendant) "can have to claim of your board out-door relief. You will find that she" (meaning the said mother of the plaintiff and the defendant) "does not belong to your parish; in fact, Mr. Phillips, your relieving officer, informed me" (meaning the defendant) "by letter more than twelve months ago that her" (meaning the plaintiff's and the defendant's said mother) "parish was Llanfair Waterdine, Salop, a more fitting place for her" (meaning the plaintiff's and the defendant's said mother) "to end her days than in town, but her removal would not suit Miss Fray's" (meaning the plaintiff's) "purpose; again, I" (meaning the defendant) "say, if she" (meaning the plaintiff's and the defendant's said mother) "is a pauper she" (meaning the plaintiff's and the defendant's said mother) "is not justified in renting a cottage and paying rates and taxes. It is only done to keep a home for Miss Fray" (meaning the plaintiff), "who" (meaning the plaintiff) "has for years, without the slightest cause, systematically done everything she" (meaning the plaintiff) "can to annoy me" (meaning the defendant), "and I" (meaning the defendant) "am sorry to say my mother" (meaning the said mother of the plaintiff and the defendant) "is only too glad to assist her" (meaning the plaintiff). "Some years ago they" (meaning the plaintiff's and the defendant's said mother and the plaintiff) "dragged me" (meaning the defendant) "into Chancery as well as Mr. Drew, and almost every term I" (meaning the defendant) "am obliged to appear by counsel before the Vice Chancellor. They" (meaning the plaintiff's and the defendant's said mother and the plaintiff) "had no business to include me" (meaning the defendant) "in the bill, as I" (meaning the defendant) "make no claim to my" (meaning the defendant's) "late father's property; but of course it is a pleasure to my mother" (meaning the plaintiff's and the defendant's said mother) "and Miss Fray" (meaning the plaintiff) "to put me" (meaning the defendant) "to all the expense they" (meaning the plaintiff's and the defendant's said mother and the plaintiff) "can. My" (meaning the defendant's) "solicitor has had notice to appear again in November. The cost I" (meaning the defendant) "have been put to is something considerable, and how I" (meaning the defendant) "am to obtain the money to pay my" (meaning the defendant's) "solicitor I" (meaning the defendant) "do not know. Doubting as I" (meaning the defendant) "do my mother's" (meaning the plaintiff's and the defendant's said mother) "extreme poverty, I" (meaning the defendant) "think the proper test of it is an order for the work-house, the expense of which should be borne proportionately between all her children, and as Miss Fray" (meaning the plaintiff) "is a lady of independence and a single woman, and can find the money for carrying on all sorts of law proceedings, she" (meaning the plaintiff) "should not be exempted."

Demurrer thereto and joinder in demurrer.

Inderwick, in support of the demurrer. —The declaration, it is submitted, discloses no cause of action. The publication of the letter which is there set out is not libellous. To be libellous, according to the acknowledged definition of a libel, the letter must contain such a reflection upon the character of the plaintiff as would be calculated to expose her to hatred, contempt or ridicule among her fellows. Here the only charge which the defendant makes against her is, that of dragging him into a Chancery suit, and all that is stated with reference to that amounts only to saying that the plaintiff takes a pleasure in suing the defendant in Chancery. The costs which he is thereby put to are the costs which the law awards, and there is no innuendo suggesting that the letter meant to infer that the plaintiff carried on such law proceedings improperly.

[ERLE, C.J.—The publication of that which can by any construction lower the estimation of the plaintiff's character, she has a right to have left as a question to the jury.]

The only point no doubt is, whether the Court can say that what has been here written is not libellous. In Baylis v. Lawrence (1) Lord Denman said, "If the Judge and jury think the publication libellous, still, if on the record it appear not to be so, judgment must be arrested."

ERLE, C.J.—We cannot say that what is stated in this letter does not tend to disparage the plaintiff's character.

The plaintiff appeared in person.

Gaming—Betting Houses Act, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119. s. 5.—Recovering Deposit.

Where a person resorted habitually to a certain spot in Hyde Park for the purpose of making bets on horse races, and there received a deposit on a bet, the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119. s. 5. is applicable, and the deposit may be recovered as money had and received to the use of the depositor.

This was an action tried in the Sheriffs' Court of Middlesex.

The declaration was for money had and received; to which the defendant pleaded never indebted, and that the money was deposited by the plaintiff with the defendant under a contract by way of gaming and wagering and illegally betting on horses running at races.

It appeared that the defendant was in the habit of resorting daily to a certain spot under a tree in Hyde Park, and there making bets on horse races. As many as 150 to 200 persons were frequently collected together at this spot, and the defendant exhibited betting lists and cards, shewing the odds he was prepared to lay against horses. It was usual for persons making bets with the defendant to deposit with him the amount of their stakes. It was to recover a sum of money so deposited that the present action was brought.

The plaintiff relied on the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119. s. 5, and contended that he was entitled to recover the deposit as money had and received to his use, under that section.

(1) 11 Ad. & El. 920; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 196.

(2) Coram Erle, C.J., Byles, J. and Keating, J.

Upon these and other points taken, the Judge of the Sheriffs' Court decided in favour of the defendant, and a verdict was ultimately entered for him. Leave was, however, reserved to the plaintiff to move to enter the verdict for him for the amount of the deposit, if the Court should be of opinion that he was entitled to recover the deposit under the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119. s. 5.

Yeatman having obtained a rule accordingly,—

Salter shewed cause.—The defendant is not bound to return the deposit. The 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119. s. 5. does not apply to such a case. That act was passed for the suppression of betting-houses. The 4th section imposes a penalty on the "owner or occupier of any house, office, room, or place opened, kept, or used," for the purposes of betting. By section 5, "any money or valuable thing received by any such person aforesaid, as a deposit on any bet, or as or for the consideration for any such assurance, undertaking, promise, or agreement as aforesaid, shall be deemed to have been received to or for the use of the person from whom the same was received, and such money or valuable thing may be recovered accordingly." This clearly refers only to money received by persons who are owners or occupiers of a "house, office, room, or place," kept or used for the purpose of betting. But the defendant was not such a person. "Place" must mean some building where the business of betting can be carried on. It is conceded that if this transaction had taken place in a house it would have been within the section.

Yeatman, in support of the rule, was not called on.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule ought to be made absolute. The evidence shews that the defendant was in the habit of betting generally with any persons who chose to resort to a certain spot under a tree in Hyde Park, where the defendant was to be found, and that he used this place for the purpose of betting. I wish particularly to lay stress on this, that the witnesses proved that they had seen the defendant daily at the same spot for the purpose of betting on horse races. The defendant received the money for a purpose which it is conceded is within the provisions of the act. But it is contended that a "place" must mean some kind of structure. The mischief, however, is equally great whether this business is carried on under the shelter of a tree or in a room in a house, or under a tent. The mischief intended is the habit of using a well-known place by persons skilled in betting, who hold out to improvident persons an inducement to make bets. I am clear that the 5th section was intended to prevent the habitual use of any place whatever for the purpose of recovering bets.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. The only question is, whether this is a place kept or used for the purpose of betting within the meaning of this act of parliament? The defendant habitually resorted to a certain spot; and I think that spot becomes then a "place" within this section.

Rule absolute.

Metropolis Local Management Act—
25 & 26 Vict. c. 102. s. 73.—57 Geo. 3.
c. xxix. s. 68.

The 57 Geo. 3. c. xxix. contains (amongst other things) powers for the suppression of nuisances, within a certain district of the metropolis, and by section 68. the keeping of pigs within forty yards of any street is prohibited, whether the same be a nuisance or not. By the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102. s. 73, the powers of improving and regulating streets, and for the "suppression" of nuisances contained in the 57 Geo. 3. c. xxix. are applied to a larger district:—Held, dubitante Keating, J., that section 68. of the 57 Geo. 3. c. xxix., being a power of prevention and not of suppression, did not apply to the larger district.

34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. p. 9.]

I think that that case is in the plaintiff's favour, because here the whole of the intended cargo was on board. A similar remark applies to the case of Rickman v. Carstairs (4). I think, therefore, if I had been left to myself upon the authorities I should have decided this case in favour of the plaintiff. I am at a loss to understand the meaning of the Court of Common Pleas, confessedly acknowledging that the fact of this being a valued policy must be left out of consideration in apportioning the loss. However, I must, of course, concur with the judgment of the Court.

BLACKBURN, J.—Agreeing as I do with the majority of this Court, that the Court of Common Pleas were right in their decision, and right also in what I understand to be their reasons, I would wish to say with regard to the real point to be decided, that in my mind the fact that this is a valued policy is a mere accident, and has nothing to do with the question. The question of whether there was a total or a partial loss is independent in this case, as in my mind it ought to be in every case, of whether the policy was valued or not valued. The question in all cases is, what is the subject-matter that is covered by the insurance? Let us see whether the whole of the subject-matter is lost, in which case it would be a total loss, or whether only a part is lost, in which case it would be a partial loss, the amount of which would depend on the proportion which the part that was lost bore to the subject-matter of the insurance. Then, if that is a valued policy, the value being admitted, the sum when reduced to figures is proved. If it be an open policy you must prove the value of the whole of the subject-matter. It would come to the same result after it is proved, and it being a valued policy only dispenses with the proof. However, in my mind the question comes to be, what is the subject-matter of insurance in the policy? The policy itself is made up, as every policy ought to be, of a printed form originally intended for an ordinary voyage policy altered to meet this peculiar African trade, and further altered into a time policy for twelve months. Thus much appears clear enough, that this is a policy partly on the ship (with which we are not now concerned), and partly on the cargo. To my mind it is immaterial whether it said on cargo or on goods,—goods, I think, would mean cargo, cargo would mean goods. It means, in my opinion, the goods which, on such a voyage, would be all that are to be carried by the vessel as her cargo, and if it had been the word “goods,” the same would have been meant. The facts appear to be this: that this ship sailed on this time policy from Liverpool, and that it attached on the cargo which she had on board. The nature of the adventure on which she was bound to the coast of Africa, was that the cargo taken on board at Liverpool was intended to be substituted and exchanged by barter for cargo the produce of the coast of Africa. There are words in the body of the policy intended to meet that state of things, and which, no doubt, were framed in those terms when originally the natives were in the habit of carrying on the barter from their canoes alongside the ship, and as the master parted with the European goods which the natives wanted to receive, he obtained from the natives the produce of their country in exchange. The effect of the words in the policy is, that it is to continue to attach to what is substituted for the goods originally put on board: that this policy on the cargo that went out is to be also on the cargo that comes in the place of it afterwards. In this case it appears that the cargo that went out from Liverpool to Africa arrived on the coast of Africa, and that 57 per cent. was safely landed, and the ship was lost with the other 43 per cent. on board. Nothing being substituted for the 57 per cent. which had left the ship, it seems very clear that, as nothing had been put on board to take the place of that which was safely landed, only 43 per cent. was lost of that on which the risk had originally attached. That is in effect what was decided in the Court below. Had other produce been partially put on board, it might have been a troublesome question, not of law but of fact, whether that which was partially put on board was the whole of what was intended to be substituted, or only a part of it. When the question arises it will be time enough to consider it. But the Court below had evidently that present to their mind, and they expressly point to that where they speak of the datum value of the full cargo intended to be put on board. Had some other produce been put on board and the ship then lost, I hardly know how one could then get at this datum, except by a compromise or agreement between the parties. But that difficulty does not apply to the present case, for it seems to me to be clear enough that what was lost was 43 per cent. of the cargo, and no more. That being so, I think the decision of the Court below was perfectly right for the reasons I have stated.

Judgment affirmed.

Shipping—Merchant Shipping Amendment Act, 1862, s. 67.—Landing Goods entered for a particular Warehouse—Offer to take Delivery—Notice before Landing.

By the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act, 1862, (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63. s. 67.), a shipowner is empowered to land goods imported in his ship from foreign parts subject to the condition, that "if before the goods are landed the owner thereof has made entry for the landing and warehousing thereof at any particular wharf other than that at which the ship is discharging, and has offered and been ready to take delivery thereof, and the shipowner has failed to make such delivery, and has also failed at the time of such offer to give the owner of the goods correct information of the time at which such goods can be delivered, then the shipowner shall, before landing or unshipping such goods under the power hereby given to him, give to the owner of the goods twenty-four hours' notice in writing of his readiness to deliver the goods, and shall, if he lands or unships the same without such notice do so at his own risk and expense":—Held, that the owner of the goods when he makes an offer to take delivery of them must be in a condition to receive the same if the offer be then accepted in order to entitle him to the benefit of such condition.

Held, further, that when such offer is made, the shipowner, if he then fails not only to make delivery of the goods, but also to give such owner of the goods information of the time at which they can be delivered, is bound to give the twenty-four hours' notice above specified before he lands the goods, although he was never asked to give such information.

The first count of the declaration stated, that before and at the time of the grievances hereinafter mentioned the plaintiffs were owners of goods, to wit, of hides, within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1862, and were entitled, as agents for the owners thereof, to the possession of the same. That the defendants were shipowners within the said act, and were authorized to act as agents for the owners of a certain ship called the City of Edinburgh, and were entitled to receive the freight, demurrage and other charges in respect of the said ship. That the said goods were imported in the said ship from foreign parts into the United Kingdom in the said ship, and that before the said goods were landed or unshipped the defendants made entry of the said goods, within the meaning of the said act, for the landing and warehousing thereof at their wharf, called Pickle Herring Upper Wharf, which said wharf was not the wharf at which the said ship was discharging, and were entitled and ready and offered to take delivery of the said goods; of all which premises the defendants had notice. That all things were done, and had happened and existed, and all times had elapsed to entitle them to take such delivery, and to land the said goods, yet the defendants did not allow them to do so. That the defendants and all persons whose duty it was so to do failed to make such delivery, and failed at the time of such offer to give the plaintiffs correct information of the time at which the said goods could be delivered. That, without the consent of the plaintiffs, the defendants landed and unshipped the said goods at a wharf or place, to wit, at the London Docks, other than the plaintiffs' wharf, which had been named in the entry as aforesaid, and without giving to them, being the owners of the said goods and wharf as aforesaid, twenty-four hours' notice of their readiness to deliver the said goods, and did not bear or pay the expenses of landing and unshipping the same; and that, by reason of the premises, the plaintiffs were compelled and obliged, in order to obtain possession of the said goods, to pay divers large sums of money and the expenses which had been incurred by reason of such landing and unshipping as aforesaid, and also lost the use of, and had to pay large sums for the demurrage of divers barges and lighters which they had employed to take delivery of the said goods, delivery of which the defendants failed to make, and did not allow the plaintiffs to take, as in that count mentioned.

The defendants pleaded the general issue; and traversed, inter alia, that the plaintiffs were ready and willing and had offered to take delivery of the goods; and that they, the defendants, had notice as alleged.

The action was tried, before Byles, J., at the London Sittings after Hilary Term, 1864, when, without leaving any question to the jury, a verdict was entered, by consent, for the plaintiffs for 10*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*, with leave to the defendants to move to enter the verdict for them if the Court should be of opinion that upon the facts proved the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover, the Court having power to draw inferences of fact.

The plaintiffs were wharfingers, and the London Dock Company were the real defendants, the question being as to the construction of the 7th condition or paragraph in the 67th section of the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act, 1862, the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63. (1), and the rights of wharfingers thereunder.

The nominal defendants to the action were the agents of the ship, the City of Edinburgh, mentioned in the declaration, and in which, amongst other goods, were fifty bales of hides, the bills of lading as to which had been indorsed by the consignees to the plaintiffs. The City of Edinburgh arrived at the London Docks on the 24th of March 1863, and upon her reporting her arrival at the Custom-house, and before the hides (the goods in question) were landed or unshipped, the plaintiffs as owners thereof passed the entry at the Custom-house and obtained the usual order for the delivery of the goods overside the vessel into craft, to be landed at the plaintiffs' private wharf. This order was handed by the plaintiffs to their lighterman, of the name of Chapman, who sent it to the ship by the hands of his apprentice Caney. Accordingly Caney went to the vessel in the London Docks, and at 4 o'clock p.m. on the 26th of March 1863, he gave this order for delivery to the second mate, who was then on board in charge of the vessel, and at the same time applied for the goods. The mate said they were not ready, and Caney thereupon went away, and no information was given of the time when the goods would be ready, nor was such information asked for.

It appeared in evidence that Caney was a lad of only about eighteen, and that he had no lighter with him when he went to the vessel, but there was a barge belonging to his master then in the docks about 100 yards off from the vessel, and Chapman himself gave evidence that he had arranged with other men to use their craft in case of need. The ordinary working hours at the docks are from eight to four in the afternoon, but the legal hours for free goods are from six to six, and occasionally they work during those hours. At the time Caney delivered the delivery-order the crew had left the vessel.

On the 28th of March the hides, being reached in the course of unloading the vessel, were taken out and landed in the docks without twenty-four hours' notice

(1) The 67th section enacts, that "Where the owner of any goods imported in any ship from foreign parts into the United Kingdom fails to make entry thereof, or having made entry thereof to land the same or take delivery thereof and to proceed therewith with all convenient speed, by the times severally hereinafter mentioned, the shipowner may make entry of, and land or unship the said goods at the times, in the manner, and subject to the conditions following (that is to say):"

Amongst other conditions is the following, viz. "(7.) If at any time before the goods are landed or unshipped the owner thereof has made entry for the landing and warehousing thereof at any particular wharf or warehouse other than that at which the ship is discharging, and has offered, and been ready to take delivery thereof, and the shipowner has failed to make such delivery, and has also failed at the time of such offer to give the owner of the goods correct information of the time at which such goods can be delivered, then the shipowner shall, before landing or unshipping such goods under the power hereby given to him, give to the owner of the goods, or of such wharf or warehouse as last aforesaid, twenty-four hours' notice in writing of his readiness to deliver the goods, and shall, if he lands or unships the same without such notice, do so at his own risk and expense."

having been given to the plaintiffs, and the dock company afterwards refused to let the plaintiffs have the goods except upon payment of 10*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*, their usual landing and warehouse charges. The plaintiffs, having paid this sum under protest, brought the present action to recover it back; and the question was, whether they were entitled to the twenty-four hours' notice required by the 67th section of the act to be given by the shipowner before landing the goods by him under the powers of that section.

Giffard, for the defendants, having obtained a rule nisi to enter the verdict for the defendants pursuant to the leave reserved at the trial,—

F. M. White now shewed cause.—The plaintiffs offered and were ready to receive the goods, and complied with the terms mentioned in the 7th paragraph to section 67. of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63. so as to entitle them to the twenty-four hours' notice before the goods were landed by the shipowner. The cases of Gatliffe v. Bourne (2) and Howard v. Shepherd (3), shew that, according to the law as it stood before that statute, the shipowner was bound to wait a reasonable time for the consignee to claim delivery of the goods before landing them. The clause as to the twenty-four hours' notice was introduced into the act at the instance of the wharfingers, who might otherwise have been obliged to keep their craft about a vessel for a long time uselessly and at great expense. According to the statute, this notice must be given if the shipowner fails to give information when the goods will be ready for delivery. The act does not say if he refuses, which would imply a previous request, but uses the word "fail." Therefore, if he omits to give such information he must then give them twenty-four hours' notice.

Giffard and Murphy, in support of the rule.—The plaintiffs did not apply for the goods at a proper time, nor with the proper means and appliances for receiving them. A mere offer to take delivery of the goods will not satisfy the statute. There must be at the time it is made a readiness to take such delivery. Here the plaintiffs were not so ready as to entitle them to the benefit of the 7th condition in the 67th section.

What was done by them on the occasion was, in fact, only a colourable compliance with the statute. The offer to take the goods being made at 4 o'clock, the ordinary hour to leave off work, and when in fact the crew had left, was not a proper time to make it a good offer to satisfy the statute. It might have done to have made it at that hour if the crew were still there, but not otherwise—Startup v. Macdonald (4). Then, with regard to the other branch of this section, it is submitted the words "failed at the time of such offer to give the owner of the goods correct information," &c., import that such information had been previously demanded. If so, then as none was here asked there was no failure to give information.

ERLE, C.J.—In considering the evidence in this case, the balance to my mind is in favour of the plaintiffs' right to recover. The shipowner had a right to land the goods, unless the merchant brought himself within the 7th condition of the 67th section of the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act, 1862. The facts appear to be that certain hides being on board the ship, the City of Edinburgh, in the London Docks, the plaintiffs, the owners of the hides, made an entry and got the custom-house order for their delivery over the ship's side; they gave that order to a lighterman, and the lighterman sent it by a young man of the name of Caney, who went on board the ship to ask for the goods and gave the delivery-order to the mate, the person then in charge of the ship. The mate said the goods were not ready, whereupon the young man went away. Now, do these facts shew that the plaintiffs offered and were ready to take delivery of the goods? It is clear that they desired to take them to the wharf, and they sent the official document which entitled them to receive those goods, through the proper channel (viz. the lighterman) for taking goods from the ship to the wharf where they were destined. I cannot call this a colourable compliance with the statute. If what was done had occurred during the working hours, there cannot be the least doubt that a lighterman of the age of eighteen was just as able to receive a cargo of hides as a lighterman of the age of twenty-one, and a lighter which was lying ten or twenty yards off in the London Docks the payment of it on a ground which appears to me to be a matter of perfect indifference. The men holding rateable property must maintain the poor, and if we were to authorize parties to dispute the point of form about the validity of a rate, and keep back the funds required for the maintenance of the poor, we should be setting a bad example. I think, therefore, in this case that the claimant is not entitled to vote.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The rate is perfectly good on the face of it, and it is found in the case that it has been published, and has been allowed by two magistrates. The statute 59 Geo. 3. c. 12, which creates the office of assistant overseer, makes him appointable by the vestry, and says nothing about obedience to the orders of his fellow-overseers, but authorizes him in the largest terms to execute such of the duties of the overseer of the poor as shall in the warrant of his appointment be expressed. Now, the warrant here, in the fullest terms, appoints him to assist the overseers of the poor in the performance of all the duties incident to the office of overseer, except the collection of rates. Looking at the statute, therefore, and the warrant of his appointment, he seems to be invested with the full power of an overseer. Mr. Hannen says that he is in the nature of a servant. It would not appear from the language of the statute that he was a servant, but rather that he was a coadjutor or fellow-officer; and that point is now past dispute, because both this Court, in Points v. Attwood (4), and the Court of Queen's Bench, in The Queen v. Watts (3), have held that he is not the servant, but the fellow-officer of the churchwardens and overseers. That being so, if it had stood there, if we were now going into the merits of the case on appeal, I own, without giving any distinct opinion upon it, I should doubt whether this was a bad rate. My Lord has pointed out the case of The King v. Folly (7); and looking at that case there seems to be good reason why the act of parliament should require the allowance of a rate by the magistrates, because strangers in the parish would not know who were the overseers who ought to sign; but the signatures of two Justices resident in the neighbourhood might satisfy them upon the point, and although they do not make the rate good if the proper persons have not signed it, yet they may make the rate so far good that it is subject only to being quashed on appeal. It seems to me impossible to say that the revising barrister has come to a wrong conclusion.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I entirely agree with the reasons given by my Lord and my Brother Byles. Mr. Hannen relies in his view of the case upon the terms of the statute 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, insisting that by that statute the assistant overseer was to obey the orders of the majority of the overseers. Now, I do not know why we should in this case hold that, in signing the rate, the assistant overseer was not obeying the orders of the majority of the overseers. It is not stated that he was not. Under these circumstances, I think the decision ought to be affirmed.

Decision affirmed, with costs.

Borough Vote—Notice of Objection—
6 Vict. c. 18, sch. B. form 10.

In the borough of D. there were two parishes or townships, S. and E, and there was a separate list of voters for each parish or township. The notice of objection described the objector as "on the list of voters for the borough of D. and township of E":—Held, that the notice sufficiently indicated on which of the two lists the voter's name was to be found.

Appeal against the decision of the Revising Barrister for the borough of Devonport.

E. W. Cole objected to the name of John Adams being retained upon the list of voters for the said borough.

The notice of objection was duly served, both upon the overseers and the voter, and was in the following form:

"To Mr. John Adams.

"33, Union Street, East Stonehouse.

"I hereby give you notice, that I object to your name being retained on the list of persons entitled to vote in the election of members for the borough of Devonport and township of East Stonehouse. Dated this 24th day of August 1864.

"Edward William Cole, of 69, Durnford Street, on the list of voters for the borough of Devonport and township of East Stonehouse."

It was objected to these notices, that it did not appear from them on what list the objector's name was to be found; and moreover, that there was in fact no such list as that described in the notice of objection.

The borough of Devonport consists of the parish of Stoke Damerel and the parish or township of East Stonehouse; each of these parishes has distinct churchwardens and overseers, distinct places of worship, and separate lists of voters are stuck up at the several places of worship by the respective overseers and churchwardens of each parish or township.

The list stuck up by the churchwardens and overseers of Stoke Damerel is headed, "List of persons entitled to vote for the borough of Devonport, in respect of property occupied within the parish of Stoke Damerel."

The list stuck up by the churchwardens and overseers for the parish or township of East Stonehouse is headed, "List of persons entitled to vote for the borough of Devonport, in respect of property occupied within the township of East Stonehouse."

On this list the name of the said Edward William Cole appeared, with the place of residence, as stated in the notice of objection. There is no other Durnford Street in the borough of Devonport than the Durnford Street in which the said Edward William Cole lives, and that is within the township of East Stonehouse.

The Revising Barrister held the notice to be sufficient.

Karslake (Lopes with him), for the appellant, referred to Eidsforth v. Farrer (1) and Crowthey v. Bradney (2).

ERLE, C.J.—I think the revising barrister was right. It appears from the form given in Schedule B. to the 6 Vict. c. 18. (No. 10), that in the notice of objection to be delivered to the overseers, the place of abode of the objector must be stated, and the list of voters in which the name of the voter appears; and it is added in a note, that if there is more than one list of voters, the notice of objection should specify the list to which the objection refers. In this case it appears that there are two lists of voters for the borough of Devonport; one for the parish of Stoke Damerel, and the other for the township of East Stonehouse. The notice in this case describes the objector as "of 69, Durnford Street, on the list of voters for the borough of Devonport and township of East Stonehouse." I think that would sufficiently guide a person to the list intended, namely, the list of those voters for the borough of Devonport who reside in the township of East Stonehouse.

BYLES, J. and KEATING, J. concurred.

Decision affirmed.

Borough Vote—Freemen—2 Will. 4. c. 15. s. 32.

In a borough in which freemen by birth were entitled to vote before the passing of the Reform Act, the right is preserved, by section 32, not only to those whose fathers were entitled to their freedom previously to the 31st of March 1831, but to the lineal descendants of all persons entitled to their freedom before that day.

Appeal from the decision of the Revising Barrister for the borough of Barnstaple.

J. P. Tucker duly objected to the claim of William Saunders to be placed on the list of voters for the borough.

In the borough of Barnstaple there is a body of freemen. The sons of these freemen are entitled, on proving their father's marriage, that they were born of that marriage, and that they have attained the age of twenty-one years, to be admitted as freemen of this borough; but they can claim from or through no other relation than their father, and in no other way than that described.

The said William Saunders was duly admitted as a freeman (by right of birth from his father) of the said borough on the 31st of July 1856. His father was admitted also by right of birth on the 2nd of May 1831, having only come of age on the 4th of April in that year. The grandfather was admitted by right of birth on the 14th of October 1810.

On this state of facts it was contended on the part of the objector that as the said William Saunders derived his right to be admitted as a freeman of the said borough through his father, from and through whom alone he could claim, and as it was necessary by the 32nd section of the Reform Act that the father, to give him the right claimed, viz., to be on the list of freemen voting for the borough, should have been admitted a freeman or have been entitled to be admitted as a freeman previously to the 1st day of March 1831, and that as he (the father) was not admitted till the 1st day of May 1831, nor entitled to be admitted till he came of age on the 4th day of April in that year, the said William Saunders's right to be placed on the list of freemen voting for that borough could not be sustained. On the other side, it was contended, in support of the vote, that although the father could not have been admitted as a freeman till he came of age, that he had an inchoate right to be so admitted previously to the 1st day of March 1831, which was perfected on his coming of age, and that this was sufficient to satisfy the proviso of the 32nd section of the Reform Act, and to sustain the vote.

The Revising Barrister held that the said William Saunders originally derived his right from or through his father, and that there was no one from or through whom he thus derived his right, who was a freeman or entitled to be a freeman previously to the 1st day of March 1831, and that the vote could not be sustained, and the Revising Barrister struck his name out of the list.

W. H. Cooke, for the appellant.—The claimant was entitled to vote. The question turns on the 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 32. That section provides that every person who would have been entitled to vote at a borough election, either as a burgess or freeman, if that act had not been passed, shall be still entitled to vote, provided such person shall be duly registered according to the provisions contained in the act; but that no such person shall be so registered in any year, unless he shall, on the last day of July in such year, be qualified in such manner as would entitle him then to vote, if such day were the day of election, and this act had not been passed; nor unless certain other requirements are fulfilled about which there is here no question. The same section then provides that no person who shall have been elected, made, or admitted a burgess or freeman since the 1st day of March 1831, otherwise than in respect of birth or servitude, or who shall hereafter be elected, made, or admitted a burgess or freeman, otherwise than in respect of birth or servitude, shall be entitled to vote as such in any such election for any city or borough as aforesaid, or to be so registered as aforesaid: provided also, that no person shall be so entitled as a burgess or freeman in respect of birth, unless his right be originally derived from or through some person who was a burgess or freeman or entitled to be admitted a burgess or freeman previously to the 1st day of March 1831, or from or through some person who since that time shall have become or shall hereafter become a burgess or freeman in respect of servitude. The question is, in fact, whether the right of voting is preserved to freemen in perpetuity or only to those who are sons of persons actually entitled to vote on the 1st of March 1831. It is contended that the franchise in respect of birth or servitude is intended to be preserved in perpetuity. The question turns on what is meant by the right being "originally derived from or through some person who was a burgess or freeman." It is said that this voter can only derive his vote from his father or through his father. But it is clear that he derives it from his grandfather, and all his other ancestors who were entitled to vote, just as a man derives a title of honour. He referred to Gale v. Chubb (1), Croucher v. Brown (2) and Elliott on Registration, p. 73, edit. 1843.

Dowdeswell, contra.—The intention of the legislature was only to preserve existing rights and inchoate rights, except in the case of the right acquired by servitude. Persons in being who, if the act had not passed, would have gained a right, had an inchoate right which the legislature intended to preserve.

Cooke was not called on to reply.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the decision of the revising barrister was wrong. The question is, whether the right of voting is preserved to freemen by birth for one descent only, or to all their lineal descendants. I am of opinion that it is preserved to all. The beginning of section 32. is general, and preserves the right of voting to all persons who would have been entitled if that act had not passed, on certain conditions. Then comes a proviso which excludes from the right to vote all persons made freemen or burgesses after March 1831, except those whose claim to be made burgesses or freemen is founded on birth or servitude. To those whose claim is so founded the right is preserved, although they are not made burgesses until after March 1831. But with respect to persons whose claim is founded on birth there is this limitation, that their right must be "originally derived from or through some person who was a burgess or freeman or entitled to be admitted a burgess or freeman previously to the 1st day of March 1831." Now, I think, the present claimant has fulfilled that requirement of the statute. I think he did originally derive his right from some person who was a freeman previously to the 1st of March 1831, namely, his grandfather. I think the legislature intended to preserve the right of voting to freemen by birth as a continuous hereditary right, and did not intend to restrict it to one generation after the passing of the act. It is clear that votes passed on freedom by birth were not intended to be entirely extinguished, because the section expressly preserves them to those freemen or burgesses by birth who derive their right "from or through some person who since that time [i. e. the 31st of March] shall have become, or shall hereafter become a burgess or freeman in respect of servitude." It provides, therefore, that the sons of freemen by ser-vitute, who are freemen by right of birth, should have the franchise through all time. When the revising barrister says that voters in this borough can claim from or through no other relative than their father, I do not understand him to mean anything more than that only freemen and the sons of freemen are entitled to vote, without reference to this statute.

BYLES, J.—I am clearly of the same opinion. Freemen by birth are entitled to vote in this borough if they are not excluded by section 32. of the Reform Act. The grandfather of this claimant was admitted a freeman by birth in the year 1810. His son not being of age was not entitled to be admitted on the last day of March 1831. The respondent says the claimant is excluded because he does not claim "from or through" a person whose right of freedom was complete on the day named. But I entirely agree with the Lord Chief Justice, that the claimant does claim "from or through" his grandfather in the sense in which these words are used in this section. There is no reason for confining the words "some person" to the claimant's father, and there is no instance in which franchises of this description are not abolished altogether or preserved in perpetuity.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. Looking to the general scope of the act, I think the legislature intended to preserve the right to vote to a person whose grandfather was entitled to his freedom previously to the 31st of March 1831, although his father was not so.

Decision reversed.

1864. { BLAIN, appellant, v. THE OVER-
Nov. 18. { SEERS OF PILKINGTON, respondents.

Parliament — County Vote — Power to re-hear.

A. and B. were appointed to revise the list of voters for the county of L. At a Court held by A. the name of a voter was duly objected to, and the voter not being present his name was struck off. The Court was adjourned, and on the following day the voter came before B, who was then presiding, and explained the cause of his absence, and prayed for a re-hearing. B. consented to re-hear the case, and eventually restored the voter's name to the list. Upon an appeal to this Court, the case not stating whether on the second day the objector was present or not,—Held, that in the absence of this statement the decision of the Revising Barrister could not be supported.

Appeal from the decision of one of the two Revising Barristers appointed for the Southern Division of the county of Lancaster.

At a Court held, by adjournment, in Bury, on the 13th of October 1864, before A, one of the barristers appointed to revise the list of voters in the election of members of Parliament for the southern division of Lancashire, the Rev. Thomas Corser, incumbent of Stand, in the township of Pilkington, applied to have his name restored on the list for that township.

The name had been removed from the Pilkington register in due course of proceeding by B, the other revising barrister for the same division of the county, at a previous sitting of the Court in Bury, in consequence of its having been duly objected to, and of the absence of the applicant, or any one on his behalf, when the name in its order was called. At the time in question the applicant had been in attendance on his bishop in performance of his duties as rural dean of Bury; but with due precaution he had provided a fit and proper person to attend the Revising Barrister's Court on his behalf, and support his right to remain on the register.

Upon this application being made, objection was taken that A. had no power to entertain it.

But A. was of opinion, first, that although the list in question had been gone through, and been duly initialed and signed by B, his colleague, yet as it was still in his hands, his power to do in open court all things proper for perfecting the list in accordance with the intention and purpose of the statutes in that case provided, still remained. Secondly, that the marks of erasure upon the name and qualification of the applicant in the list accompanied by the initials of his colleague in the margin, were to him sufficient evidence that a valid notice of objection in this particular instance had been duly proved in open court, and that it was competent for him, without further proof of such notice, to investigate the right of the applicant to be upon the register. Thirdly, that such investigation, after being initiated by proof of such notice, was a proceeding in the hands of the revising barrister solely, and was not invalidated by the absence of the objector or his agent, or, if present, by any refusal on their part to assist.

Being further of opinion that the applicant through no default in him had been removed from the register, A. did, in the exercise of his discretion, entertain the application, and upon investigation of his right, being satisfied that he was entitled to be on the register, he restored the name of the applicant.

Keane, for the appellant, referred to the 6 Vict. c. 41, ss. 29, 30, 31, 40, and 41.

No one appeared for the respondent.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the revising barrister had no power to do what he has done in this case. Two barristers were appointed to revise the list of voters in the southern division of the county of Lancaster, and at a Court held by one of them a question was raised between a voter and a person having a right to object as to the right of the former to a vote. This was a proceeding in foro contentioso. The objector was there to support his objection; the voter was not there to support his right. Thereupon the Judge disposed of the question in favour of the objector, and struck off the vote. As I read the case, on the following day, the voter came before the other barrister appointed for this division and prayed for a new trial, on the ground that his absence on the previous day was justifiable. The revising barrister consented to re-hear the case, and eventually restored the name of the voter.

Now the ground upon which I give my judgment, in favour of the appellant, that the revising barrister had no power to do this is, that it does not appear from the case that the objector was present when the case was re-heard. If the matter was to be re-heard, at least he ought to have had some notice of it, so that he might attend and support his objection.

I am desirous to the last degree of upholding the power of any tribunal to amend errors in its own proceedings. There is, however, a great distinction between amendments made in the course of a proceeding and amendments made after the matter has been heard and determined. In the latter case great caution is required, and especially in the case where there are two revising barristers acting concurrently, and one rehears a case which has been finally heard and determined by another. It is quite clear that if the objector was not present, we ought to hold that the judgment given by the first barrister expunging the name was conclusive, and that the second barrister had no power to restore the name of the voter.

Nov. 18. } WORTH, respondent.

Parliament—County Vote—Inmate of an Hospital—Separate Interest in Land.

An hospital was founded, and lands were devised to trustees upon trust to permit the rectors of two parishes to make certain fixed payments out of the profits to the inmates of the hospital. The inmates had each a separate room, and were removable for misbehaviour. There was a surplus income after making the specified payments not disposed of by the deed which created the trust:—Held, that the inmates of the hospital were not entitled to the surplus, and had not any equitable freehold interest in the lands of the charity, and were, therefore, not entitled to a county vote.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Revising Barrister for the Northern Division of the county of Leicester.

At a Court, held at Bottesford, J. A. Bosworth duly objected to the name of George Steele being retained on the list of voters for the parish of Bottesford. The name stood on the register as follows :

Steele George.	Bottesford.	Freehold interest in land.	Hospital land.
----------------	-------------	----------------------------	----------------

It was proved, in evidence, that George Steele was an inmate of Bottesford Hospital for men in the same parish, founded, by the Earl of Rutland, in or about the year 1692, which from time to time was augmented until the year 1762, when certain lands and tenements in Bottesford, Muston, Abkettleby, Hotwell and Long Clowson, were conveyed to trustees therein named; and which conveyance, after reciting that the rents of the premises comprised in certain indentures therein recited had for some time been found sufficient for the support of fourteen poor people, and the said Duke [of Rutland] being desirous to extend the said charity to the maintenance of two other poor persons, had directed two more to be added to the twelve poor people already provided for out of the revenues of the said hospital, and declared that the said trustees should stand possessed of the said lands and tenements upon the following trusts, that is to say :

"In trust that they the said trustees and survivors or survivor of them should permit and suffer the rectors of the rectories of Bottesford and Harley, respectively, for ever to receive and take the rents and profits of all and singular the said messuages, lands and premises thereby respectively granted, bargained and sold, as often as the same should become due and payable, to the intent and purpose that they the said rectors and their successors, or the rector for the time being of Bottesford and Harley aforesaid respectively, for ever should and would, by and out of the said rents and profits, pay and distribute to the fourteen poor men who then were, or thereafter should be legally and rightly admitted into and placed in the said hospital (that is to say) to each and every of them once in every month the sum of 10s. 8d. of current British money, and also the sum of 6d. to each and every of the said poor men four several times in the year, namely, Easter, Whitsuntide, Bottesford feast, and Christmas, for pie-money; and also the sum of 10d. to each and every of the said poor men, in December every year, in lieu of capon-money; and also in February and August yearly to every of the said poor men 6d. a time, for buying them salt; and also to every of them the said poor men the sum of 10d. in September, yearly, for the finding them with candles; and also the sum of 1s. 6d. every month for the fire-maker of the said poor men's fires; and also the sum of 30s. for each and every of the said poor men, in April, yearly, for the providing every of them a suit of clothes, and to each and every of them a good cloth gown, and making, at Easter, every other second year; and also the sum of 6s. 8d. a man to the laundress for washing each poor man's clothes, at Lady Day and Michaelmas, yearly, by even and equal portions; and also out of the said rents to find and provide for each of the said poor men 20 cwt. of hard coals to be laid in yearly, in the month of May, and also then and from time to time, and at all times hereafter, to find and provide all necessary and reasonable beds and bedding, household goods and other necessary utensils for the use and benefit of the said poor men, but at the discretion of the said trustees, parties to these presents; and should maintain, repair and keep the said hospital or almshouse, with all necessary amendments and reparations, and also provide physic and attendance for the sick; and in case the said trustees or their successors, or the rectors for the time being of Bottesford and Harley aforesaid, should neglect or refuse to act or concern themselves in the said trust pursuant to, and to be guided by, the directions aforesaid, then and in such case it was thereby declared and agreed by and between all the said parties to these presents, and the said John Duke of Rutland (party thereto) did authorize and empower the said trustees, or any three of them, by any writing under their hands respectively, and also any subsequent grantees of the said premises, to nominate and appoint three or more honest and discreet persons to act and be concerned in the said trust in such manner as the rectors aforesaid, or any of them might or were to do by virtue of these presents and of the powers aforesaid.

And it was thereby declared and agreed by and between all the said parties to these presents, and the said John Duke of Rutland (party thereto) did declare, that the said sole power of nominating or appointing for any person or persons whatsoever to be placed and admitted in the said hospital should be and remain in the said Duke and his heirs male for ever; and in case of failure of such heirs male, then the lord or lords of the manor of Bottesford, at the time of such failure, and their successors, lord or lords for the time being, should have the right of nomination and placing of poor persons in such manner as the said Duke then had and his heirs might have; and it was further declared, that in case any of the said poor men, after such nomination or admission into the said hospital, should in any way abuse the said charity by their immoralities, profaneness, or lewdness, or other misbehaviour, then it should and might be lawful for, and be in the power of the said then present Duke, party thereto, or his heirs, or, for failure of such, for the lords of Bottesford and their successors for the time being, to remove and displace such person or persons so as he or they should not have the benefit or advantage of the said charity, and to nominate and appoint any other person or persons in the place and stead of such person or persons so to be removed. And in the said conveyance is contained a declaration that the said trustees should demise or lease all or any part of the said premises for a term not exceeding twenty-one years so as upon every such lease there be reserved the full and inpr oved rent without any fine to be paid.

It was further proved that the said George Steele was paid by the trustees of the hospital the sum of 9s. 2d. per week; that the appointment of the hospital men by the Duke of Rutland for the time being was by word of mouth or by letter to his agent, who reduced such appointment to writing, and forwarded it to the parties so appointed; that there was in the said hospital a common hall, where the hospital men had their meals; that each man had a separate room with a pantry, and that all the apartments were numbered; that the entrance to the said hospital is by one outer door into a passage, at the end of which is a second door, and all the inner doors of the said apartments open into the said passage; that a matron is appointed by the said trustees, who has apartments allotted to her, and who receives a salary of 20*l*. per annum, and whose duties consist in the general superintendence, in cleaning the apartments, and in cooking and working for the said hospital men; that the said hospital men pay no rates or taxes, and never repair the apartments; that they enjoy the use of an orchard and garden adjoining the hospital, and are supplied from the funds of the trust with coal, medicine, medical attendance and all necessaries (except meat and provisions), they also receive a cloak apiece once in two years; that they have uninterrupted enjoyment of their apartments, together with a key and with a power of ingress and egress at any time; but that after nine o'clock at night the matron, by arrangement among the hospital men, locks the outer door and hangs up the key in the passage; that no instance has ever been known of an hospital man being removed, although a power to remove is contained in the deed for immorality, &c., nor has any instance been known of any of the poor men having sublet their apartments; that as the rents of the said lands and tenements mentioned in the said deed of conveyance increased such increased rents were distributed among the hospital men from time to time, and so far back as the year 1778 each man has been in receipt of upwards of 10*l*. per annum, and each man is now in actual receipt of 9*s.* 2*d.* per week, exclusive of coals and gown.

Upon proof of the above facts, the Revising Barrister held: first, that although the weekly payments to each of the hospital men amounted to more than 10*l*. per annum, as the power of appointment and removal expressed on the deed appeared to him to be discretionary with the Duke of Rutland for the time being, that the said George Steele had not such an equitable freehold in the land as to entitle him, under the provisions of the 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 18, to have his name retained upon the register of voters for the said parish of Bottesford, in the said division of the said county; secondly, that even if that were not so, the said George Steele was simply a member of an eleemosynary institution, and as such was not entitled to have his name retained upon the said register.

The Revising Barrister accordingly expunged the name of the said George Steele from the list of voters.

Mellish, for the appellant.—The claim is here rested not on the rooms occupied by the inmate of the hospital, but on his freehold interest in the property of the hospital. Notwithstanding what is stated by the Revising Barrister, the deed itself shews that the Duke has no power to remove any of the hospital men at his discretion. It is the grant of an estate to an inmate quandiu se bene gesserit, which is a freehold estate. The other side will perhaps contend that the hospital men have no estate at all. But the mere fact that this is a charitable institution does not prevent the members having an estate in the lands of the charity. The whole rents and profits are divisible amongst the hospital men. Each hospital man has a fourteenth share in the profits of certain lands, subject to certain charges, for life, which share is above the value of 10*l*.; that is an equitable estate of freehold which confers the franchise, under the 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 18. Davis v. Waddington (1) was decided on the ground that the governor of the charity had a general power to remove the inmates. In Simpson v. Wilkinson (2), in Freeman v. Gainsford (3) and in Heartley v. Banks (4), the claim was made for the rooms occupied by the inmates.

Hayes, for the respondent.—There is nothing to shew an equitable freehold of the yearly value of 10*l*. The hospital men, in fact, receive more than 10*l*., but that is by sufferance only. All the payments specified by the deed amount to about 6*l.* a year only. In this respect the case is like Ashmore v. Lees (5). The judgment in Freeman v. Gainsford (3) clearly shews that inmates of an institution receiving payments of this kind have no estate whatever.

Mellish, in reply.—The intention of the grantor clearly was, that the whole income of the hospital should be applied for the benefit of the hospital men. Though certain payments were specified, yet if these do not exhaust the income of the hospital, the residue is divisible among the hospital men. There is no resulting use in favour of the grantor—The Attorney General v. the Drapers' Company (6).

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the revising barrister was right. The claim was for a freehold interest in land in the parish of Bottesford, and it appeared that there was in that parish an hospital founded by the Earl of Rutland about the year 1692. In 1762 the lands belonging to the hospital were re-conveyed to trustees, and the trusts declared were that they should pay and distribute to each of the fourteen poor men who were inmates of the hospital for the time being a payment of 10s. 6d. a month, and a number of other small payments. The legal estate is thereby vested in trustees upon trust to allow the rectors of the parishes of Bottesford and Harley to appropriate in a charitable manner a portion of the income. But the deed is entirely silent as to the disposition of the surplus after the trusts specified are fulfilled; and there is nothing from which it can be inferred that it is appropriated to the inmates of this hospital. The claim here is for a freehold interest. Legal estate the voter has none, and I think he has no equitable interest in the lands of the charity. All he has is a right to certain payments out of the profits of those lands. I cannot see in this deed the least sign of a grant of an equitable estate in the land to the inmates of this hospital. In Freeman v. Gainsford (3) the inmate of an hospital claimed the franchise in respect of the chamber in which he lived, but the Court held that he had no property in the room, although it was assigned to his use. I said, "It seems to me that he (the inmate) is elected as a mere object of charity; and that, when the governor assigns his rooms for his residence, he does not confer upon him any estate which he could enforce by bill in equity." And Williams, J. says, "The language of the constitutions simply is, that the accommodation provided for the recipients of the charity shall be regulated in a certain way. They are to take for their lives, subject to removal for any of the offences specified. But it does not, therefore, follow, that the particular rooms are to be assigned to each of them as owner for his life. It seems to me to be clear that he has not the right of an equitable owner at all." So here I take it to be clear that the inmates of the hospital, having a right to certain payments from the trustees, who collect the profits of the lands of the charity, have no equitable interest in those lands whatever.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. In order to entitle the voter to retain his name on the list, he must shew that he is entitled to an equitable estate of freehold. Now, this is not a case in which the trustees are to permit certain persons to take the rents and profits of land, or to pay over the rents and profits of land to certain persons, but they are to receive the rents and profits and to distribute a portion of the proceeds in a certain manner. It is admitted that that is not alone sufficient to give the recipients of those payments any equitable interest in the land; but it is contended that, under the provisions of the deed, the surplus, after making those payments, is distributable among the inmates of this hospital, and that, therefore, they have an equitable interest in the lands. But assuming that the trustees are, under this deed, to take the surplus for some purpose or other (about which I express no opinion), it is clear that they are not to dispose of it in any prescribed manner to any prescribed person, but in such manner and to such persons as the Court of Chancery should sanction. Although at one time I entertained some doubt, I now entertain none. I think the reasons on which the judgment in Freeman v. Gainsford (3) was decided are applicable.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think it is clear that the voter has only an equitable right to a money payment, and no equitable interest in the land itself.

(Appeal from Revising Barrister's Court.)

1864. { TEPPER AND OTHERS, appellants, v. NICHOLS, respondent.
Nov. 23, 24.

Parliament — County Vote — Freehold Interest — Shares in a Bridge — Commissioners appointed by Statute for Public Purposes — Limited Authority to convey.

By an act of Geo. 1. Commissioners were appointed for building a bridge across the Thames from Fulham to Putney, after compensating the proprietors of the then existing ferries; and a pontage or toll was granted and vested in the Commissioners, to be applied as directed by the act; and by a subsequent act of Geo. 2. for more effectually enabling the Commissioners to complete such work, they were empowered to convey in perpetuity the tolls and income of the said bridge or ferries to such persons as would undertake to erect and maintain the bridge. The Commissioners accordingly contracted with certain persons, who subscribed the necessary funds, and became the shareholders of the bridge, to build and maintain the bridge and compensate the proprietors of the said ferries; and afterwards, the bridge having been built, the Commissioners, by a deed which recited the above acts of Geo. 1. and Geo. 2. and their powers thereunder, conveyed the said bridge and tolls and all such ground adjacent and belonging to the said ferries and every other matter which they were empowered to convey, by virtue of the said acts, to certain trustees, in fee, in trust to permit the said shareholders to receive the said tolls and income, and have the sole management thereof:— Held, that the Commissioners had no power to convey the land belonging to the bridge, which had become vested in them by virtue of the said acts, and that the said shareholders having knowledge of the Commissioners' title under the said acts, acquired nothing more under the said deed than the Commissioners could lawfully convey, namely, the tolls and income; and, consequently, that none of the shareholders had, as such, any freehold estate which could qualify him for a county vote.

Appeal against the decision of the Revising Barrister appointed to revise the list of voters for the Eastern Division of Surrey.

David Nichols, on the register of voters for the said eastern division, duly objected to the names of Jabes Tepper and twenty-four other persons being retained on the Putney list of voters for the said eastern division.

The claims of the persons so objected to appeared on the register to be in respect of freehold shares or parts of such shares in Fulham and Putney Bridge. In support of the right of the said several parties to have their names retained on the said list the following documents and facts were duly established in evidence before the revising barrister. In or about the year 1724, the act 12 Geo. 1. c. xxxvi. was passed, entitled 'An act for building a bridge across the river of Thames, from the town of Fulham, in the county of Middlesex, to the town of Putney in the county of Surrey.'

By section 1. of that act certain persons were constituted and appointed commissioners and trustees for designing, directing, ordering and building such bridge, and for maintaining, preserving and supporting the same when built, and they were empowered at any time after the 24th of June 1726 to design, assign and lay out how and in what manner the said bridge should be made and built, from the town of Fulham to the town of Putney aforesaid, and the ways and passages to and from the same, and to preserve and keep in repair such ways and passages, from time to time, and to make contracts and do all matters and things for carrying on and effecting the purposes aforesaid, and to cause the same to be done and perfected accordingly. And to the intent that the navigation of the said river Thames might receive no prejudice, by section 2. it was enacted, "That when the said bridge was built across the said river, there should remain free and open passage for the water to pass and repass through the arches or passages under the said bridge of 700 feet at the least within the then present banks of the said river." By section 5. bodies corporate and others who were seised of ground in Putney or Fulham, which might be required for the purpose of making convenient approaches to the said bridge, were enabled to convey to the said commissioners and trustees, or to any nine or more of them or their successors, or as they should appoint, any such ground for the purpose of that act. By section 7. it is enacted, "That it shall be lawful to and for his Majesty, his heirs and successors, by letters patent under the Great Seal of Great Britain, to incorporate all and every the commissioners and trustees appointed by this act, or who shall be appointed pursuant thereto, to be commissioners and trustees for putting this act in execution, or such of them as shall be then living and such others as his Majesty, his heirs or successors, shall think fit, to be one body politic and corporate in deed and in name, and they and their successors to have perpetual succession and a common seal, and such seal from time to time to break, change, make new or alter, as shall be found most expedient; and that they and their successors shall be able and capable in law to have, purchase, receive, enjoy, possess and retain to them and their successors messuages, lands, rents, tenements and hereditaments of what kind, nature or quality soever; and also to sell, grant, demise, alien or dispose of the same, or any part thereof, at their free wills and pleasures; to sue and implead, be sued or impleaded, answer and be answered in courts of record or elsewhere, and to choose their successors and officers from time to time, and to do and execute all and singular other matters and things that to them shall or may appertain to do, with such powers and clauses as shall be necessary or requisite for erecting, building, or preserving and supporting the said bridge and the ways and passages thereto, from time to time."

The said commissioners and trustees were never incorporated in pursuance of this act.

By section 8. it is enacted, "That it shall not be lawful to or for the corporation or company, which shall or may be erected or established by virtue of or pursuant to this act, as such corporation or company, to borrow, or take up, or give security for any sum or sums of money payable in less than six months, or to discount any bills of exchange or other bills or notes whatsoever, or to keep any books or cash of or for any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate whatsoever, other than and except only the proper books, moneys and cash of the said company or corporation."

By section 10. it is enacted, "That a certain pontage or toll shall be paid before any passage over the said bridge shall be permitted, and that the said pontage or toll shall be vested in the said commissioners, to be by them applied, in accordance with the provisions of the said act, towards the expenses of making and maintaining the said bridge, ways and passages, and purchasing the necessary ground for the same."

By section 13. the commissioners, or any eleven or more of them, are empowered, when incorporated, by indenture or writing under their common seal to convey and assure the toll by that act granted, or any part thereof, as a security for any sum or sums of money by them to be borrowed for the purposes of the act, and to grant any annuities for one, two, or three lives, or for twenty-one years, or a less term, such annuities to be charged upon and payable out of the tolls, estates and revenues belonging to such corporation.

And by section 14. it is enacted, that such annuities shall be personal estate.

By section 16. it is enacted, "That it shall be lawful for the said commissioners and their successors, and for such intended company or corporation and their agents or officers, from time to time to remove any shelves in the said river of Thames, and make the same river deeper."

By section 17. it is enacted, "That all stones, bricks, planks, piles and other materials which shall be made use of for or towards building or making the said bridge, or in or about the same, or for maintaining, repairing or supporting the same, or for making the said river deeper as aforesaid, shall always be deemed to belong and appertain to the commissioners and corporation aforesaid."

And by section 18. it is provided, that if the said bridge shall at any time become damaged, it shall be lawful for the said commissioners or corporation to set up ferries across the said river near to the said bridge, and to take certain rates and duties for passages by such ferries over the same.

By section 19. it is enacted as follows: "It shall not be lawful to erect or build the said bridge, or any part thereof, before or until full and ample satisfaction be made for all such prejudice, loss or damage as shall or may be sustained or suffered by any of the owners, proprietors, lessees or others having any property or interest in the present horse or foot ferries between Putney and Fulham aforesaid."

By section 22. it is enacted, "That nothing in this act contained shall extend or be construed to extend to prejudice or take away any right, property or jurisdiction of the mayor, commonalty and citizens of the city of London, to, in and upon the river of Thames aforesaid, other than and except to remove any shelf or shelves, or to deepen or widen the said river, where the said bridge shall be built, and to do every other matter or thing, as shall or may be necessary for the erecting and maintaining the said bridge."

By the 1 Geo. 2. c. xviii. for explaining and amending the act above referred to, it is by section 1, enacted as follows: "The commissioners and trustees appointed by the said recited act, and those appointed by this act, or any nine or more of them, and the commissioners and trustees when incorporated in pursuance of the said former act, shall have, and they have hereby full power and authority to contract and agree with any person or persons whatsoever, as well commissioners and trustees as others, to erect and build a bridge across the said river Thames, from the said town of Fulham to the said town of Putney, and to repair, maintain and support the same when built in such manner as by the said commissioners and trustees or corporation aforesaid shall be judged proper; and the said commissioners and trustees or corporation aforesaid, or any nine or more of them, the said commissioners and trustees, before such incorporation, have hereby power and authority to grant any annuity or annuities in fee out of the profits, incomes, revenues or tolls of the said bridge, in such manner as they may by the said former act grant any other annuity or annuities, all which annuities in fee to be granted pursuant to this act shall be registered, and shall be assignable and devisable as the other annuities are by the said former act, and such annuities in fee shall be deemed personal estates and shall go as such."

And for the more effectually enabling the said commissioners and trustees and corporation aforesaid, as speedily as may be, to complete and perfect the said work, by section 3. it is enacted, "That it shall and may be lawful to and for the said commissioners and trustees, or any nine or more of them, before incorporated, and also lawful for such corporation when created, at any time or times to convey and assign over in perpetuity or otherwise all or any tolls, revenues, profits or incomes of or belonging to the said bridge or ferries, or which shall in anywise arise, accrue or belong to the same, unto such person or persons as will undertake, contract and agree to erect and build the said bridge, and to preserve and keep up the same in good and sufficient repair, and shall give sufficient security so to do to the satisfaction of the said commissioners and trustees and corporation aforesaid, anything herein or in the said former act to the contrary notwithstanding."

By section 5. it is enacted as follows: "It shall not be lawful for the said commissioners and trustees or corporation to erect or build the said bridge, or any part thereof, before or until ample satisfaction be made for all such prejudice, loss, or damage as shall or may be sustained or suffered by any of the proprietors of the horse-ferries between the said towns of Putney and Fulham, unless the said proprietors of the said ferries, by writing under their respective hands and seals, shall consent and agree with the said commissioners and trustees, or any nine or more of them, or the said corporation, to permit the said Commissioners, trustees, or corporation to build the same before such satisfaction shall be made, and in case such consent of the said proprietors shall be had and obtained in manner aforesaid, that then the said bridge, when built, and all tolls, revenues, profits and incomes belonging or to belong to the same, shall be, and are hereby made chargeable, and charged in the first place with all such sums of money as are by the said former act to be paid to the respective owners, proprietors and persons interested in the present ferries between Fulham and Putney aforesaid, and that upon payment thereof respectively, or tender and refusal, all ownership, properties and interests of, in, or to the horse and foot ferries between Putney and Fulham aforesaid shall be and are hereby extinguished and determined, and the said ferries and passage over the river of Thames there, and the ground and soil adjacent and belonging to the said respective ferries, shall be and are, by the authority of this act, transferred to and absolutely vested in the said commissioners and trustees and corporation aforesaid, and their successors and assigns for ever."

All such monies and payments for the said horse-ferries have long since been duly paid and made.

The ferries referred to in the said acts on the Putney side of the river were held and were parcel of the manor of Wimbledon, and on the Fulham side were held and were parcel of the manor of Fulham, and previously to the 21st of March 1728 Daniel Pettward and William Skelton had been respectively admitted to, and each of them then held in fee, by copy of the court-rolls of the respective manors, one undivided moiety of the ferries on both the Putney and the Fulham sides of the river; and on that day the commissioners paid to them the sum of 8,000*l.* in full satisfaction for all damages which they, or either of them, should sustain by occasion of building the bridge; the rights and interests of all other parties in the said ferries having been previously satisfied by the commissioners.

On the 19th of November 1728 a contract was duly entered into by the commissioners with thirty persons, who had subscribed 1,000*l.* each for building the bridge, and making the purchases and payments required by the said acts, by which those thirty persons contracted to build and maintain the bridge, and the ways and passages thereto, and make the said purchases and payments; and in pursuance thereof the said thirty persons did build the said bridge, and make the said payments and purchases.

By indenture of bargain and sale, bearing date the 11th of November 1729, duly enrolled in Chancery, made between the said commissioners of the first part, the said thirty persons therein named and described as being all the contractors and subscribers for building the said bridge of the second part, and certain other persons as trustees of the third part, after reciting the 1st, 2nd, 5th, 7th, 10th, 11th, 12th, 16th, 17th, 18th and 19th sections of the first above-mentioned act, and the 1st, 3rd and 5th sections of the secondly above-mentioned act, and further reciting the said contract of the 19th of November 1728, and that the said thirty persons had paid all monies they had agreed to pay, and built the said bridge, the Commissioners granted, bargained, sold, assigned and set over unto the said persons, parties thereto of the third part, their heirs and assigns for ever, the said bridge and all the materials wherewith the same was erected and built, and all tolls, revenues, profits and incomes of or belonging to the said bridge so built, from the town of Fulham to the town of Putney, or the ferries thereafter to be set up and erected as occasion might be, according to the provisions in that behalf made by the said said recited acts, or either of them, or which should in anywise arise and accrue or belong to the same, with all such ground and soil adjacent and belonging to the then late or then present horse-ferries and passage over the said river between Fulham and Putney as had been, was or should be vested in the said commissioners, and all benefits, advantages, powers, privileges and authorities, and every other matter or thing whatsoever vested in or granted to the said commissioners which they were empowered or capable to assign and convey over, by virtue of the said acts, or either of them, to hold the same unto and to the use of the said trustees, parties hereto of the third part, their heirs and assigns for ever, upon trust to permit and suffer the said thirty persons therein named of the second part, their heirs and assigns, to receive and take the said tolls, revenues, profits and income, and to have the sole management and direction thereof, upon condition that they should thereout pay certain sums of money and expenses specified in the said deed, which condition has been performed; and after payment of such sums of money, should every year thereafter divide all the then rest and residue of the monies to be raised by the said tolls, revenues, profits and income of the said bridge, ferries and other the premises (if any) unto and amongst the said thirty subscribers and proprietors for the time being and their respective heirs and assigns, rateably and proportionably, according to the several sums of money by them subscribed for the purposes aforesaid, and to their several and respective rights, shares and interests of, in and to the same, to have, take and enjoy the same as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants. And by the said deed it was provided that in case the tolls, revenues, profits and incomes of the said bridge or ferries should at any time or times thereafter fall short, and not be sufficient to answer and make good all such sums of money as should be requisite for putting and keeping the said bridge, together with all ways and passages to and from the same, in good repair within a reasonable time to be allowed for making such repairs, or should not be sufficient for the payment of all the matters and things thereinbefore particularly mentioned, and the charges of the trustees in the execution of the trusts, then all such sums of money as should so fall short or be wanting for the said purposes should from time to time be paid and borne by the said thirty subscribers, the parties thereto of the second part, their heirs and assigns, rateably and proportionably, and according to the several sums of money subscribed by them respectively towards the purposes aforesaid, and to their several rights, shares and interests therein.

On the 16th of June 1730, by grant of that date, the Archbishop of Canterbury granted to the proprietors of Putney Bridge 200 superficial feet of land, part of the churchyard of Putney, for the purpose of making the passage to and from the said bridge more commodious, and the same was used for that purpose, and now forms part of the approach to the bridge. There is no other land in the county of Surrey vested in, belonging to, or claimed by the said proprietors, except what is comprised in the before-stated deed of the 11th of November 1729, and the last-mentioned grant, and no evidence was adduced before the Revising Barrister as to the annual value of the said land.

On the 26th of August 1736, by deed of that date, the persons then equitably entitled to the tolls, revenues, profits and income of the bridge under the indenture of the 11th of November 1729, covenanted with each other that certain orders and directions given for the arrangement of the affairs of the bridge should stand good until altered at some quarterly general meeting of persons from time to time becoming so equitably entitled by a majority of such persons present at such meeting.

The interest of the present shareholders in the bridge is identical with the interest vested in the said thirty persons or proprietors under the said deed of the 11th of November 1729, and under the grant of the 16th of June 1730, and has always been conveyed and transmitted as and dealt with as freehold estate, and the shareholders in the said bridge are about eighty in number. The proprietors meet once a-year, and select a committee of six out of their own body to manage the affairs.

The said persons objected to are respectively the holders of a share of such interest as aforesaid, and the sufficiency of the annual money value of such share or part of a share is not now in dispute. The bridge is built partly on piles driven into the bed of the river, and at either end upon brick foundations, which stand respectively upon that part of the banks between high and low water-mark whence formerly the ferries used to ply from side to side, and in part upon land which formerly was ground and soil adjacent and belonging to the said ferries.

There are toll-houses at each end of the bridge at which tolls are collected, and each of them is a structure of brick, and stands upon the brick foundations of the bridge referred to in the preceding paragraph thereof.

For the said persons objected to it was contended that they had respectively, under or by virtue of the said acts of parliament and deeds of the 11th of November 1729 and the 16th of June 1730, hereinbefore stated, such equitable freehold estates in the said bridge-tolls and other property comprised in the said acts and deeds as entitled them respectively to be on the list of voters for the said eastern division of the said county; and for the said David Nicholls, the objector, it was contended that they had not respectively such equitable freehold estates as would entitle them to vote for the said division of the said county; and also that the shareholders were a company; and that the individual shareholders being only entitled to a share of the receipts and profits were not entitled to be on the said list of voters.

The Revising Barrister decided that the said several persons objected to had not respectively such equitable freehold estates as entitled them respectively to be on the said list of voters, and he accordingly expunged their names from the said list.

Karslake (Beresford with him), for the appellants.—An estate and interest in the land belonging to the ancient ferries and on which the bridge was built, vested in the Commissioners, who afterwards conveyed all they had in 1729 to trustees for the shareholders of Putney Bridge. It is submitted that the Commissioners had by virtue of the acts power to so transfer their interest in the property to those trustees. The trustees have now no duty to perform, and therefore the case differs from that of Bennett v. Blain (1), and the shareholders here not only have more than a mere interest in the tolls and profits of the bridge, but they take such an equitable estate in the land as to entitle them to be registered. It appears from Rogers on Elections, 9th ed. p. 23, that shares in this very bridge have been held by an election committee to give a good vote for Middlesex. This resembles the case of Baxter v. Brown (2), where freehold land which was bought, and a mill and machinery erected thereon, out of money subscribed by certain persons who were partners, was conveyed to trustees in trust for the partners as part of their partnership stock-in-trade; and it was held, that each partner had an interest in the realty corresponding with the amount of shares held by him in the partnership, and was entitled to be on the list of voters for the county.

Raymond, for the respondent.—In the first place, it is submitted that no interest in the land passed to the Commissioners. The legislature did not intend to convey to them anything more than was necessary to enable them to carry out the object of building a bridge across the river. The ownership in the bed of the river would prima facie be in the Crown, and section 17. of the 12 Geo. 1. c. xxxvi. shews that it was not intended to convey any part of such ownership to the Commissioners, for if it were, that section would not have been necessary. The case of Badger v. the South Yorkshire Railway and River Don Navigation Company (3) is an authority for the Court so construing the act as to enable the Commissioners to acquire only an easement and not an estate in the soil, and the cases of Wood v. Hewitt (4) and Lancaster v. Eve (5) shew that the piles on which the bridge rests, though let into the soil of the river, might still have remained the property of the Commissioners. In the next place, even if an interest in the land was vested in the Commissioners, it was not conveyed to the shareholders. The act created an interest and duty in the Commissioners for the benefit of the public, and they had no power to convey the land to the shareholders. Next, these are shareholders of a company and have only a right to a share of the profits, and have no such interest in the land as will entitle them to the franchise. Bennett v. Blain (1) is in point; so is Bligh v. Brent (6).

Karslake replied.

ERLE, C.J. now delivered the following judgment.—This was a claim on behalf of the shareholders of Putney Bridge, and the question was, whether they had an equitable freehold interest. The statutes conveyed the bridge and land to the Commissioners, and the Commissioners in 1729 conveyed the bridge and land vested in them to trustees on behalf of the shareholders; and if the Commissioners had power to part with that property, I have no doubt the shareholders have become entitled to the bridge and to the land which belongs to the bridge. But I take it to be perfectly clear law, that where land is vested in Commissioners by an act of parliament for public purposes the Commissioners have not, unless there be something in the statute to that effect, any power to convey away and part with such land. The statutes have not given them, I think, any such power. The second of the statutes appears to me to confirm that view, because it enables specifically the Commissioners to convey the tolls to the shareholders; and if the statute intended to enable them to convey the fee simple of the land to the shareholders, it seems to me there would have been an expression used enabling them to convey the tolls as distinguished from the fee simple of the land, but that statute appears to me to be a negation of that right. I think, therefore, the Commissioners have no power to convey the freehold to the shareholders, or to the trustees in trust for the shareholders. Then, they purported to convey it by a deed of conveyance in 1729. But if the law prohibited such conveyance, the shareholders taking it with the knowledge of the title under that act of parliament acquired nothing more than lawfully could be conveyed, and the Commissioners parted with nothing more than could be lawfully parted with. The result is, I think, that the Commissioners have a right over the land, and the shareholders are entitled only to the tolls, and have therefore no qualification. That is all that we affirm.

Decision affirmed.

Parliament—Borough Vote—Qualification—Occupation for Twelve Months—Full Age—2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 27.—6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. s. 40.

If a claimant for a borough vote has occupied the premises for which he claims for twelve months previous to the last day of July in the year in which he claims, and is of full age previous to the day of registration, it is sufficient, though he was not of full age during the whole year of occupation.

Appeal from the decision of the Revising Barrister of the borough of Kidderminster.

Frederick Bradley duly claimed to have his name inserted in the list of persons entitled to vote in the election of a member for the borough of Kidderminster, in respect of the joint occupation of a foundry and premises at Clensmore, in the parish of Kidderminster Borough.

Richard Powell duly objected to the name of the said F. Bradley being inserted in such list of voters.

The said foundry and premises were in the joint occupation of F. Bradley and his brother Samuel Bradley for twelve calendar months next previous to the last day of July in the present year. At the said foundry the trade or business of iron-founders was carried on under the firm of John Bradley & Co.

It was objected, on behalf of the said R. Powell, that the said F. Bradley's name ought not to be inserted in the list of voters for the parish of Kidderminster Borough, insomuch, first, that as the said F. Bradley was only twenty-one years of age in March in the present year, he could not have occupied, as owner or tenant, the said foundry and premises for twelve calendar months previous to the last day of July in the present year. Secondly, that the said F. Bradley was not of full age during the whole of the twelve calendar months previously to the last day of July in the present year.

The Revising Barrister held, that the said F. Bradley having attained the age of twenty-one years in March last did not preclude him from occupying the said foundry and premises for twelve calendar months previous to the last day of July in the present year. He also held, that the minority of the said F. Bradley during a portion of the twelve calendar months previous to the last day of July in the present year did not of itself constitute a disqualification to his name being retained on the list of voters, and, therefore, retained his name on the list of voters.

Keane, for the appellant.—The first objection is abandoned. As to the second, the 7 & 8 Will. 3. c. 25. prohibited a minor from voting for a member of parliament. The 27th section of the Reform Act, 2 Will. 4. c. 45, enacts, that every male person of full age who shall occupy a house of the value of 10*l.* per annum, if duly registered, shall be entitled to vote, provided that no such person (that is, such person of full age) shall be so registered, unless he shall have occupied the said premises for twelve calendar months previous to the last day of July in such year. This claimant having only attained the age of twenty-one in the previous March, had not, under the necessary condition, occupied for twelve calendar months, and, therefore, could not have complied with the requisites of the statute.

Karslake (Bourke with him), contra.—The result of the argument on the other side, if it prevailed, would have the effect to strike off the name of every man who was not of age twelve months previous to the last day of July; in fact, to prevent a man voting until he had attained the age of twenty-two years, and thereby extend the period of non-age until that age. That would be a monstrous hardship.

Keane replied.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the decision of the revising barrister was correct. The 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 27. enacts, that every male person of full age who shall occupy within a borough any house, warehouse, &c. or other building of the clear yearly value of not less than 10*l.* shall, if registered, be entitled to vote, provided that such person shall have occupied such premises for twelve calendar months next previous to the last day of July in such year. The claimant, therefore, under that statute, in order to be entitled to vote, must be of full age when he comes to vote. And the statute to which I shall hereafter refer says, he must be of full age when he comes to be registered. The meaning of the section of the act of Will. 4. seems to me to be that a person who shall have occupied for twelve months is entitled to vote, and that it does not mean that the person must have been of full age for the whole period of twelve months, but only that he shall have no legal incapacity when he claims to vote. I think that section ought to be construed in connexion with the 40th section of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, which enacts, that the revising barrister "shall expunge the name of every person whose qualification, as stated in any list, shall be insufficient in law to entitle such person to vote." It further provides, in cases of persons objected to, that the barrister shall "require it to be proved that the person so objected to was entitled on the last day of July then next preceeding to have his name inserted in the list of voters in respect of the qualification described in such list." It seems to me that section shews that the question for the barrister to decide is, whether the claimant is a person really qualified to vote by sufficient age and occupation. The decisions of the revising barrister's court were substituted for those of the polling-booths, and the clauses I have read from the 40th section of the Registration Act seem to suppose that the revising barrister is to imagine to himself that a parliamentary election is taking place; that a party comes and claims to vote; that the barrister then asks him, "Are you of full age?" If the answer is in the negative, he is to expunge his name. If in the affirmative, he is to inquire into his qualification as to occupation of the premises; if that is insufficient he is still to expunge his name. It, therefore, shews that no man is to be put upon the register unless he is qualified to vote in the election then supposed to be taking place.

If the contention is to prevail that a man's qualification as to occupation is not to commence until he is twenty-one years of age, it would be the means of preventing many men from voting until they were twenty-two, which would be straining the statute; as our law always considers a man to be entitled to all the rights of citizenship when he has attained the age of twenty-one years.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The 7 & 8 Will. 3. c. 25. s. 8. enacts that no infants shall vote for a member of parliament; that they shall not be elected to serve in parliament; that if they are so elected their election is null and void; and it also imposes penalties upon them if they shall presume to sit, or vote in parliament.

Unless, therefore, we are obliged, we ought not to extend the incapacity beyond twenty-one years. Now, when a person claims to be put upon the register, we are obliged by the act of parliament to say he shall be of the age of twenty-one years at the time of making such claim. We should be straining the statute were we to say that he must be of full age one year before he claims to be registered. He must occupy for twelve months, and he may occupy having been of full age the whole, or part, or during no portion of that period. Mr. Keane's contention is, that he must occupy for twelve months, being for the whole of that period of the full age of twenty-one years; that would be followed in every instance by the monstrous consequence of continuing a man's minority until he was twenty-two years of age.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the 40th section of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. has removed the whole difficulty, as has been shewn by my Lord.

Decision affirmed.

Parliament—Borough Vote—Break of Residence—Imprisonment—2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 27.

G, who claimed to have his name retained upon the register of voters for the borough of K, had been imprisoned for six months in a gaol more than seven miles from the borough, for an assault, without the option of paying a fine. The six months expired on the 25th of August in the year for which he claimed to be entitled to be so registered:—Held, that as G. by his own criminal act had debarred himself of the power of residing within the borough, he had not the necessary qualification.

Appeal from the decision of the Revising Barrister for the borough of Kidderminster.

Richard Powell duly objected to the name of Thomas Guest, junior, being retained on the list of persons entitled to vote in the election of a member for the borough of Kidderminster, in respect of the occupation of a house in Stourbridge Street, in the parish of Kidderminster Borough, on the ground that the said Thomas Guest, junior, had not resided for six calendar months next previous to the last day of July in the present year within the said borough, or within seven miles thereof.

The qualification of the said T. Guest was duly proved in all other respects.

On the 27th of February in the present year the said T. Guest was convicted of an assault, and committed by the magistrates of the borough of Kidderminster to Worcester gaol for six months' imprisonment, without the option of payment of a fine. He duly served the said term of imprisonment, and returned to Kidderminster on the 25th of August in the present year.

Worcester gaol is situated more than seven miles from the borough of Kidderminster, or any part thereof. At the time of his conviction the said T. Guest, junior, resided at the above-mentioned house, and carried on there the business of a butcher and beerseller, and after his conviction, but before leaving Kidderminster, he made arrangements by which the said businesses were carried on, and the said house was occupied by his servant on his behalf during his absence, to whom he gave the key of the house, and paid 15s. per week to conduct the said businesses. His furniture remained undisturbed in the house during his imprisonment, and immediately on the termination thereof he returned to his said house, and has continued to reside there ever since.

The said T. Guest, junior, is a widower and has no family. It was contended on behalf of the said R. Powell that, under the circumstances stated, the said T. Guest, junior, had not resided for six calendar months next previous to the last day of July in the present year within the said parish of Kidderminster Borough, or within seven statute miles thereof, or of any part thereof.

The Revising Barrister held that, under the circumstances stated, the said T. Guest, junior, had resided for six calendar months previous to the said last day of July in the present year within the said parish of Kidderminster Borough, and therefore retained his name on the list of voters.

Keane, for the appellant.—The statute requires a residence for six months previous to the last day of July; the claimant was in prison during that time, and did not reside. Moreover, the prison was more than seven miles from the borough. He must be able to reside. The cases only go to this, that personal residence is not necessary—Whithorn v. Thomas (1). The residence must continue down to the time of polling—Ex parte Jones (2). Had the legislature intended that imprisonment should not break the term of residence it would have so stated, as was done in the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, s. 1.—The Queen v. Salford (3), The Queen v. Hartfield (4), The Queen v. Potterhanworth (5) and The Queen v. Halifax (6). If it was illegal for him to be in the borough, then the six months' residence was not complete; if it was legal, then a man escaping from prison might vote.

Karslake (Bourke with him), contra.—The respondent had no other residence than this; he could not be said to be residing in gaol: even if he could, imprisonment would not deprive him of his residence in Kidderminster. In Nias v. Davis (7), where a man, whose wife and family were in lodgings in London while he was in gaol at Presteign, was held to have sufficient residence in London to petition the Bankruptcy Court there. Absence on duty with the militia, which is a compulsory legal absence, has been held not to deprive a man of his right to vote—The King v. Mitchell (8). Unless it can be said that any compulsory residence out of the borough breaks the residence, then the argument on the other side falls to the ground; but the cases just cited shew it is not. The appellant must contend that any imprisonment, however short, is a break of the residence, and even if the imprisonment be on a false and groundless charge.

Keane, in reply.—In The King v. Mitchell (8) it was expressly found that the militiamen were in the habit of resorting to Norwich upon furlough and also to attend elections; therefore that case does not apply. The decisions under the Bankruptcy Acts are governed by the wish to have the bankrupt in the place where he carried on business and where his creditors are.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the decision of the revising barrister was wrong, and that the claimant did not acquire a right to vote. The statute, in respect of the qualification of a borough voter, requires that he should have resided in the borough for a certain period or within seven miles thereof. The voter in the present case was in prison for a misdemeanor for a great portion of the time that the statute required him to reside within the borough in order to qualify him to vote. I will assume that he had a house and family in the borough, and an animus revertendi as soon as his imprisonment was over; but during the time he was in prison he was not sui juris, and not at liberty to return in consequence of a criminal act of his own. It seems to me that the doctrine is correctly laid down in Elliot on Registration, 2nd edit. 204, where it is said, "That in order to constitute residence, a party must possess, at the least, a sleeping apartment, but that an interrupted abiding at such dwelling is not requisite. Absence, no matter how long, if there be the liberty of returning at any time, and no abandonment of the intention to return whenever it may suit the party's pleasure or convenience so to do, will not prevent a constructive legal residence. But if he has debarred himself of the liberty of returning to such dwelling, by letting it for a period, however short, or has abandoned his intention of returning, he cannot any longer be said to have even a legal residence there." In this case I think the claimant has debarred himself of the option of returning, because he has been guilty of a criminal act, for which offence he has been put into prison, and his power of returning has been taken from him. The Judges who have had to decide upon the meaning of the word "residence," as it occurs in different statutes, have put shifting meanings on that word according to the intention of the statute upon which they were deciding. As under the Bankruptcy Acts, where it was decided, in the case of Nias v. Davis (7), that a man who had a permanent lodging in London where his wife and family resided, but who at the time of petitioning the Bankruptcy Court in London was a prisoner for debt in the gaol of Presteign, had a sufficient residence in the London district to entitle him to present his petition there. I should say that that statute was passed alio intuitu than the statute now under discussion. I think also that a person in prison for a civil debt has not debarred himself from the power of returning to his home, because by paying his debts, or compounding with his creditors he would remove his disability. The case of the militiaman, The King v. Mitchell (8), is consistent with his returning to his residence from time to time. But a person who is imprisoned on a criminal charge stands in a different position, he having no power to return and reside until his term of imprisonment be completed. Residence being one of the requisites the statute requires a claimant to possess, if the power of residence be taken away, he is not entitled to have his claim allowed. If an imprisonment for six months would not take away a man's qualification, I do not see why two or any number of years should do so.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is not necessary or convenient to lay down any rule as to what would constitute a break of residence; but I think this is a fair conclusion to arrive at, viz., that a legal inability to reside caused by the voter's own act and not by misfortune would break the residence. This case is distinguishable from that of a man disabled to reside from illness, from that of the militiaman, or of imprisonment under a capias ad satisfaciendum, or imprisonment with an option of paying a fine, or under a trumpery charge which is not afterwards proved.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that a party who, by his own criminal act, debars himself of the power of residing does not reside constructively.

Decision reversed.

Parliament — Borough Vote — “Building” — Occupation as Tenant — 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 27.

A, a market-gardener, who claimed to vote for the borough of K, occupied as tenant land of the yearly value of 20l. within the borough. When he first took the land there was no building upon it, but he erected a wooden structure with boarded sides, and a thatched roof supported by wooden posts let into the ground; there was a door to the structure fastened by a padlock, and it was used for storing potatoes. The revising barrister found that this structure was a “building” within the meaning of the 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 27, and that A. occupied it as tenant, and was entitled to be registered as a voter: — Held, upon the principle laid down in Watson v. Cotton (1), that there was nothing in the description as given by the barrister to warrant the Court in disturbing his decision.

Quære—Whether a pig-sty is a “building” within the meaning of the Reform Act.

Appeal from the decision of the Revising Barrister for the borough of Kidderminster.

Richard Powell duly objected to the name of William Farmer being retained on the list of persons entitled to vote in the election of a member for the borough of Kidderminster, in respect of property occupied within the parish of Kidderminster Borough.

The said William Farmer is a market-gardener, and had rented and occupied under the same landlord five acres of land in the parish of Kidderminster Borough for more than twelve calendar months previous to the last day of July 1864, of the clear yearly value of 20l.

There was no building on the land when the said W. Farmer first took the same of his landlord, but previously to the 31st of July 1863 the said W. Farmer had erected on the land, at his own expense, a wooden structure with boarded sides and a thatched roof, and supported by wooden posts let into the ground. The entrance to this structure was by a door fastened by a padlock, and it was used by the said W. Farmer for storing potatoes, and other things connected with his business. The said W. Farmer had erected in like manner on the said land a pig-sty, with a slated roof, but in other respects it was similar to the structure before mentioned.

The flooring of the pig-sty was made of cinders laid on the ground to keep it dry.

It was objected, on behalf of the said Richard Powell, that the said W. Farmer's name ought to be expunged from the said list, on the following grounds: first, that the structures erected by the said W. Farmer were not, nor was either of them, a building within the meaning of the Reform Act; secondly, that inasmuch as the structures had been erected by the tenant they formed no part of the property for which he paid rent, and could not be said to be occupied by him with the land as tenant under the same landlord.

The Revising Barrister held that the said structures were buildings within the meaning of the act, and that they were affixed to the freehold, and decided to retain the name of the said W. Farmer on the said list.

Keane, for the appellant (2).—The claimant is not tenant of a building. Nor is the building, as described by the Revising Barrister, such a building as was contemplated by the 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 27.

[BYLES, J.—Watson v. Cotton (1) decided, that when the Revising Barrister found that an erection was a "building," his decision must stand, unless the Court is satisfied that the thing described cannot be a building.]

According to that case a market-gardener might put a cucumber-frame in his garden, fill it with spades and hoes, and call it a building. The legislature never intended that a structure of this kind should confer a vote; it cannot be said to be of the nature of a house, shop or warehouse, nor was it of a permanent character. The tenant could remove it at his pleasure; it was a mere chattel—The King v. Londonthorpe (3).

[KEATING, J.—The barrister finds that it was affixed to the freehold.]

(2) This and the following case of Powell v. Boraston were argued together.

(3) 6 Term Rep. 377.

But he has also told us how it was affixed, and it is submitted that is insufficient—Hellawell v. Eastwood (4), Elwes v. Mawe (5).

Karslake (Bourke with him), contra—When the Revising Barrister has specially found that the structure is a "building," the Court will not go into the question. In Watson v. Cotton (1), Maule, J. said, that "the barrister was right in holding that the structure was a building. The building was affixed to the soil, and became the property of the landlord; the tenant could not remove it." In The King v. Londonthorpe (3) the tenant had permission from his landlord to remove the windmill at the end of his term. That is not the case here. The words of the statute are "house, warehouse, counting-house, shop or other building." Not being in trade he did not require a shop or counting-house, and it comes under the last definition, "other building."

[ERLE, C.J.—That must mean a building ejusdem generis with those previously mentioned.]

It is ejusdem generis, because the claimant uses it in his trade as a market-gardener—Henrette v. Booth (6), Dewhurst v. Fielden (7).

Keane, in reply.—This building is movable, and therefore is a tenant's fixture; he is not tenant of this; he has put it on the land of which he is the tenant, and can remove it at the expiration of his tenancy—Martin v. Roe (8), and cases there collected—Wansborough v. Maton (9), The King v. Otley (10).

Cur. adv. vult.

ERLE, C.J. delivered the judgment of the Court (Jan. 7) (11).—Upon this appeal two questions are raised: first, whether the shed described in the case was a building within the statute; that is, whether it had sufficient permanence, and was ejusdem generis with the buildings specified in the statute, that is, "house, warehouse, shop, counting-house"! The revising barrister found it to be such a building; and according to the principle laid down in Watson v. Cotton (1), we do not see sufficient in the description he has given to authorize us to reverse his decision. It is constructed of planks nailed to posts let into the ground, and used for storing potatoes, that being an article in the way of the claimant's trade as a market-gardener.

The second question is, whether this shed was occupied by the claimant in the capacity of tenant. As to this, the facts are, that at the time of the demise there was no shed on the premises, but the claimant placed it there during his term, and used it as above mentioned. The revising barrister found that it was so occupied, and we do not see sufficient in his statement to authorize us to reverse his decision. If the shed had become the property of the landlord, it was occupied by the claimant in his capacity of tenant, although he constructed the shed and placed it there during the term, and the general rule is quidquid plantatur solo, solo cedit. It may be that the shed continued the property of the tenant, and was subject to be removed by him at any time during the term; his right to do so might depend on his contract with his landlord, or on the nature of the construction being such as would make it removable as a trade fixture; but whatever may be the right of the tenant, if further facts were added, upon the statement made we act on the general presumption that things affixed to the freehold pass to the landlord, and affirm the decision.

The revising barrister has raised a further question, whether a pig-sty is a building ejusdem generis with house, warehouse, shop and counting-house. It is not necessary to answer this question, which is only raised in case the shed was found insufficient; but we would add, that we are by no means prepared to assent to the revising barrister's opinion on this point without further discussion.

We would further add, that the revising barrister has, in our judgment, done good service in sending this and the following case to us for our decision, and giving us the opportunity of explaining what we considered to be the true meaning of the Court in Watson v. Cotton (1), and thereby putting some limitation upon the wide inferences drawn therefrom, contrary in some degree to the intention both of the legislature, expressed in the statute, and of the Judges expounding the same.

Decision affirmed.

1864.	}	POWELL, appellant, v. BORASTON, respondent.
Nov. 22.
1865.
Jan. 17.

Parliament—Borough Vote—"Building"—Occupation as Tenant—2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 27.

The claimant for a vote in the borough of K. occupied, as tenant, land of the yearly value of more than 10l. within the borough. When he first took the land there was no building upon it. In 1862 an electioneering agent, having no interest of any sort in the land, caused to be erected a shed made of boards nailed to posts, and the claimant had used the shed, by keeping therein some of his agricultural implements. There was no evidence that the landlord had any knowledge of the shed having been placed on the land:—Held, first, that though, as a fact, the Revising Barrister had found otherwise, this shed was not a "building" within the meaning of the 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 27, not being used either for residentiary or for commercial purposes. And, secondly, that the claimant did not occupy it in the capacity of tenant; for there was nothing to shew that it had become parcel of the freehold so as to vest in the landlord subject to the interest of the tenant during the term.

Appeal against the decision of the Revising Barrister for the borough of Kidderminster.

Richard Powell duly objected to the name of John George Boraston being retained on the list of persons entitled to vote in the election of a member for the borough of Kidderminster, in respect of property in the parish of Kidderminster Foreign.

L

The said J. G. Boraston is a farmer, and for several years has rented and occupied a farm at Sutton Common, within the said parish of Kidderminster Foreign, but being partly within and partly beyond the limits of the parliamentary borough of Kidderminster.

The greater portion of the farm, including the farm buildings, is beyond the borough limits; but a few acres of land, of more than the clear yearly value of 10*l.*, lie within the borough.

There was no building on the land within the borough when the said J. G. Boraston took the farm of his landlord; but in the summer of 1863 a shed was placed upon the piece of land within the borough.

The said shed was made entirely of wood, having four boarded sides and a boarded roof, and being supported by four posts, let into the ground three feet. It adjoins a public road, and most of the side boards of the shed facing the road have been broken to pieces.

There is no floor to the shed. It is entered by a door, and used by the tenant for keeping agricultural implements in.

It was proved that the shed was erected by a builder of Kidderminster, in accordance with instructions received by him from an active political agent in that borough, who had no interest, either as landlord or tenant, in the land upon which it was erected; but previously to its erection, the permission of the said J. G. Boraston was asked, who replied that he could not give an answer: his landlord must be asked. There was no evidence of the landlord having given such permission; but the said J. G. Boraston gave instructions to the builder as to the size of the door of the shed, and told him that if he required it floored he would do it himself.

It was objected, on behalf of the said Richard Powell, that the name of the said J. G. Boraston ought to be expunged from the said list, on the following grounds: first, that the shed erected as aforesaid was not a building within the meaning of the Reform Act; secondly, that, under the circumstances stated respecting its erection, there was no occupation of the shed by the said J. G. Boraston within the meaning of the Reform Act; thirdly, that the shed formed no part of the property for which the said J. G. Boraston paid rent, and could not be said to be occupied by him with the land as tenant under the same landlord.

The Revising Barrister held the contrary of these objections, and decided to retain the name of the said J. G. Boraston on the said list.

Keane, for the appellant.

Karslake (Bourke with him), for the respondent (1).

Cur. adv. vult.

ERLE, C.J. now (Jan. 17) delivered the judgment of the Court (2).—The respondent occupied a farm, of which a few acres, worth more than 10*l.* annually, were within the borough, and on this part of the farm there was no building at the time of the demise, nor for years after. In 1862 an electioneering agent, having no interest of any sort in the land, caused a shed made of boards nailed to posts to be erected, and therein the respondent had kept some agricultural implements. There was no evidence that the landlord had any knowledge of what was done. The revising barrister decided that this shed was a building within the statute, and that it was occupied by the respondent as tenant. His decision is the subject of this appeal; and we are of opinion that it should be reversed on both points.

The legislature has not defined with clearness the qualification for a vote in a borough. In a county all that is comprised under the term "land" is the principal source of qualification; but in a borough land alone does not qualify; it can only be used as an accessory to a building for the sole purpose of making up the value of 10*l.* The intention of the legislature respecting a qualification for a borough was much considered in Cooke v. Humber (3). It is there laid down "that a qualification is compounded of four elements—tenement, value, occupation and estate. There must be for tenement, a house, warehouse, counting-house, shop, or other building analogous thereto; there must be for annual value, 10*l.*; there must be occupation, that is, actual exercise of the rights of an owner in possession during the requisite time; there must be an estate in the tenement either of fee or less. If these four distinct elements are combined in the claimant, he is qualified; if otherwise, he is not. Now, although they must exist in combination, in order to qualify, still, in inquiring into the existence of the combination, each element must be separately ascertained. First, is the claimant tenant? Secondly, is he occupier? Thirdly, is the tenement sufficient in value? And, fourthly, in kind?" Again, in pp. 44 and 45 (4) it is said, "The statute required some permanent occupation of, and some independent interest in the property. The permanence prevents the sudden creation of votes; the ownership or the tenancy, with rating, indicates some independence; in other words, the requirement of, at least, a tenancy excludes some occupations of less independence, such as the occupation of servants for their service; for example, porter of the lodge, gardeners dwelling in the garden; and also such as that of the surgeon for the hospital of rooms therein—Dobson v. Jones (5); also the occupation of premises by objects of charity, occupying under the permission of the trustees of the charity—Davis v. Waddington (6)." And again, "As to the kind of tenement which qualifies, the statute has described two classes of buildings, namely, those used for residential, and those used for commercial purposes—house for residence; warehouse, counting-house, shop or other analogous building for commerce" (7).

To apply these principles to the present case, we think that the so-called building is not of the class specified in the statute; that is, it is neither in the residuary class, nor in the class connected with commercial industry. We also think that the claimant's occupation thereof was not in the capacity of tenant.

As to the first question, whether the so-called building is sufficient to qualify: We are aware of the impossibility of defining clearly what is included in the class described in the statute by the words "other building," and of the difficulty of affirming that a thing is not in a class when the boundary of a class is unknown. We are also aware of the immense variety of structures which are sufficient buildings, considering the locality, and the use for which they are adapted in that locality. Still we are of opinion that the intention of the legislature would be defeated, and the words indicating the class of buildings which qualify would be without any effect, if anything which could be called a building was held sufficient. It ought to be in some degree adapted both to be used by man, either for residence or for the industry to which the statute relates, and also to have the degree of durability which is included in the idea of a building. The shed in question fulfils neither of these conditions. The boards were nailed to the posts for the purpose of performing the part of a shed to the revising barrister, not for any purpose connected with the interest of the occupier, and the structure was so frail as to have been destroyed in part before the required year had elapsed. The legislature intended that buildings should give the primary qualification, and that land should be a secondary resort if the building was not worth 10*l.* per annum. But land would become the primary qualification if a shed of no value added to land of the required value was held to qualify.

We are aware that the question, whether a building qualifies, is more a question of fact than law, to be answered by the revising barrister, performing the part of a jury, in applying the law to the facts before him. We are also aware of the soundness of the principle laid down in Watson v. Cotton (8), that if the revising barrister finds the building in question to be within the statute, the Court will make every presumption for the purpose of supporting his finding, and will not reverse it unless the case shews it to be erroneous. We adopt these principles as sound. Still we think that this decision here is shewn to be erroneous. The case of Watson v. Cotton (7) has been treated by some text-writers as if it had been decided that a tarpaulin supported by poles, as described in the case, was a building within the statute; and they have drawn wide inferences therefrom, and these inferences are carried to the furthest extent in Lutwyche's Reports, 58. The learned reporter, in a note there, speaking of this case, thus expresses himself: "It will not be easy in future to say what is not a building, however slight and unsubstantial the structure may be, provided there be a roof to it;" and he goes on to say, that "if a building be capable of holding any articles, it may fairly be considered to be a warehouse." And he goes on further to say, "that, on these principles, there is no reason why a donkey-shed, a fowl-house, or a pig-sty should not qualify." The report of this case in 5 Com. B. Rep. 51, does not warrant the inference thus drawn from it. It appears there that, the Judges, resolving to support the finding of the barrister unless he states facts shewing that he must have been in error, take his description to be incomplete, and assume that the description, if it had been complete, would have shewn that the shed was a building, in the ordinary sense of the word, and was properly included in the same class as warehouse. In page 52, Maule, J. says: "The barrister gives a description embracing some of the incidents of a building; he describes two sides of the structure: the rest may be of solid masonry. He does not profess to give a full description of it." Wilde, C.J. says: "It is possible to conceive sheds of a very substantial and valuable character; for instance, the sheds in the docks which for the most part consist of columns of iron or stone supporting slated roofs." There, in his judgment, Wilde, C.J. says, "The barrister having found it to be a building within the act, we must assume that it has all the requisites of a building, except the incidents he sets out." And Maule, J. says, "It is not denied that the shed is a building; when once it is established that the thing is a building, the only question which remains is to be decided by the purposes to which the building is, or may be put: if it is or may be applied to the purposes of a building such as is mentioned in the act, it may be said to be a building within the meaning of the act; its being more or less substantial cannot affect the question. Nobody would for a moment doubt that a place constructed at great expense and of great solidity, closed on two sides, and used for the stowage of goods, would be a building within the act. Assume this to be a building, and in what does that differ from this?" It thus appears to us that the Judges do not hold that the shed, as described, is a building within the act, but they declare it to be their duty to assume any possible facts not excluded by the case for the purpose of affirming the barrister's finding. The barrister finds it to be a building: that finding is to stand, unless the case excludes the possibility of its being a building, and the Judges say that, consistently with the case, the shed may have been on two sides of solid masonry, and may have been of a very substantial and valuable character, and may have been used for the stowage of goods. We may remark, that it would have been better if the case had been sent back for re-statement, as Mr. Gray requested.

The argument of that learned counsel, on behalf of the appellant, seems to have been considered by the Court as perfectly sound in law; but it did not prevail, because the facts were assumed to exist which made it irrelevant. Mr. Gray contended that the building must be something substantial, something ejusdem generis with those specifically mentioned, and not a mere temporary erection for the more convenient use of the land that could be removed by the tenant, and none of the Judges disputed the correctness of this view of the law. In deciding whether a building is within the act, the revising barrister is bound to give effect to the intention of the legislature expressed in the statute, and in so doing to be assisted by any rule of construction laid down in any of the cases relating thereto: but his attention should never be turned from the statute which he has to apply; and though general principles of construction laid down by the Judges may help to guide his decision, the specific facts of one case form a very fallacious guide in the decision on other specific facts supposed to resemble them—the specific facts of the tarpaulin on poles seem to have led to unsound conclusions. In the present case we consider that the description of the shed is complete, and according to that description it was not of a substantial character, nor ejusdem generis with the buildings specifically mentioned; that is, it was neither adapted to, nor intended for any purpose analogous to the purposes for which warehouses are used, and that, therefore, the decision holding the shed to be a building within the act must be reversed.

Secondly, if the shed is taken to be a building within the statute, then the question is raised whether it was occupied by the respondent in his capacity of tenant, and the answer is in the negative. It is clear that the shed formed no part of the premises demised at the time of the demise, and although it might become parcel of the freehold by being annexed thereto under certain conditions, and so become parcel of the demised premises during the currency of the term, the case does not shew that it was made under such conditions as would vest the property in the landlord, subject to the interest of the tenant during the term. It is an incumbrance brought on the land by the licence of the tenant, and for aught that appears subject to be removed at the will of the incumbrancer, or on the revocation of the licence by the tenant. The building, not the land, is the substance of the qualification; the respondent cannot hold the shed as tenant unless the landlord has the property in it as reversioner. But the landlord is not shewn to have assented to its being brought, neither is there any ground for affirming that he could object to its removal, nor does it appear that either landlord or tenant has the property in the boards, if the maker of the shed carried it away.

Decision reversed.

1865. } FLATCHER, appellant, v.
Jan. 13, 14. } BOODLE, respondent.

Parliament—Borough Vote—Payment of Poor-rate—Payment of Proportionate Part by Incoming Tenant—17 Geo. 2. c. 38. s. 12.—2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 27.

A person is not disqualified by 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 27. from being on a borough register of voters because he has not paid some arrear of a poor-rate in respect of which he was not rated and which had never been demanded of him, but which had been made on the qualifying premises prior to his occupation, and which the 17 Geo. 2. c. 38. s. 12. makes the incoming tenant liable to pay in proportion to the time he occupied—So held by Erle, C.J., Willes, J. and Keating, J. (Williams, J. dissentiente).

This was a consolidated appeal from the Revising Barrister of the borough of Cheltenham.

John Flatcher duly objected to the name of James Bewington being retained on the list of voters for the borough of Cheltenham, on the ground that a portion of the poor-rate for the qualifying year had not been paid. It was proved before the Revising Barrister that the poor-rates of the parish in which the qualifying premises are situated are made half-yearly, and that one was made in April 1863, which extended to the following September, when another was made which extended to March 1864, in which month a new rate was made, which is the existing rate.

The voter went into occupation of the qualifying premises prior to the 1st of August 1863, but paid no portion of the rate then in existence, which was not demanded of him, neither was his name inserted in that rate.

It was contended against the vote that, inasmuch as 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 27. requires the payment of all rates payable from the voter, he should have gone to the overseers and paid his proportion of the April 1863 rate, to which he was rendered liable by 17 Geo. 2. c. 38. s. 12, and if any dispute had arisen as to the amount, they could have had it settled by the Justices in the manner provided by that section, and the voter having failed to adopt this course, he was disqualified, for the omission was not remedied by any provision of the Registration Act, as 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. s. 75. only applies to a misnomer or inaccurate or insufficient description.

It appeared to the Revising Barrister that, as the act of the 17 Geo. 2. c. 31. does not say that the incoming tenant shall pay, but only that he shall be liable to pay, and as the proportion which he is so liable to pay must before he can pay it be first ascertained, either by agreement between the parties, or in case of dispute, by the decision of two or more Justices of the peace, and as by the 6 Vict. c. 18. s. 75. a person in other respects qualified shall be considered as having paid all rates when he shall have bonâ fide paid all sums of money which he shall have been called upon to pay as rates, therefore an unascertained proportion which the voter had never been called upon to pay was not such a rate as had become payable from him in respect of the qualifying premises within the meaning of 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 27. The Revising Barrister, therefore, overruled the objection, and retained the name.

Dowdenwell, for the appellant. — The question is, whether the voter is disqualified by reason of the 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 27, which provides that no person shall be registered unless he shall have paid all the poor-rates which shall have become payable from him in respect of the qualifying premises previously to the 6th of April. This section is explained by the 6 Vict. c. 18. s. 75, which provides, that no person shall be registered unless he shall have paid "all the poor-rates which shall have become payable from him in respect of the qualifying premises previously to the 6th day of April." It is clear that this was a rate which had become payable by the voter. The 17 Geo. 2. c. 38. s. 12, provides that "where any person or persons shall come into or occupy any house, &c. out of or from which any other person assessed shall be removed, or which at the time of making such rate was empty or unoccupied, that then every person so removing from and every person so coming into, or occupying the same, shall be liable to pay such rate in proportion to the time that such person occupied the same respectively, in the same manner and under the like penalty of distress as if such person so removing had not removed." The cases clearly shew that the voter must either have actually paid or tendered the rate—Bishop v. Smedley (1), Ford v. Smedley (2) and Moss v. Lichfield (3).

Campbell Foster, for the respondent. — The statute 17 Geo. 2. c. 38. s. 12. states only that the person so coming into or occupying the premises from which the person assessed has removed, "shall be liable to pay to such rate in proportion to the time that such person occupied the same respectively," and the proportion in case of dispute is to be ascertained by two or more Justices. That is only a liability on the contingency of his being called on to pay it. There may be nothing to pay at all; for the outgoing tenant may have paid the whole of the rate. It is not like a rate absolutely payable by him, and which section 27. of the Reform Act requires him to pay as a condition to his being qualified for the franchise. How is the incoming tenant to know what, if anything, he is to pay when no demand has been made on him? Payment of the rate need not be made by the party himself, it may be made by the landlord—Cook v. Luckett (4). That case shews that rating a person to a rate which is duly published, is a sufficient calling on such person to pay, and that it will do, though a party was rated in respect of a house, No. 3, which he occupied, and the house was inadvertently described as No. 4. But a claim must be made for each rate—Wansey v. Perkins (5). The case of Bishop v. Smedley (1), relied on by the appellant, turned on the 30th section of the 2 Will. 4. c. 45. That section requires as a condition on the part of the occupier claiming to be rated with a view to the franchise, that he should actually pay or tender "the full amount of the rate or rates, if any, then due in respect of such premises." There are no such words in the 27th section; what he is there required to do is to pay all the poor-rates "which shall have become payable from him in respect of such premises." The statute, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 90, as to the time at which the rates and taxes must be paid to entitle parties to be on the list of voters, is as much in favour of the respondent's argument as that of the appellant; and the case of Ford v. Smedley (2), cited on the part of the appellant, was as to the non-payment of the assessed taxes which are fixed and certain in their times of payment, and very different from the poor-rates. The case of Rogers v. Lewis (6) is, as to the construction of section 28. of the 2 Will. 4. c. 45, which relates to tenants under successive holdings, and that shews that it is sufficient if such tenant has paid the rate payable by him. The section 75. of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. recites and explains the 27th section of the 2 Will. 4. c. 45, and that 75th section enacts, that where the person who is occupying the qualifying premises has "bond fide paid on or before the 20th of July in such year all sums of money which he shall have been called upon to pay as rates, in respect of such premises for one year previously to the 6th of April then next preceding, such person shall be considered as having been rated and paid all rates in respect of such premises within the meaning of the recited act and be enabled to be registered." The respondent relies on that section, and it is submitted that he paid all the rates he was called upon to pay, and is entitled to his qualification. Moreover, it is an inaccuracy in the rate which is cured by the statute.

Dowdeswell, in reply.

ERLE, C.J.—In this case the question for the consideration of the Court is, whether the claimant is disqualified from voting by reason of the non-payment of rates which have become payable from him in respect of the qualifying premises. The revising barrister has held the claimant to be qualified. The facts are, that the claimant came into possession before August 1863, and that the custom in the parish was to make rates half-yearly. The claimant has paid all the rates during the time of his occupation of the premises, but some portion of the rate, from April to September 1863, was left unpaid; and it is contended that that portion had become payable from him within 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 27. by virtue of 17 Geo. 2. c. 38. s. 12. It appears that some arrear of that rate had been left unpaid by the outgoing tenant, but what was the amount of arrear has not been fixed, but I assume that something was left unpaid, but, until the sitting of the revising barrister, the claimant believed that everything due from him had been paid. Mr. Dowdeswell contends that there was a liability to pay under the statute 17 Geo. 2. c. 38. s. 12. and that the rate was "payable from" the claimant by virtue of that statute; but I take the words of the 12th section of that statute to mean that the incoming tenant is subject to be made liable to pay a proportion of the rate, and not that he is primarily liable. It is a liability which the parish officer if he chooses may enforce, but it depends on a contingency, because the outgoing tenant may have paid the rate beyond the time that he was in occupation; and until the incoming tenant has been called upon to make good the default of the outgoing tenant to pay the whole rate, I think the amount is not "payable" by him, and that he is not therefore disqualified under the 27th section of the Reform Act because he has not paid such amount. The words in that section are "unless such person shall have paid on or before the 20th of July in such year all the poor-rates and assessed taxes which shall have become payable from him in respect of such premises." I think the words "which shall have become payable from him," involve the idea of a definite sum payable in presenti, which he has been called upon to pay, and as to which he has been guilty of some default, and not a sum depending on a contingency, and as to which the claimant had no possibility of ascertaining till called upon to pay it. The words in the section are, "payable from him," not "in respect of what he shall have become liable to," but in respect of "what shall have become payable"; and until the contingent amount of his liability had been ascertained, he could not know what was payable from him. The disqualifying proviso takes away the franchise in case the claimant has not borne his share of the public burden imposed by poor-rates and assessed taxes. But poor-rates differ totally from assessed taxes, the latter being payable by instalments at certain periods, and their amount can be ascertained, whereas the extent of the poor-rates cannot be foreseen, as they are laid according to the requirements of the parish, and in some cases a peremptory mandamus may be made by the Queen's Bench to make and pay them forthwith; moreover they are due the instant the rate is made and not by instalments. Nobody can tell what poor-rate has been left unpaid by the outgoing tenant. It might be, if the tenant were rated at 1s. in the pound, and the rate was collected weekly, that the sum was a halfpenny per week, and the outgoing tenant might have left an arrear of only a week or so; was the election agent to be able to disenfranchise the incoming tenant because these trifling sums had not been paid and of which he could know nothing? It is clear to my mind that the proportionate amount of the rate never became "payable" until the amount had been ascertained and the party had been called upon to pay it. I think, therefore, that the revising barrister was right in his decision.

WILLIAMS, J.—I have the misfortune to differ with the rest of the Court. The franchise is conferred by the act subject to certain conditions, one of which is, that the party claiming to vote shall have paid, before the 20th of July, all rates and taxes which shall have become payable from him in respect of the premises; and the question is narrowed to the point, whether the party now claiming to vote has paid all the poor-rates payable from him in respect of the qualifying premises? Now, it appears to me that he has not. Under the statute of 17 Geo. 2. c. 38. s. 12. the incoming tenant is liable to pay his portion of the existing rate, and the question is, whether the proportionate amount of this rate was payable by him in respect of these premises. It is said that it is not payable by him, because whether he is liable to pay any given amount depends on a variety of circumstances not ascertained, and until they are ascertained no particular amount is payable. But the statute of 17 Geo. 2. c. 38. s. 12. says, he is "liable to pay," and I am of opinion that he is liable to pay a sum which becomes payable within the meaning of the 27th section of the Reform Act. The question is, whether it is a sum less payable from him because there may be a difficulty in ascertaining the exact amount. When, however, it has been ascertained, it is an exact sum, which cannot be increased by the circumstances under which the amount has been ascertained. I apprehend the claimant was liable for the proportionate amount, whatever that amount might be. That being so, it is impossible to say that he has paid all the poor-rates to which he has become liable in respect of his occupation, inasmuch as he has not paid the proportion of the rate due from him under the statute 17 Geo. 2. c. 38, and which I think he is liable to pay, and is payable from him under the words of that statute.

WILLES, J.—I am of opinion that the revising barrister was right, or at all events I cannot see my way clearly to say that he was wrong. The question, no doubt, is one of very considerable nicety, and turns on the words, "payable from him," in section 27. of the Reform Act. The incoming tenant could not know what portion of the rate was paid, and no claim was made on him by the parish officers. The revising barrister held there was a distinction between non-payment of such a rate, and non-payment of a rate made while the claimant was in occupation. It is easy to see the distinction, but it is difficult to say that that makes any difference in the construction of section 27. of the Reform Act. The incoming tenant cannot be bound to take notice that such a rate was made, unless one goes the length of saying that he was bound to make the inquiry, and that it was not for the parish officers to give him notice of it. I think the statute 17 Geo. 2. c. 38. s. 12. was not intended to regulate generally the rights of outgoing and incoming tenants, but to give the parish officers a remedy in respect of a proportion of the rate according to the time of occupation; and provision is made in the case of an outgoing tenant not paying the rate. There is a distinction between the ordinary liability to pay a rate, and the conditional liability to pay where the outgoing tenant has not done so. In construing this act it should be borne in mind that the register is but evidence of the right to vote, and that the liability under the statute of Geo. 2. is but a condition imposed upon the right; and I see no reason why the ordinary law respecting conditions should not be applied. The condition should not, I think, be enforced more strictly than a condition regarding any other right than that of voting would be enforced. If the parish officers were like the obligees in an ordinary bond, and if the condition was, that if A. B. has not paid the rates you may hold me liable under section 12. of 17 Geo. 2. c. 38, then there would be no forfeiture of the bond until notice had been given me that A. B. had not paid—see Com. Dig. tit. 'Condition' (L. 8). That is the distinction on which the revising barrister has acted, and my impression is, that he was right in doing so. At all events I cannot say that he was wrong.

KEATING, J.—I agree with my Lord and my Brother Willes that the revising barrister was right. The claimant not having himself necessarily any notice of the state of things which would make the existing rate payable by him, when he entered upon his occupation, there was an obligation on some one to give him notice, and I think the parish officers ought to have done so. The statute 17 Geo. 2. c. 38. contemplates the outgoing tenant going away and leaving the rate unpaid, and the rate so unpaid would become payable by the incoming tenant. But it seems to me to be a reasonable construction, that, no demand having been made, nor notice given to the claimant that a proportion of the existing rate was due, it has not been shewn this was a rate "payable" by him within the meaning of section 27. of the Reform Act.

Decision affirmed.

(Appeal from Revising Barrister's Court.)
1865. } SCOTT, appellant, v. DURANT,
Jan. 17. } respondent.

Parliament—Practice on Appeal—Incomplete Appeal—6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. ss. 42, 43, 44.—Consent to waive formal Objections.

At an adjourned Court held by the Revising barrister for a borough, on the 28th of October, he decided in favour of one of several objections taken to certain votes, and expunged the voters' names from the list; but, on application by such voters for a case, he consented to grant one if a point of law could be raised, provided the case were shewn to the objector's attorney, in order that he might raise in it the points which had been decided against the objector. The directions in ss. 42, 43, 44. of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. as to giving notice in writing of appeal, reading statement in writing in open court, signing the same then and there by the barrister, and appointing respondent to consolidated appeal, were not complied with, but both parties agreed at such Court to waive all objections in point of form, and that the objector should appear as respondent, and the appeals be consolidated. There was no further adjournment of the Court, but the barrister directed the parties to come to him at his chambers, which were out of the borough. A case was afterwards prepared, and given to the objector on the 4th of November, but as he was then unable to shew it to his attorney, he refused to sign it, and returned it unsigned on the 5th of November; the barrister signed it at his chambers, making the objector respondent, and it was transmitted on the same day to the Masters of the Court, that being the last day for doing so; a copy of the case and notice of appeal were served on the same day on the objector, who refused to be bound thereby:—Held, that there was not a completed appeal, and the Court therefore made absolute a rule to strike the case out of the list of appeals.

J. O. Griffiths had obtained a rule, in Michaelmas Term last, calling on the appellant to shew cause why this appeal should not be struck out of the list of appeals, on the grounds that there was no notice in writing given by or on behalf of the appellant before the rising of the Revising Barrister's Court; that the Revising Barrister did not state the case or his decision, or read the statement, or indorse or sign it in open court, or as required by the 6 Vict. c. 18. s. 42; and that the requisitions of section 44. of the statute were not complied with; and that no declarations were signed, and no respondent or appellant appointed as required by the said last-mentioned statute, and that Durant was improperly entered as the respondent.

The circumstances giving rise to this rule were as follows: On the 21st of October last, the Revising Barrister for the borough of New Windsor held a Court there for the purpose of revising the list of voters for that borough, at which Court Mr. Rogers, an attorney, appeared for the respondent Durant, in support of certain objections to retaining on the register the names of Scott, the appellant, and others. The barrister took time to consider the objections, and adjourned the Court to the 28th of October, when, the objector and Rogers being present, the Revising Barrister decided on all the objections but one against the objector, and on that one in the objector's favour, and directed that the votes should be expunged. The Revising Barrister was then applied to on behalf of those whose votes had been so struck out to grant a case, which he said he would do if a question of law could be raised, but that if a case were taken it must be shewn to Mr. Rogers for revision, in order that he might raise any of the points decided against the objector; and it was agreed, in open court, by both parties that they would waive all objections in point of form. The objector stated that he would appear as respondent, and that the appeals might be consolidated. There was no further adjournment of the Court, but the barrister directed the parties to come to him at his chambers, in London, which were therefore out of the borough. On the 2nd of November, a case was drawn up by the agent for the appellant, which was sent the next day to the Revising Barrister for approval, whereof the objector was informed on the 3rd of November, when he undertook to take the case to Mr. Rogers. The case as settled by the barrister was delivered to the objector on the morning of the 4th of November, and he then went to Reading in order to shew it to Mr. Rogers, who lived there. Mr. Rogers, however, was absent from home for the day, and did not, therefore, see the case: and the objector returned it to the claimant's agent, on the evening of that day, having made some alterations in it, but telling him that Rogers was from home and had not seen it. On the said 4th of November, a fair copy of the case, altered as suggested by the objector, was sent to him; and on the morning of the 5th of November it was returned by the objector, with an intimation that he could not sign it. On the afternoon of the 5th of November, the appellant's agent informed the Revising Barrister at his chambers that Mr. Rogers had not seen the case, and that the objector refused to sign it. The barrister told him that he must take the case at his peril, and then signed it, and it was transmitted the same day, with notice of appeal, to the Masters of the Court, that being the last day on which it could be transmitted. A copy of the case and notice of appeal were served, on the same day, on the objector, who refused to consent to the case, and to write his acceptance of the notice of appeal.

Sawyer shewed cause.—The provisions in sections 42, 43. and 44. of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. are directory, and not imperative. There are no negative words in them. In section 64. there are negative words, and they are imperative—Auley v. Topham (1). In the case of In re Knowles v. Holden (2), which will probably be relied on on the other side, where there had been consent to a reference of a plaintiff in the county court, the Court held that there was no jurisdiction, because there were negative words in the act of parliament to the effect that the Court had no jurisdiction at all. But it is different where there is jurisdiction in the first instance which is extended by the consent of the parties—Andrews v. Elliott (3). The other side will say that there was no jurisdiction after the 31st of October.

Yes, it is submitted that that is so. By section 33. the power is given to hold Courts between the 15th of September and the 31st of October. Then by section 41. power is given to adjourn; "but so that no such adjourned Court shall be holden after the last day of October in any year." The other side will say that that deprives the Revising Barrister of power after the 31st of October. That section, however, comes before the sections which apply to appeals, and it does not apply to the mere signing of a case. There is a decision in one of the Irish Courts of Agnew v. Fowler (4) where the Court held that the Revising Barrister had no power to sign the statement of facts and the appeal after a particular day; but the Irish act differs from the English act; and moreover, in that case, no consent had been given by the parties. It has been decided in this Court, that the case may, by consent, be remitted to the Revising Barrister to be signed—Burton v. Brooks (5).

[KEATING, J.—In Whithorn v. Thomas (6) I was the Revising Barrister, and signed the amended case in this court.]

Pring v. Estcourt (7) shows that section 42. is directory only as to the signature of the indorsement. In Freeman v. Read (8) it was said that there was no power in the Quarter Sessions to tax the costs after the Sessions were over; but it was held that, by consent, there was ample power to tax the costs.—[He also referred to The Queen v. the Justices of Hampshire (9), The Queen v. the Mayor of Rochester (10), The King v. Sparrow (11), Peacock v. the Queen (12),

Morgan v. Edwards (13), and Woodhouse v. Woods (14).]

J. O. Griffiths, in support of the rule.—There was no consent to the case, as it is now stated. By section 33. of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. the Courts are to be held in the borough, and this must take place between the 15th of September and the 31st of October. Section 44. says that the Revising Barrister may consolidate the appeals; but section 42. expressly states that the statement shall be read in open court. That was not done here, nor was a notice in writing given by the appellant, as required by that section. There was also no signing of the case then and there by the Revising Barrister nor by the appellant, and there was no indorsement on the case, in accordance with that section. With regard to section 43. there was no appointment of any respondent. The 44th section, as to the consolidated appeal, was not complied with. If the respondent declined to sign the case, it would be imperative on the Revising Barrister, by the 44th section, to name the overseers or town clerk to be the respondent. Then, by section 45, the consolidated appeal is to be conducted as a single appeal, and there is a proviso that if the consolidated appeal shall not be duly prosecuted or answered, "it shall be lawful for the Court of Common Pleas, or for the Lord Chief Justice or any Judge of the Court to give to any party or parties interested in such appeal, upon his or their application, the conduct and direction of the appeal or of the answer thereto." That is, if the parties named shall not conduct it in a proper manner. Here the case is not signed by any respondent, and there was not an unqualified consent given by the objector to his being made respondent.

ERLE, C.J.—A great many points have been raised in this case; but we feel obliged to make this rule absolute on the ground that there was not a completed appeal.

WILLIAMS, J., WILLES, J., and KEATING, J. concurred.

 1864. } ROBERTS, appellant, v. PERCI-
 Nov. 19. } VAL, respondent.

Parliament — County Vote — Freehold for Life—Bedesmen—Eleemosynary Institution—Practice—Decision of Court where not Final.

An hospital was founded for certain bedesmen who are appointed for life, and who inhabit separate rooms into which the hospital is divided, and each of which is of the annual value of 4l. The hospital was founded before statute 29 Eliz. c. 5, which enables hospitals for the poor to be incorporated, and it is governed by rules made before that act, which refer to feoffees and their heirs, but none are known, and the warden and bedesmen manage the property without anybody interfering with them, and when a portion of it was lately sold for a railway, they signed the conveyance and received the proceeds, which they expended in erecting buildings on the land for their own benefit. The rules give power to remove a bedesman for certain offences, but no instance has ever occurred of a bedesman having been removed during his life:—Held, that each bedesman had an equitable freehold estate in his room, which entitled him to be registered as a freeholder.

Simpson v. Wilkinson (1) affirmed, and the case distinguished from those of Hearley v. Banks (2) and Freeman v. Gainsford (3).

The decision of this Court on appeal, though made final by 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. s. 66, does not prevent the Revising Barrister from entering into a case in all respects similar to the one so decided, but affecting a different register and a different voter.

The following CASE was stated by the Revising Barrister for the Northern Division of the county of Northampton.

Thomas Wallington, on the register of voters for the parish of Kettering, in the northern division of the county of Northampton, duly objected to the vote of Abraham Bell. The name and description of the voter on the registry were as follow—

Bell, Abraham.	Lord Burleigh's Hospital, St. Martin's, Stamford Baron.	Freehold tenement or room.	Abraham Bell, occupier.

He also objected to the names of twelve other persons, whose qualifications on the lists were described in like manner, and depended on the like facts; and the appeals were therefore consolidated. The facts as to the appointment of the several claimants, and the nature and mode of enjoyment of the qualifying property, are similar to the facts as stated in Simpson v. Wilkinson (1), and the facts of that case are admitted and are to be taken mutatis mutandis as if stated as part of this case, as is also the copy of the ordinances printed in the report.

Upon the objections being called on, it was contended on behalf of the respondent, that the Revising Barrister had no power to enter upon the inquiry according to the 66th section of the statute 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, the judgment of this Court having been given upon facts similar to those which are the foundation of the present claim. The whole of the claimants in the present case have been appointed since the above judgment was delivered.

The Revising Barrister decided to go into the case, and to hear the evidence, being of opinion that the words "the case" in the said section referred only to the current register, or, at any rate, to the particular individual affected.

If the Court should be of opinion that this contention should have prevailed, the names were to be retained, without reference to the remainder of this case.

The following additional facts were then proved: That in 1846 part of the hospital premises not separately used by the then occupiers was sold to the Midland Railway Company for the purposes of a railway. That the sale was conducted by the then wardens and bedesmen as owners without the intervention of any other person. That the warden and each of the bedesmen signed the conveyance to the company, the money was paid to the warden and bedesmen, and expended by them in erecting buildings upon part of the garden attached to the hospital, which buildings are now used for a wash-house by the warden and bedesmen as they have occasion.

It was then contended by the objector that, assuming the legal origin of the foundation, if the claimants had any estate, it was only as members of a corporation aggregate, and that the additional facts above stated led to this conclusion. That they had no freehold estate. That, if they had, it was only a joint tenancy in the whole hospital, and not an exclusive and separate one in each of the rooms, and that this also appeared from the new facts. That they were in receipt of alms. And that, looking at the recent decisions, and especially Freeman v. Gainsford (3), the claims were bad.

The Revising Barrister overruled these objections, and retained the several names on the list of voters, being of opinion that the facts were substantially unaltered, and that there was therefore nothing to disentitle the claimants to the benefit of the judgment already given by this Court upon the same foundation, whatever were the reasons of such decision; and also that they did not receive alms within the meaning of section 36. of 2 Will. 4. c. 45.

Hannan (Underdown with him), for the appellant.—The first question is, whether the Revising Barrister had power to go into the case after the judgment of this Court in Simpson v. Wilkinson (1). The respondent relies on the 66th section of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18 (4), which makes the decisions of this Court, on appeals from the Revising Barristers, final. That section, however, only means that the decision is to be conclusive in the particular case in which it is given.—[On this point he was stopped by the Court].—The next question is, whether the claimants have an estate of freehold for life, within the meaning of the Reform Act, 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 18. The only contention on the part of the claimants is, that they have an equitable freehold estate in their rooms; for it is not pretended that they have a legal estate therein. It is submitted that, looking at the rules and constitution of the hospital and its eleemosynary character, the inmates have no such holdings as would constitute them owners of property, either equitably or legally. The case of Simpson v. Wilkinson (1) is not conclusive of this point. The objection that the parties were in the receipt of alms was not allowed to be argued in that case, as it had not been raised before the Revising Barrister. Tindal, C.J. says in that case, "The only question open to us is, whether the barrister was wrong, in point of law, in saying that there might be some legal commencement to the estate, not necessarily investing the claimants with a corporate character." It is clear that the decision in Simpson v. Wilkinson (1) proceeded on the narrow ground, whether the claimants were a corporation or not, and not on the larger ground, which involved the question as to the nature of their holding; and that was the opinion of this Court in Freeman v. Gainsford (3) and Heartley v. Banks (2). Now, it is the essence of the decisions in those two last cases that the general character of the holding depends on the general character of the institution. For that purpose it is important to look at the ordinances made for the government of the hospital; it is submitted that they shew that the present occupiers have no legal estate, and that their occupation is of such an eleemosynary character as to prevent their having such a freehold interest in their rooms as to entitle them to vote. There is, in fact, no substantial difference between the character of their holding and that of either the Poor Knights of Windsor—Heartley v. Banks (2), or of the inmates of Shrewsbury Hospital—Freeman v. Gainsford (3). The respondent will probably rely on the 21st Ordinance, which states, "As these poor men shall have at the first their several rooms allowed them in the almshouse, so shall they, during their lives or their continuance in their places, continue their lodging, and every one as he shall succeed to the void

(4) Section 66. of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. enacts, "that every judgment or decision of the said Court shall be final and conclusive in the case upon the point of law adjudicated upon, and shall be binding upon every Committee of the House of Commons appointed for the trial of any petition complaining of an undue election or return of any member or members to serve in Parliament."

places, so shall he succeed in the lodgings without any change." It is submitted that that is amongst the rules for the government of the institution. According to the statutes of the Shrewsbury Hospital, the inmates were to enjoy their rooms for their lives; and yet, as stated by Williams, J. in Freeman v. Gainsford (3), "it does not follow that the particular rooms are to be assigned to each of them as owner for his life." With respect to the facts connected with the sale to the railway company mentioned in the present case, it does not appear that any heir to the feoffees was to be founded, or that there was any person to interfere with what was done by these bedesmen. At the most, such dealing with the property would only shew that they had a joint ownership in the whole of the property; and that would not assist the claimants for the purposes of the present case, which requires them to shew that each has a freehold interest in his particular room.

Field, for the respondent, was not called upon by the Court.

ERLE, C.J.—I think that the revising barrister was right. In Simpson v. Wilkinson (1) this Court was then of opinion that the inmates of Burleigh Hospital had a freehold interest in the rooms assigned to them, and I am of opinion now that the inmates of that hospital have a freehold interest in the rooms assigned to them, and that they are entitled to vote. The origin of the hospital is unknown, but in Simpson v. Wilkinson (1) the Court were of opinion that the revising barrister might presume that the hospital was established before the 39 Eliz. c. 5, and that it had been created and endowed by Lord Burleigh, by granting the lands to feoffees in trust for the members of that hospital. Now it seems to me that the parties taking under such endowment would have all the rights of property given by the terms of the feoffment, and they might have all the property in the shape of an equitable freehold, just as a corporation for charitable purposes under the 39 Eliz. c. 5. might have, only that in the case of such corporation the whole of the property would be vested in the corporation, and the members would not by reason of their membership be qualified. The majority of the hospitals are now incorporated, and that is why there is an end of any question about the members of such hospital having a right to vote. But if the lands be conveyed to feoffees in trust for the inmates of the hospital, then the legal interest would be in the feoffees, and the equitable interest in the members of the hospital, and that equitable interest would be according to the terms of the deed: and where the deed is lost, the terms of it would be presumed from the way in which the property has been enjoyed. The way in which the property in the Burleigh Hospital has been enjoyed seems entirely consistent with the supposition I have put forward. Each member is placed in a room, and he occupies that room for life. The warden and bedesmen manage the property as owners, and nobody interferes with them. They get what they can by letting the granary, being part of the hospital they do not occupy, and they act in every respect as persons having the entire beneficial interest in the hospital, and when part of the premises were sold, the additional facts find, that they executed a deed of conveyance of it, and that the proceeds were divided for their own use. Therefore there is ground from user to authorize me to infer, that each man took a separate freehold interest in his own room, and that the rest of the property belonged to the warden and bedesmen beneficially in the manner I have pointed out. There is no doubt that in the ordinances of Lord Burleigh for the time being there is a good deal of language that would imply a supervision, control, and interference in some degree with the rights of the inmates of the hospital. The ordinances are, that Lord Burleigh, or certain persons, should, in case of irregularity of conduct, have the power of removal. That is a power that has never been acted upon, and if an attempt was now made to act upon it, there probably would be found abundance of difficulty in the way. I do not think that the fact of there being such a power makes the conclusion which the Court came to in Simpson v. Wilkinson (1) wrong. The strength of Mr. Hannen's argument has been that the Court held, in the case of Heartley v. Banks (2), that the Poor Knights of Windsor, and in Freeman v. Gainsford (3), that the inmates of Lord Shrewsbury's Hospital were not qualified to vote, though they were persons taking shares of the profits of the estates with which those hospitals were endowed. But there is a broad distinction in my mind between the present case and each of those cases; for in them there was a governing body, in whom the legal estate was necessarily to continue vested for the purpose of executing the trust to be performed by them, and the profits of the endowment did not belong absolutely, and without any intervening person, to the person who claimed to be qualified by reason thereof. The trustees were to receive the profits, and then the Poor Knights of Windsor were entitled to claim a portion of the money out of those profits; and so the inmates of Lord Shrewsbury's Hospital were entitled to receive a portion of the money from the trustees without themselves having any estate at all; though in each of those cases the trustees were bound to find lodgings for the inmates. But I see that in Lord Burleigh's Hospital the members are, when named, to be placed in certain rooms, and in those rooms they are to continue till they die. In the other case, of Freeman v. Gainsford (3), one of the grounds of the judgment of the Court was that the inmates were not to have any estate in their rooms; and the Court assumed that the governing body had the power to shift them from time to time from room to room; whereas in Lord Burleigh's Hospital the inmates are to have an estate for life in the rooms which are assigned to them. In Lord Burleigh's Hospital the feoffees have merely the legal estate, and the equitable estate is in the warden and bedesmen. In Lord Shrewsbury's Hospital the trustees had the legal estate, and continued possessed of the equitable estate subject to the disposing of the profits according to the trusts. A great deal of ambiguity has been brought into these cases by saying, that a man would be prevented from being qualified though he had a legal or equitable freehold, if the mode of occupation was eleemosynary. I have a great desire to avoid introducing anything that is, to my mind, an entirely mistaken notion as to the question whether the party is owner of the equitable freehold or not; in deciding that question it may be very material to see whether the trustees hold in trust to take the profits and dispose of them in an eleemosynary manner to the objects of the donor's bounty; but if a person have an estate, whether legal or equitable, it matters not whether the motive of the donor of the estate was of a charitable nature, or whether the feelings of the parties who took the estate and enjoyed the profits under it ought to be the feelings of eleemosynary grantees. The motives of the grantor and the motives of the grantees are, in deciding whether there is an estate, absolutely irrelevant, otherwise than to see whether the trustees who hold the legal estate are to hand over the money to the persons entitled to take the money or other benefits under the trust, or whether the persons so taking are to receive the same only in an eleemosynary sense, and to have no estate at all.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. Mr. Hannen asks us to reconsider the decision in Simpson v. Wilkinson (1), upon the ground that since that decision this Court, in the two cases of Heartley v. Banks (2) and Freeman v. Gainsford (3), have laid down principles which, though not conflicting with the actual decision in that case, would induce the Court to come to a different conclusion upon the facts; but it seems to me he has failed in shewing identity of circumstances between those later cases and the case of Simpson v. Wilkinson (1). In those later cases there is the important distinction that has been adverted to by my Lord, namely, that the property was there vested in persons who, as trustees, had active trusts to perform, without the recipients of the bounty in either case having an estate in any particular room; whereas, in Simpson v. Wilkinson (1), there is no such body exercising any such active trust, but the management of the property is from the beginning vested in these inmates themselves. Although it is true, as Mr. Hannen says, that an estate in mere joint-tenancy might not qualify each claimant, and that they deal with the granary by letting it, and dividing the profits among themselves as joint tenants, yet with the rooms themselves they deal severally and separately, and when a portion of the property comes to be sold, they are the persons who sell without the intervention of a trustee or any governing body, and they receive the proceeds of the sale, and expend them upon the land for their own benefit. Under these circumstances, it seems to me that, as my Lord has pointed out, the inmates in the later cases had no equitable estate in the land, but that in the present case as well as in Simpson v. Wilkinson (1) they have an equitable estate in the land.

Decision affirmed, with costs.

1864. } HEELIS, appellant, v. BLAIN,
Nov. 23. } respondent.

Parliament—County Vote—Rentcharge—Statute of Uses, 27 Hen. 8. c. 10. s. 1.—Actual Possession—Possession in Law—Stat. 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 26.

Though the grantee of a rentcharge under a grant at common law is not entitled to be registered before he has been in the actual receipt of the rent (since until then he has only a possession in law, and not the actual possession required by 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 26), it is otherwise where the rentcharge is by a conveyance operating under the Statute of Uses; for then the person, to whose use the rentcharge is limited, is by virtue of the Statute of Uses at once in actual possession; and he may be entitled to be registered if the rent be of sufficient value, though he has not received any part of it.

This was a consolidated appeal from the decision of one of the Revising Barristers for the Southern Division of the county of Lancaster.

Frederick Clayton objected to the name of Arthur Heelis being retained on the list of voters for the township of Pendleton, in respect of the following qualification :

"Township of Pendleton, 1864.

"Southern division of Lancaster, to wit.—The list of persons claiming to be entitled to vote in the election of knights of the shire for the southern division of the county of Lancaster, in respect of property situate in whole or in part within the township of Pendleton :

Heelis, Arthur.	Halton-bank, Ecclesold-road, Pendleton.	An undivided sixth part or share of a perpetual chief or fee farm rent of 50 l. per annum.	Issuing out of land and a house and other buildings known as Hopefield Waste Lane, in Pendleton, belonging to and occupied by William Thomas Blacklock.

The said rentcharge of 50*l.* was created by indentures of lease and release, dated respectively the 9th and 10th of June 1839, whereby certain land in Pendleton was granted, bargained, sold and released by John Robinson and Stephen Heelis to John Spencer and his heirs, to the use, intent and purpose that he said John Robinson and his assigns during his life, and after the determination of that estate by any means in his lifetime, then that the said Stephen Heelis and his heirs during the natural life of and in trust for the said John Robinson, and subject to the aforesaid limitations, then that John Robinson, his heirs and assigns, should and might yearly and every year for ever thereafter have, receive and take from and out of the land thereby released, and the buildings to be erected thereon, one clear yearly rent or sum of 50*l.* by half-yearly payments, on the 24th of June and the 25th of December; and to further uses limiting to John Robinson, his heirs and assigns, or to Stephen Heelis and his heirs, as the case might be, powers of distress and of entry and perception of profits for securing the said yearly rent, and subject to the said yearly rent of 50*l.*, and powers and remedies for the recovery thereof, to uses to bar dower, remainder to the use of John Spencer, his heirs and assigns for ever.

All the estate and interest in the said land so vested in John Spencer became, prior to the year 1862, and still is, vested in William Thomas Blacklock and his heirs in fee.

By an indenture, made and dated the 3rd of November 1862, the said John Robinson granted and released the said rentcharge of 50*l.* and all his estate therein, with the said powers and remedies for securing the same, unto and to the use of Stephen Heelis, his heirs and assigns for ever.

By indenture duly executed, and dated the 27th of January 1864, and made between the said Stephen Heelis of the first part; John Heelis, a son of the said Stephen Heelis, of the second part; and the said Stephen Heelis and John Heelis, and Thomas Heelis, Arthur Heelis, James Heelis and Edward Heelis, four other sons of the said Stephen Heelis, of the third part; the said Stephen Heelis, in consideration of the natural love and affection which he had and bore for his sons, the other parties to the deed, and for a nominal pecuniary consideration, granted and assured unto the said John Heelis and his heirs the said rent of 50*l.*, with the powers and remedies for the recovery thereof, and all his estate and interest therein, to hold unto the said John Heelis and his heirs to the use of the said Stephen Heelis, John Heelis, Thomas Heelis, Arthur Heelis, James Heelis and Edward Heelis respectively, and their respective heirs and assigns, equally in undivided sixth shares, as tenants in common and not as joint tenants.

The said rentcharge has always been duly paid to the parties entitled.

The half-year's rent which became due on the 24th of June 1864, being the first which became due after the execution of the said indenture of the 27th of January 1864, was, on the 8th of July following, paid by the said William Thomas Blacklock to the said John Heelis, for and on behalf of himself and the five other parties entitled thereto under the last-mentioned deed, to whom he paid over their respective shares at various times between the 8th and the 30th of July. No portion of the said rentcharge was paid after the execution of the said indenture of the 27th of January 1864 until the 24th of June 1864, when the half-year's payment was made as aforesaid.

The land so conveyed in 1839, together with a house and other buildings subsequently erected thereon, are the premises described in the fourth column of the said list of persons claiming to be entitled to vote.

NEW SERIES, 34.—C.P.

The said Arthur Heelis named in the said indenture of the 27th of January 1864 is the claimant Arthur Heelis named in the said list.

When the claim of Arthur Heelis came before the Revising Barrister it was objected that he had not been in actual possession or in receipt of the rent for his own use for six calendar months next previous to the last day of July 1864. On the other hand, the claimant contended that the rentcharge having been originally created, not by grant but by a conveyance to uses, he (the claimant) having, on the 27th of January 1864, become, by virtue of the indenture of that date, an assign of the said John Robinson, he was, by the 4th and 5th sections of the Statute of Uses, to be adjudged and deemed to be in possession and seisin of the share of the said rentcharge in such like estate as he had in the use of the same, and that so being in such possession and seisin, he was in the actual possession and receipt thereof for six calendar months next previous to the last day of July 1864 within the meaning of the 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 26. The Revising Barrister considered that the seisin and possession mentioned in the said sections of the Statute of Uses are explained and qualified by the subsequent words in the latter section, viz., "as if a grant or other lawful conveyance had been made and executed to them by such as were or shall be seised to the use or intent of any such rent," and that the statutable seisin and possession were to the same extent and of the same effect only as if a grant of the said share of the said rent had, on the said 27th of January 1864, been made by William Thomas Blacklock to the claimant; and that if such grant had then been made, nevertheless, until the actual receipt of part of his said share of the said rent, the claimant would not have been in the actual possession or receipt thereof within the meaning of the 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 26. The Revising Barrister, therefore, disallowed the claim of the said Arthur Heelis, and erased his name from the list of voters.

There were like claims made by James Heelis, John Heelis and Thomas Heelis, whose cases were consolidated with the present appeal.

Joshua Williams, for the appellant.—The rentcharge was created by deeds of lease and release, operating under the Statute of Uses, 27 Hen. 8. c. 10, and a share of this rentcharge was conveyed to the use of the appellant, by the deed of January 1864, and it is submitted that, under that deed, and by virtue of section 1. of 27 Hen. 8. c. 10, the appellant had at once seisin and possession of such share. A mistake was made by the parties at the hearing before the Revising Barrister, in referring to sections 4. and 5. of the Statute of Uses. The section which alone bears on this point, and on which reliance is now placed by the appellant, is section 1, and not sections 4. and 5. of that statute. By this section 1. it is declared, that the person who has the use of lands, rents, &c. is to be "deemed and adjudged in lawful seisin, estate and possession of and in the same." Now the 26th section of the Reform Act (2 Will. 4. c. 45.) enacts that no person shall be registered in any year in respect of his estate, or interest in any lands or tenements as a freeholder," &c., "unless he shall have been in the actual possession thereof, or in receipt of the rents and profits thereof, for his own use, for six calendar months at least next previous to the last day of July in such year." The words "in receipt of the rents and profits thereof," do not apply to this case, which is a rentcharge. The question, therefore, arises on the words "in the actual possession thereof"; and on behalf of the appellant it is contended, that he had such actual possession on the 27th of January 1864, by virtue of the indenture of that date, and the 1st section of the Statute of Uses, which gave him then seisin in fact, and not a mere seisin in law, of his share of the rentcharge. That this is the effect of that statute is established by the authorities. In Comyns's Digest, 'Uses' (I.), it is said "By statute 27 Hen. 8. c. 10. cestui que use is immediately seised and in actual possession—Cro. Eliz. 46; and therefore shall have assize or trespass against a stranger before entry." With respect to what gives seisin of a rent, it is stated in 3 Cruise's Dig. 274, "As to a rentcharge, the only mode of acquiring a seisin in deed of it, when created by grant, is by the actual receipt of the whole or of some part of it; and formerly it was usual, where a freehold estate in a rentcharge was created, to pay the grantee a penny in the name of the rent. But where a rent is created by means of a conveyance to uses, the grantee immediately acquires a seisin, by the words of the statute." So Mr. Butler, in his note to Littleton, section 565, and Coke on Littleton, 315 a, which treat of the seisin of rent necessary to maintain an assize, says, "This is only to be understood of a rent at common law; but if the rent is limited as a use under the statute, as if lands are conveyed by lease and release to A. and his heirs, to the use that B. may receive out of them an annual rent, the statute immediately executes the use of the rent in B." To the same effect is Lord Bacon's Reading on the Statute of Uses, p. 46, and Burton on Real Property, pl. 1116. The respondent will rely on the case of Murray v. Thorniley (1), as deciding that the grantee of a rentcharge is not entitled to be registered unless he has been in the actual receipt of it for six months before the last day of July. In that case, however, the rentcharge was a rentcharge at common law, and not by a deed under the Statute of Uses, and the Court gave their decision on the ground that, to satisfy the 26th section of the Reform Act, there must be a possession in fact, as contradistinguished from a possession in law. In Hayden v. the Overseers of Twerton (2) Maule, J. correctly states that "the case of Murray v. Thorniley (1) proceeded on the ground that the seisin requisite to entitle a party to be registered in respect of a rentcharge, is such as would have been necessary to enable the grantee to maintain an assize." The case itself of Hayden v. the Overseers of Twerton (2) was that of the assignee of a rentcharge at common law, who had therefore no possession until receipt of the rent, and the case did not materially differ from that of Murray v. Thorniley (1). Had the present case been that of a rentcharge by grant at common law, it is admitted that the appellant would not be entitled to a vote; but as he claims here an actual seisin, by virtue of the Statute of Uses, and not merely a seisin in law, he had sufficient possession to qualify him to be on the register.

Keane, for the respondent.—What has been contended for, on the part of the appellant, is contrary to what the legislature intended when it framed the Reform Act. That act requires that the party should be put into actual possession of the rentcharge for six months before he can be thereby qualified. He is not in such possession until he has been in receipt of the rent. There is no authority, that is to say, no decision of any Court, that the effect of the Statute of Uses is to put a person in the actual possession of a rentcharge, where the same is conveyed to his use by a deed operating under that statute. These may be the opinions of Mr. Butler, Mr. Burton, and other conveyancers, on the subject, but there is no decision to that effect.

(1) 2 Com. B. Rep. 217; s. c. 15 Law J. Rep. (N. S.) C. P. 155.

(2) 4 Com. B. Rep. 1; s. c. 16 Law J. Rep. (N. S.) C. P. 88.

[ERLE, C.J.—Lord Eldon, in giving judgment in the House of Lords, in Smith v. Doe d. Jersey (3), takes notice of the practice of conveyancers.]

The words "lawful seisin and possession" in the Statute of Uses, differ from the words "actual possession" in the Reform Act, and the difference was one well known in the time of Henry the Eighth. In Bevil's case (4), "the word seisin," it is said, "should be construed according to the subject-matter, sometimes for actual seisin and sometimes for seisin in law." The 4th and 5th sections of the Statute of Uses are the only sections applicable to a rentcharge. This is shewn in Sugden's Gilbert on Uses, p. 193, note 4, where it is stated "The statute has two provisions for the execution of rents: the first, for rents in case limited to uses which are executed in the same manner as uses of corporeal hereditaments; the other, for rents limited in use out of the seisin in the land of some other person, e. g. where any person stands seised of any lands, to the use that some other person may receive a rent thereout, which the statute executes in the same manner as if a sufficient grant had been made to him by the person seised to the use, and gives the cestus que use a power of distress." The result therefore is, that the effect of the statute is to give the appellant such a seisin as he would have had if a grant had been made to him at common law with a power of distress. Indeed, the object of the Statute of Uses was to give the party to whose use the rentcharge was limited, the same rights as he would have had under a grant at common law. Then the cases of Murray v. Thorniley (1) and Hayden v. the Overseers of Twerton (2) shew that such grantee of a rentcharge under those circumstances would not be entitled to be on the register of voters, because he was not in actual receipt of the rents and profits. The appellant now relies on the 1st section of the Statute of Uses; but it is submitted that "rents" in that section mean the ordinary rents at common law, and not "rentcharges" created by modes of conveyance not contemplated at the time of that statute. There has been no decision in which a rentcharge granted by A. to B. for the use of C, has by force of the instrument been held equivalent to an actual seisin of the rentcharge by C. Certainly, the intention of the Reform Act was, that the party claiming to be qualified to vote in respect of a rentcharge should be in the manual and actual enjoyment of such rent, and not only in possession of it by force of the Statute of Uses.

Williams, in reply, was stopped by the Court.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the revising barrister was wrong, and that the claimant is entitled to vote. The claimant claimed to have been in the actual possession of a share in a rentcharge for six calendar months before the 31st of July, and it appears that more than six months before that time the rentcharge was granted to John Heelis to the use of the claimant and five others as tenants in common. The rentcharge had been created in 1839 by the owners of the land in fee simple, and had come ultimately to the party who, in 1864, conveyed it to John Heelis to the use of the claimant and others. No payment was made and nothing had been received by the claimant under the rentcharge until after the 24th of June, and if the conveyance had been at common law without the aid of the Statute of Uses, it is clear, from the case of Hayden v. the Overseers of Twerton (2), that there would have been no actual possession of the rent-

(3) 2 B. & B. at p. 599.

(4) 4 Rep. 10 a.

charge to entitle the claimant to be registered. The conveyance, however, was a conveyance operating by the Statute of Uses, and that statute in section 1. says, that where there is a conveyance of, inter alia, rents to one person to the use of another person, in such case the person to whose use the conveyance is made shall from thenceforth stand and be seised, deemed and adjudged in lawful seisin, estate and possession of and in such rents. Then the statute of the 2 Will. 4. c. 45. requires that the party shall be in actual possession of the rent, and the Statute of Uses enacts, that when a person is seised of a rent to the use of another, the person to whose use the other is seised shall be deemed to be in lawful possession of the rent. I am of opinion that the legislature in the times of Henry the Eighth and William the Fourth attached the same meaning to the words "possession" and "actual possession," and that the conveyance under the Statute of Uses has given the claimant the actual possession required, in order to comply with the statute 2 Will. 4. c. 45. It is said that this would be an evasion of the statute, which requires actual possession of the rent; but I attach no importance to that. Handing over anything in the name of the rent would, to my mind, afford less facility of proof than the production of a conveyance operating by virtue of the Statute of Uses. Then the authorities which Mr. Williams has brought forward are, I should say, entitled to very great respect. In Cro. Elis. 46, there are the resolutions of the Judges. Lord Bacon's reading upon the Statute of Uses (5) is entitled to very considerable weight, and Lord Chief Baron Comyns has been held in high opinion in the profession. He says, "By the 27 Hen. 8. c. 10. the cestui que use is immediately seised and in actual possession." Then there is the authority of Coke upon Littleton and Butler's note, p. 315 a, note 1, where the whole of the learning of Tindal, C.J., in Murray v. Thorniley (1), is to be found, for it appears to me to be involved in the passage from Coke upon Littleton, and Butler's note points out the distinction between a conveyance of rent at common law and a conveyance by virtue of the Statute of Uses. Under the latter there is actual possession from the time of the conveyance. Then I take notice of what is strictly not an authority, namely, Cruise's Digest (p. 274), and also Barton on Real Property (pl. 1116), and I think I have authority for so doing, when I refer to the opinion of Lord Eldon in the case of Smith v. Doe d. Jersey (3), that the practices of conveyancers must be taken notice of by those who have to administer the law, so as to give effect to the intentions of the parties as shewn by the instruments they have executed. Such persons have been remarkable for ability and learning; and I am happy to think that the mantle of some of the old conveyancers is worn down to the present day, and that we have had the benefit of it in the argument of this case.

KRATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the revising barrister was wrong, but I am bound to add, that if I had to decide the point, as he had, without the benefit of the argument that we have listened to, I think the great probability is that I should have decided in the same way. But that argument has distinguished the great difference between the grant of a rentcharge at common law and one under the Statute of Uses. The Reform Act, 2 Will. 4. c. 45, requires actual possession for six months; and this Court has decided that a grant of a rentcharge at common law would not give that actual possession which the Reform Act requires. The judgment of this Court in Murray v. Thorniley (1) was founded upon many authorities entitled to great weight. Tindal, C.J. quotes the extract from Littleton, sec. 235: "And so it is, if a man grant by his deed a yearly rent issuing out of his land to another, &c., if the grantor thereafter pay to the grantee a penny or a halfpenny, in the name of seisin of the rent, then if after the next day of payment the rent be denied, the grantee may have an assize, or else not," &c. And Lord Coke, carrying out his own statement that there might be great virtue in an et cetera, explains what it means, and says, "By this et cetera is implied that the grant and delivery of the deed is no seisin of the rent; and that a seisin in law, which the grantee hath by the grant, is not sufficient to maintain an assize or any other real action, but there must be an actual seisin." Mr. Williams admits that actual possession, as required by the Reform Act, must be such as would have enabled him to maintain an assize. From Cro. Eliz. 46, deriving some authority, at all events, by its being adopted by Chief Baron Comyns, (see Dig. 'Uses,' l.) we find that by the 27 Hen. 8. c. 10. a cestui que use is immediately seised and in actual possession, and therefore that he shall have an assize or trespass before entry against a stranger. That, therefore, brings this case precisely within the grounds on which the case of Murray v. Thorniley (1) was decided in this court, and establishes completely the distinction between the grant of a rent-charge at common law and a conveyance by the Statute of Uses. Upon these grounds I also, agreeing entirely with the observations made by my Lord, am of opinion that the revising barrister took an erroneous view of this case, but, I think, a view which he might be well excused for taking when he had not the advantage of hearing the argument we have heard.

Decision reversed.

1865. } SMITH, appellant, v.
Jan. 12. } FOREMAN, respondent.

Parliament — County Vote—50*l.* Occupation—Different Holdings—2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 20.—6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. s. 73.

*A person who occupies, as sole tenant, land for which he is liable to a yearly rent of less than 50*l.*, and also, as tenant jointly with another, land at a yearly rent of less than 50*l.* for each joint tenant, is not, under 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 20. or 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. s. 73, entitled to a county vote, though both tenancies are under the same landlord, and the share of the rent under the joint tenancy added to that under the sole tenancy exceeds 50*l.* a year.*

Appeal from the decision of the Revising Barrister for the Eastern Division of the county of Kent.

Henry George Allen duly objected to the name of John Rolfe being retained on the list and register of voters for the parish of Brabourne.

The facts of the case are these. The name of John Rolfe appeared on the copy of the register of persons entitled to vote as follows :

John Rolfe.	West Brabourne.	Occupation of House and Land.	West Brabourne.

And his name had stood on the register thus for several previous years. John Rolfe had during the qualifying period and for several previous years occupied solely as tenant a house and land at West Brabourne, for which he was bond fide liable to a yearly rent of 40*l.* He had also occupied during the qualifying period, and for several previous years, as tenant jointly with his father, under the same landlord, other lands, three-fourths of which were also in West Brabourne, and about one-fourth in a neighbouring parish, also within the said eastern division, for which he and his father were bond fide liable to a rent of 64*l.* per annum. The hiring of these latter-named lands was at a different and subsequent period from the hiring of the first-mentioned house and land, of which John Rolfe was sole tenant.

The Revising Barrister decided that, inasmuch as the occupation and holding of the joint tenant is per tout as well as per my, and that John Rolfe was actually bond fide liable to pay to one landlord a yearly rent or sum exceeding 50*l.*, that is to say, 40*l.* for his sole occupation and 32*l.* at least as his bond fide share of the rent of the joint occupation, for the lands and other tenements holden and occupied by him as aforesaid, he was entitled to be retained on the same list and register of voters by virtue of the 20th section of 2 Will. 4. c. 45, which enacts that "every male of full age who shall occupy as tenant any lands or tenements for which he shall be bond fide liable to a yearly rent of not less than 50*l.* shall be entitled to vote," and the Revising Barrister retained his name on the register and list of voters accordingly.

R. Bourke, for the appellant.—The question is, whether the two tenancies can be put together so as to make the yearly rent for which the voter is liable of not less than 50*l*. It is submitted that they cannot be so put together. To be entitled to be on the register, the voter ought either to be liable to a yearly rent of not less than 50*l*., and so be qualified under section 20. of the Reform Act (2 Will. 4. c. 45), or else he ought to be liable, with his father, to a joint rent the moiety of which is not less than 50*l*., and so be qualified under section 73. of the Registration Act (6 & 7 Vict. c. 18). As it is, the voter in the present case comes within neither of these acts. The rent for which he is solely liable is only 40*l*., so he is not qualified by the Reform Act; and the moiety of the rent for which he is jointly liable is only 32*l*., and therefore he is not qualified under the Registration Act, and he cannot unite these distinct modes of qualifying, so as to make up the amount required for qualification. The case of Gadsby v. Barrow (1) was a decision on the 20th section of the Reform Act, and this Court held that a tenant who holds under two different landlords two distinct sets of premises, the rent of each being less than 50*l*. a year, though they together amount to that sum, is not, under that section, entitled to a vote for the county. The only difference between that case and the present is this, that there were different landlords, whereas here both properties are held under the same landlord. The principle on which that case was decided equally applies to the present, namely, that the statute requires the claimant to be liable to a single rent of sufficient value.

Hannen (Underdown with him), for the respondent. — Where the holdings are under the same landlord there can be no reason why the two may not be tacked together so as to make up the necessary qualifying amount of rent. The case of Gadsby v. Barrow (1) is very different, as there the holdings were under different landlords; but where the two holdings are under the same landlord, it has never yet been decided, that if the voter is liable to pay that landlord, under such holdings, 50*l*. a year, he is not qualified under the Reform Act. The legislature has not said there must be a single rental—Elliott on Registration, 2nd edit. pp. 122—124. It has been decided, under a local act, which required the qualification for vestrymen to be “householders rated to the poor-rate on an annual rental of not less than 40*l*., that the rental might be made up of tenements separately held—The King v. the Churchwardens of St. Pancras (2). The 73rd section of the Registration Act was intended to enlarge the franchise in the event of the tenant holding the qualifying property jointly with others. The test intended by the legislature as to whether the party is fit to be intrusted with the franchise is, whether he is a man of that substance and character that a landlord will trust him with lands or tenements of the annual value of 50*l*. It cannot matter for this purpose whether the landlord lets him part at one time and part at another time, or part to him solely and part jointly with another, if the aggregate value of the rentals payable by him to such landlord be not less than 50*l*. a year.

R. Bourke was not heard in reply.

ERLE, C.J.—I think that the decision of the revising barrister in this case was wrong. The qualification given under the Reform Act is a yearly rent of not less than 50*l*. The claimant pays, in respect of what he occupies as sole tenant, a rent of 40*l*., and he cannot qualify without the aid of the Registration Act, 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. s. 73, which provides for the qualification of persons occupying jointly. The words which give that qualification are precisely limited, and I do not feel myself at liberty to say that there is any qualification which is not to be found in the words of the enactment. That section enacts that “where any such lands and tenements shall be jointly rented and occupied by more persons than one, each of such joint occupiers shall be entitled to be registered and vote in such election, as last aforesaid, in respect of the lands and tenements so jointly rented and occupied, in case the yearly rent for which they shall be bond sine liable in respect of such lands and tenements shall be of an amount which, when divided by the number of such occupiers, shall give a bond sine rent of not less than 50*l.* for each and every such occupier, but not otherwise." Now the claimant occupied, jointly with his father, a tenement, for which they were jointly liable to a yearly rent of 64*l.*, and the claim is to add 10*l.* of the jointly-occupied premises to 40*l.* of the separately-occupied premises, and so to make up the 50*l.* But the words of the statute do not authorize the junction of these two rents. If he claims under the qualification given to the joint occupants, he must shew a joint occupation giving to each of the joint occupiers a rent of not less than 50*l.*, and the statute says he shall not otherwise be qualified. I do not pretend to fathom the intention of the legislature further than the clear words of the enactment guide me. The first statute says, if you are a tenant for 50*l.* you may vote; the second says, if you are a joint tenant, and hold 100*l.* jointly with another person, then each of you may vote; but unless the joint holding is such as to give each joint holder 50*l.*, then there is no qualification. It may be that the difficulty of adding the separate rent to the apportionment of rent under a joint tenancy might be expected to create confusion; but I do not pretend to fathom the intentions of the legislature. It seems to me that this claimant is not qualified under either of the statutes, and that the revising barrister's decision is wrong, and must be reversed.

WILLIAMS, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. It seems to me impossible to come to any other conclusion upon the language employed in the 73rd section of the Registration Act.

1865. } FREEMAN, appellant,
Jan. 17. } v. GAINSFORD, respondent.

Parliament—County Vote—Qualification—Freehold Shares in a Music Hall—Interest in Land.

Shareholders of a freehold music hall, who were thereby qualified to be on the register of county voters, vested the fee of the hall by deed in trustees, who were to manage the hall and pay to the shareholders proportionate sums out of the profits:—Held, on the authority of Bennett v. Blain (1), that the shareholders had, after the execution of such deed, no direct interest in the land, but only a right to a share of the profits, and were therefore not entitled to vote as freeholders.

This was a consolidated appeal from the decision of one of the Revising Barristers appointed to revise the list of voters for the West Riding of the county of York.

Thomas Hadfield objected to Charles Stanley as not having been entitled on the last day of July 1864. to have his name retained on the list of voters for the township of Sheffield in and for the West Riding. The name stood on the copy of the register relating to the township of Sheffield as follows:

Christian Name.	Place of Abode.	Nature of Qualification.	Place in Township.
Charles Stanley.	31, Throgmorton Street, London.	Freehold Shares.	Music Hall, Surry Street.

By a deed, made on the 2nd of October 1828, certain persons became entitled to undivided freehold shares in the Sheffield Music Hall, and claimed to be on the register of voters, and it was admitted that the provisions of that deed were such as to qualify them to be there. A subsequent deed, dated the 13th of June 1864, was prepared, a copy of which was appended to and was to be read and taken as part of this case.

(1) 15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 518; a.c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 63.

It was agreed that the income received by the claimant, and by each of the other four claimants, is in annual amount sufficient to qualify, if the Court should be of opinion that he and they are in other respects qualified and entitled to remain on the register. This deed was, previous to the 31st of July last, executed by but 32 of the proprietors of shares in the music hall, they being proprietors of 110 out of the whole 184 shares. There are 25 other proprietors by whom it was not then executed: by some small number of whom it has since been executed. The present claimant and the four other claimants had, however, all executed this deed previous to the 31st of July last, as also had all the new trustees.

It was contended, for the claimant, that the second deed of the 13th of June last had not yet come into operation so as to constitute a new body of trustees; and inasmuch as 25 proprietors, representing the 74-184th shares, have not yet executed the deed, that until the whole had signed no trustees thereunder are effectually appointed, and the rights of those who have not are not affected by its provisions. It was also urged that the said deed could not operate in any way until it had been executed by all the shareholders, and that the only deed before the Court was the original deed of 1828.

It was also argued, on behalf of the claimant, that even if the effect of the deed of the 13th of June was to create a body of trustees for the purposes therein named, such creation would not destroy the equitable freehold interests of the claimant and his co-proprietors in the music hall.

For the respondent, it was argued that the proprietors, being resident in various distant places, and inasmuch as it would, in all probability, be long before the deed of 1864 could be executed by all of them, clause 32 of that deed was inserted for the very purpose of making the deed valid and effectual as to the shares of those who from time to time executed it, even although not executed by all of the proprietors, but that all the present claimants had executed the deed of 1864, and that their shares were therefore liable to the operation of it; that each proprietor of an undivided 184th share was competent to execute the deed declaring trusts respecting his share, and that, on the execution of such deed, his share would be liable to such trusts; that what one could do without the concurrence of any intermediate number of proprietors, he could do without the concurrence of all, and bind his own shares as effectually as all the shares would be bound by the execution of all; and that in this instance a majority of the shareholders holding a majority of the shares, and all the new trustees, had executed the deed of 1864, and they had therefore practically the power and control in their hands.

Under the circumstances the Revising Barrister was of opinion that the claimant ought not to have been on the register, and expunged his vote. If the Court should be of opinion that the said Charles Stanley and the other claimants were not disqualified under the provisions of the said deed of the 13th of June 1864, the register should be amended by the insertion of the names of the said Charles Stanley and the other claimants; but if the Court should be of opinion that they were disqualified by that deed, then the register should remain as amended by the Revising Barrister.

The deed of the 13th of June 1864 was made between the proprietors of the music hall, whose names and seals were affixed, of the first part, and certain persons therein mentioned, who were the trustees, of the second part; and,—after reciting the deed of October 1828 vesting the fee of the music hall in one Offley Shore, as trustee for the proprietors, and a subsequent mortgage for 2,500*l.* under the powers of that deed, and which mortgage debt had become ultimately assigned to Marcus Smith and James Henry Barber,—contained a mutual agreement between the parties thereto, that the said music hall, land and hereditaments, and the shares, estates and interests therein of the parties of the first part, and which said hereditaments were thereafter referred to by the designation of “the Sheffield Music Hall,” should be governed by the rules thereafter appearing numbered 1 to 33.

The following are the material rules:

1. The parties hereto of the second part, their heirs, assigns and successors in office, shall be trustees of the Sheffield Music Hall, and shall have the several powers hereinafter appearing and distinguished by the letters A. to L.:

A. To vest or cause to be vested the fee-simple and inheritance of the Sheffield Music Hall in themselves or any of their body for the time being or in such person or persons as the trustees shall think proper.

B. To give directions to the said Offley Shore, his heirs and assigns, or other the person or persons for the time being entitled to the fee-simple and inheritance of the said Sheffield Music Hall, and to the said Marcus Smith and James Henry Barber, or their executors, administrators and assigns, or other the person or persons for the time being entitled to the term of years mentioned in the said indenture of the 26th day of August 1853, with regard to any lease, mortgage, sale, agreement, deed, conveyance or assurance, action, suit or other proceeding, matter or thing which the trustees may think it proper that the persons receiving such directions should make, begin, do, or concur in.

C. To grant or cause to be granted any lease, or create any tenancy for any period not exceeding a tenancy from year to year, and subject to any provision.

D. With such consent as is mentioned in rule 7, to grant or cause to be granted any lease, or create any tenancy for any period exceeding a tenancy from year to year.

E. With such consent as aforesaid to enlarge or alter the existing buildings, and to acquire any additional land, buildings, easements or rights.

F. To pay off, transfer, or otherwise deal with any mortgage for the time being existing, or to make, or cause to be made, any new mortgage either in fee or for any term of years, or otherwise, for any sum or sums not exceeding the amount of such existing mortgage.

G. With such consent as aforesaid to make, or cause to be made, any new mortgage either in fee or for any term of years, or otherwise, for any money exceeding 2,500*l.*, or other existing principal mortgage-money.

H. With such consent as aforesaid to sell.

I. To execute, and cause to be executed, such agreements, mortgages, conveyances, deeds and assurances, as they shall think proper, and to receive or direct the payment or receipt of any money, and generally to do all acts necessary for effectually exercising the foregoing powers, or any of them, and especially to confer on any mortgagee or mortgagees any powers of sale or lease or other powers, and upon any sale to make any reservations, especially with regard to minerals or easements.

J. Generally in all matters not hereinbefore specified to deal with and manage the Sheffield Music Hall, as if the trustees were the absolute beneficial owners thereof.

K. To receive the rents and annual profits, and all income and capital monies arising from the Sheffield Music Hall, or the exercise of the powers aforesaid.

L. To make from time to time by-laws for regulating their proceedings as amongst themselves, and especially to name a quorum for meetings of their own body.

4. In confirmation and extension, but by no means in curtailment, of the powers and privileges arising expressly under the wording of these presents, the trustees shall be entitled to all powers and privileges incident to their office, especially under the provisions of the 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35. and 24 Vict. c. 145.

5. Out of the rents and annual profits, and money in the nature of income and not capital, the trustees shall annually, or oftener if they think proper, declare a dividend and such dividend shall be divided amongst the proprietors, according to their respective shares in the Sheffield Music Hall. The trustees may, from time to time, set aside such money (if any) as they shall think proper, as a reserved fund, to meet contingencies and in aid of future dividends, and such reserved fund shall rank as capital until it is otherwise appropriated. The reserved fund shall never, however, exceed 500*l.*; it may be invested by the trustees upon any securities allowed by law for trust-money, or upon mortgage of freehold, copyhold, or leasehold hereditaments, or upon the mortgages or debentures, or preferential stocks or shares of any municipal or other corporation or company incorporated by special act of parliament, and the income therefrom shall rank as income from the Sheffield Music Hall.

6. All capital monies from time to time in the hands of the trustees, and not otherwise applicable under the provisions of these presents, shall belong to the proprietors according to their respective shares in the Sheffield Music Hall and shall be accordingly divided amongst them as early as may be after the receipt thereof.

7. The several powers hereinbefore given to the trustees, and respectively distinguished by the letters D, F, G. and H, shall be exercised by the trustees with the consent of the proprietors, testified by the resolution of a special general meeting of them, or by writing under the hands of such number of the proprietors as shall represent two-thirds of the shares.

8. The said Offley Shore, his heirs and assigns shall not, nor shall the said Marcus Smith and James H. Barber, their executors, &c., nor shall any lessee, mortgagee, purchaser or other person, be bound to inquire whether such consent as aforesaid has been obtained by the trustees whose directions and receipts shall in all cases be as effectual as if they were absolute beneficial owners.

13. Every transfer inter vivos of a share or shares shall be in the form following, or in such other form as the trustees for the time being shall approve, and shall be signed by, &c. &c.

Form of Transfer.

"I, _____, of _____, being the proprietor of the share No. _____ in the Sheffield Music Hall, in consideration of the sum of £ _____ sterling, paid to me by _____, of _____, do hereby grant the same share to the said _____, his heirs and assigns, subject to the provisions of the association deed, dated the 13th day of June 1864, and to any rules in force in pursuance of such deed; and I, the said _____ do hereby accept the said share, subject to such provisions and rules.

"As witness our hands and seals this day of _____."

32. If all the proprietors of shares in the Sheffield Music Hall shall not execute these presents, the same shall, nevertheless, bind all the parties who do execute the same, and the same proportion of majorities of the parties who do so execute shall bind the whole of them as are hereinbefore appointed to bind the whole body of proprietors.

Cleasby, for the appellant.—The deed has not the effect of depriving the owners of their real estate so as to disfranchise them. It merely has the effect of creating a better management of the company. Here the shareholder has an equitable interest in the thing itself. The question will be, whether this case is within the principle of Bennett v. Blain (1). There the point was made and decided against the claimant, that the effect of the deed was to take away the interest in the realty. That case is distinguishable from the present one, for there the shares of the members were agreed to be considered as personalty, and the members had in fact no interest whatever in the land. In Myers v. Perigal (2), a bequest of the proceeds of shares in a joint-stock banking company, which possessed freehold and copyhold property, was held not to come within the Statute of Mortmain. But there by the deed of settlement the property of the company was to be deemed personal estate. Also, the deed could not come into operation until it had been executed by all the proprietors.

Hannen, for the respondent.—The legal estate was originally in a trustee with power to mortgage, and it was mortgaged; so that the legal estate is in the mortgagee. The nature of the interest will be what the cestuis que trust have agreed on. They cannot under the deed call on the trustees to hand over to them any specific part of the rents, but only their proportionate share of the profits. The only point of difference between this case and that of Bennett v. Blain (1) is, that the deed there contained a clause that the shares should be considered as personalty, which this deed does not; but that clause would not make them personalty—Watson v. Spratley (3). The 32nd rule renders the deed binding on all the shareholders that have executed it, and is an answer to the objection that the deed did not operate until executed by all the shareholders.

Cleasby, in reply, referred to Baxter v. Brown (4).

in principle from the case of Bennett v. Blain (1).

Decision affirmed.

ERLE, C.J.—I think the decision of the revising barrister ought to be affirmed. Looking at the provisions of this deed and of that in the case of Bennett v. Blain (1), it appears to me that the two deeds operate substantially to produce the same interest, that is, the interest in the profits which are made by the management of the concern; and I take the principle laid down by my Brother Williams, in Bennett v. Blain (1) to be sound in law, that under deeds like this the shareholder has no direct interest in the land, but only a right to a share of the profits. The point about the whole of the shareholders not having executed, I think, is not available for the appellant, because the 32nd clause has made a provision that the deed shall be binding on every one who executes it, which precludes the appellant from any benefit on that point.

WILLIAMS, J.—I am also of opinion that we are bound in this case by the case of Bennett v. Blain (1). The principle on which that case was decided is applicable to the present. That principle I understand to be, that the trust, on which the equitable claim in question is founded, gives no direct right to any portion of the receipts of the music hall, but only to a proportionate share of the profits. That is a principle that has governed a very long series of cases on a question of, whether this sort of property is real or personal estate within the Statute of Mortmain. On that principle all the cases have been based, and it seems to me that it is impossible to say that that principle is wrong.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I give judgment in the words of my Brother Williams, in Bennett v. Blain (1), where he says, "A shareholder in a company of this description has no direct interest in or right to any specific portion of the property of the company, but only a right to receive a share of the profits."

KRATING, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I am unable to distinguish this case

Nov. 23. } respondent.

Parliament—Borough Vote—Notice of Objection—Proof of Service by the Post—6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. s. 100.—Duplicate Notice.

Service of notice of objection, addressed to a borough voter, and sent by the post, pursuant to section 100. of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, is proved by producing a duly stamped notice signed by the objector, although it be headed with the word "copy"; such heading not vitiating the document as a duplicate, if in all other respects it corresponds with the notice left with the postmaster.

Appeal against the decision of the Revising Barrister appointed to revise the list of voters for the City of London.

Thomas Woodzell Booth, on the list of voters of the Livery of the Company of Distillers, objected to the name of Maurice Benesh being retained on the list of voters for the parish of St. Botolph Without, Aldersgate. The objector being called upon to prove that he had given the notices of objection required by the Registration Act, duly proved the requisite notice given to the overseers, as to which, therefore, no question arises in this case; and the person who posted the notice directed by the act to be served on the party objected to, produced before the Revising Barrister the notice duly stamped with the stamp of the London Post Office, of which the following is an exact transcript :

(COPY.)

"To Mr. Maurice Benesh.

"I hereby give you notice that I object to your name being retained on the list of persons entitled to vote in the election of members for the City of London. Dated this sixteenth day of August one thousand eight hundred and sixty-four.

"Thomas Woodzell Booth,

"12A, Manor Place, Walworth, S., (on the list of voters of the Livery of the Company of Distillers.)"

It was admitted that the word "copy"

(4) 7 Man. & G. 198; s. c. nom. Baxter v. Newman, 14 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 198.

on the notice produced before the Revising Barrister was on the notice before it was taken to and stamped at the post-office; and that the words "Thomas Woodzell Booth," subscribed thereto, were in the proper handwriting of the objector. An objection was thereupon made before the Revising Barrister to the reception of any parol evidence to explain the state of the notice retained by the postmaster to be forwarded to the address thereon; but he admitted the party posting the said notice to supply such explanation, and he proved on oath to the satisfaction of the Revising Barrister that the word "copy" was not on the notice retained by the post-office to be forwarded to its address.

The Revising Barrister thereupon held that it had been duly proved that the objector had given the notices of objection required by the Registration Act, and called upon the party objected to, to prove that he was entitled to have his name inserted in the list of voters in respect of the qualification described in the list, and on his failure to do so he was expunged from the list.

For the appellant it was, inter alia, contended before the Revising Barrister: First, that parol testimony was inadmissible to prove the contents of the notice retained to be forwarded by the postmaster, the same being a judicial instrument required by statute to be in writing, and which in this case, by the express words of the 100th section of the Registration Act, must explain and prove and be complete in itself. Secondly, that while the Registration Act allows a certain latitude in the forms of notices for counties and for claims and also of notices of objection to overseers in cities and boroughs, provided the words employed be "to the like effect" of the statutory form, it admits of no such deviation in the case of borough notices to be served on parties objected to; and therefore the notice now in question was not according to the form numbered (11) in the schedule B., in which the word "copy" does not appear. Thirdly, that a statutory judicial written instrument must be held in law to be what on the face of it it purports to be, and that, inasmuch as the notice produced before the Revising Barrister purported to be a "copy," it could not be adduced by its author as the original notice required by the act. That the word "copy" was not surplusage, because it was a term which assigns a distinctive and specific negative character to the document to which it is affixed, amounting in fact to a protest on the part of its utterer that, as against him, such document is not to be allowed to have the effect and authority of an original—not to have the effect, in short, in the present instance, of proving that the objector gave the notice required by the act without evidence of which the party objected to would not be in foro, or entitled to the costs of a groundless objection. That the notice was not the less a "copy" because the words "Thomas Woodzell Booth" were in the actual handwriting of the objector, inasmuch as it was as competent for himself as for any amanuensis to make copies of his own notices; and the case was likened to that of a foreign bill of exchange (which requires no stamp) if it bears the word "copy" on it before it is issued, and which would not become an original in the hands of an indorsee merely because the transcription was made in the handwriting of the acceptor. Fourthly, that if the notice left with the postmaster to be forwarded to its address did not bear the word "copy," it was not a duplicate of the notice produced before the barrister, and could not therefore be the notice required by the act.

On the part of the respondent it was contended, inter alia, first, that the word "copy" was not part of the contents of the notice, and might be treated as surplusage; secondly, that the notice was constituted an original duplicate by having been signed by the objector propria manu; and, thirdly, that it was proved that the alleged duplicates were essentially alike.

Hannen (Underdown with him), for the appellant.—The notice of objection is required by section 17. of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18. to be given to the party objected to. The ordinary proof of service was not given in this case, but the notice was sent by the post, and therefore the requisites of section 100. of that act ought to have been strictly complied with, and parol evidence as to whether the word "copy" was in the notice retained by the postmaster to be forwarded by him was not admissible by the Revising Barrister. The legislature only intended the postmaster to execute the mechanical office of comparing the notice and duplicate in order to see whether they corresponded with each other, word for word, and there is no authority to supplement the statutory proof with any other evidence. If the appellant is right as to this, then the word "copy" must be assumed to have been in what was forwarded to the voter, and consequently the voter had a right to disregard it, as he is entitled by the statute to receive an original notice. If, however, the Court are of opinion that such parol evidence was admissible, then the two documents were shewn not to be in all respects alike, and consequently not duplicates, as required by the statute. In Toms v. Cuming (1) the notice sent by the post was signed by the objector, and the duplicate by an agent in his name, and it was held that the notice was not proved by the production of the latter; and in Birch v. Edwards (2) it was held that the service by the post under this section 100. was not proved by a stamped duplicate similar in all respects to the notice left with the postmaster, save that it had no external address. These cases shew that to satisfy the statute, the two documents must be in such a state that the postmaster may use either as an original.

Fawcett, for the respondent, was not heard.

ERLE, C.J.—I think that the objection made to the notice of objection in this case cannot be held valid. The statute contains a provision for sending the notice by the post where the objector chooses to avail himself of that means, and in that case there must be a duplicate original kept by the objector, and a duplicate original sent by the post to the party objected to. Now, I think, if one notice was headed "duplicate" and not the other, and both in all other respects corresponded, there would still be a compliance with the statute. In common parlance, when there are two duplicate notices, one is called the copy of the other. In law, all notices are originals, and yet I am sure I have witnessed innumerable instances in which the server of a notice has produced a duplicate and said, "I served a copy of this notice on the other party." I think, therefore, that heading a duplicate original notice in this case with the word "copy" has not in the smallest degree affected its validity.

KEATING, J.—I am also of opinion that this is a good notice, and that the word "copy" has not at all vitiated it. The case Mr. Hannen has referred to of Birch v. Edwards (2) is one in which the Court held that the variance was very material, because what the Court really decided there was, that the external address was part of the notice; as soon as that was decided, an essential variance between the two documents was established by shewing that one of them omitted the external address. The external address might be very essential, and Wilde, C.J. says, in terms, the postmaster could only act upon the information given to him by the external address. It may be, no doubt, not only material but very material. It seems to me that the present case does not come at all within that principle, and that the revising barrister was quite right.

Decision affirmed, with costs.

Sunday Trading—Refreshment to Travellers—11 & 12 Vict. c. 49. ss. 1, 3, and 4.

The word "travellers" in the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 49, which prohibits the sale of refreshment on Sunday by persons licensed to sell beer or other fermented liquors "except to travellers," includes any persons who go abroad for purposes of business or pleasure, and who need refreshment.

As the exception is contained within the section of the act which creates the offence, the onus of shewing that the persons supplied with refreshment are not within it is on the informer.

June 17.* } EDMONDSON v. NUTTALL.

Action for Conversion of Goods—Measure of Damages.

The defendant had obtained a judgment in the county court against the plaintiff. At the time the judgment was obtained he had in his possession goods belonging to the plaintiff, which he had no right to retain. After judgment in the county court the plaintiff demanded his goods, which the defendant refused to deliver up. After the demand, the defendant issued execution on the judgment in the county court, seized and sold the goods in his possession, and applied the proceeds in satisfaction of the debt:—Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, in an action for conversion, the full value of the goods, and that the jury ought not to take into consideration, in mitigation of damages, the fact that the goods had been subsequently applied in satisfaction of the plaintiff's debt to the defendant.

This was an action tried, before Blackburn, J., at the last Spring Assizes for the county of York.

The declaration contained a count for the conversion of seven looms, the property of the plaintiff, upon which count the present question turned.

It appeared that the plaintiff had taken standing room and power for twelve looms in the defendant's mill, for which he was to pay 9½d. a week for each loom. The looms were placed in the mill; but the weekly payments having fallen into arrear, an arrangement was made that the defendant should take five of the looms in satisfaction of his claim. The other seven looms remained in the mill, and the weekly payments fell again into arrear.

On Friday the 29th of January 1864 the defendant obtained judgment in the county court against the plaintiff for 28l. debt and 11l. 15s. costs, on account of the arrears, and an order was made that this amount should be paid by the plaintiff on the Monday following.

On Saturday the 31st of January the plaintiff came to the mill with the intention of removing the looms, but the defendant made an excuse for not letting him have the looms on that day, and desired him to come again on Monday. The plaintiff came on the Monday, but the defendant refused to let him have the looms. On the following day the defendant caused the looms to be seized and sold under an execution issued upon the judgment of the county court, and received the proceeds.

The learned Judge told the jury that, in estimating the damages to which the plaintiff was entitled for the conversion of the looms, they might take into consideration that the proceeds of the sale had been applied in reduction of the plaintiff's debt to the defendant, and the probabilities at the time of the conversion that they would be taken in execution under the county court process. He also requested them to find the value of the looms, in case it should subsequently be held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover their full value.

The jury found for the plaintiff with damages one farthing, and they also found the value of the looms to be 35l.

Leave was reserved to the plaintiff, to move to increase the damages to 35l., if the Court should be of opinion that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the full value of the looms at the time of the conversion.

Overend having obtained a rule accordingly,—

Seymour shewed cause.—The plaintiff is only entitled to nominal damages. The looms would have been certainly seized. This is not unlike the case of Brierly v. Kendall (1). There the goods of the plaintiff were seized by the defendant under a power created by contract, but there was an informality in the execution of the power; and it was held that the plaintiff might maintain an action of trespass, but was not entitled to recover the full value of the goods. The recent case of Johnson v. Stear (2) affirms the same principle to the fullest extent. It shews that the real damage is to be looked to. In Chinery v. Viall (3) it was held, that where an unpaid vendor sold goods the property in which had been transferred to the vendee, the vendee in an action of trover could recover only the difference between the price agreed on and the value of the goods. If the plaintiff recovers the full value of these goods, he will in fact escape payment of his debt to the defendant. This transaction amounts to a re-delivery of the goods to the plaintiff, the proceeds having been applied to his use. — [He also referred to Cameron v. Wynch (4) and Mayne on Damages, p. 215.]

Overend and Row, contra. — The plaintiff is entitled to full damages. The case of Attark v. Bramwell (5) is very like the present. There the landlord, though entitled to rent, had distrained wrongfully, and was a trespasser ab initio. It was held, that the tenant was entitled to recover the full value of the goods distrained, although the proceeds were applied in satisfaction of the rent. Keen v. Priest (6) is to the same effect. There would be an end to all distinction between remedies, and creditors could take the law entirely into their own hands, if the doctrine contended for were acceded to.

WILLIAMS, J. — I am of opinion that this rule ought to be made absolute to enter the verdict for the plaintiff for 35*l*. The damages upon the count in trover, which was found for the plaintiff, were entered for a nominal amount, and the learned Judge reserved leave to the plaintiff to move to increase them, if we should think he was entitled to recover the value of the looms at the time of their conversion, and if the judge was wrong in telling the jury that they might take into consideration, in assessing the damages, the probability that the looms would be taken in execution, and so their value be lost to the plaintiff. I think the plaintiff is entitled to recover the full value of the looms, and that the jury ought not to have been told to consider the probability of their being taken in execution. The defendant committed a wrong by dealing with the goods in a manner which clearly amounted to a conversion. There can be no doubt of that. But it is said that the rule, which prima facie undoubtedly applies, namely, that the plaintiff in trover is entitled to recover the full value of the goods, is not applicable in this case, because the defendant can shew mitigating circumstances, which will justify the jury in giving a less sum.

The circumstances which the defendant relies on for this purpose are, that he caused the goods to be sold, and the proceeds to be applied in satisfaction of a debt due to him by the plaintiff, of which the plaintiff has had the full benefit; and that, therefore, inasmuch as the amount of debt cancelled is equal to the full value of the goods, and the goods would, in course of legal process, in all probability, have been seized and sold to satisfy this very debt, the defendant has really suffered only a nominal injury, and that he ought to recover only nominal damages. But I entirely deny the soundness of this reasoning. A man who suspects that his goods are about to be taken in execution, is fully entitled to remove them out of the way in order to apply them to any lawful purpose; and a creditor who has got possession of the goods of his debtor cannot apply them to the satisfaction of his debt; for if he might, why may he not also apply them in satisfaction of a debt due to his friend, who, he knows, is going to issue execution? In either case, it might be urged that the debt is satisfied, and the debtor not injured. This is likened to the case of a re-delivery; but it is no such thing. The Countess of Rutland's case (7) is, no doubt, an authority that, in an action of trover, a re-delivery of the chattel, though no answer to the action, goes in mitigation of damages. Moon v. Raphael (8) also shews that acceptance of the goods after action brought could be shewn in mitigation of damages. But those cases have no application here; for the goods never were re-delivered to the plaintiff at all. He never had the slightest power or control over them, nor were they disposed of in accordance with his wishes. They were kept from him, and were, in spite of him, appropriated to the payment of this debt.

It is urged that if we allow the plaintiff to recover full damages in this action, he will, in fact, get his money twice over; for that he will not only have the full value of the goods, but also the advantage of having had his debt cancelled. But that is not so; for when this judgment in the plaintiff's favour for the full value of the goods is recorded, the property in the looms will vest in the defendant, and there will no longer be any satisfaction of the plaintiff's debt to the defendant, who may at once issue fresh process upon the judgment in the county court.

I therefore think that the circumstances relied on afforded no ground for mitigating the damages, and the learned Judge ought so to have told the jury. The result is, that in accordance with the arrangement made at the trial, the verdict will be entered for the plaintiff for the full value of the goods converted.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. Ordinarily, in cases of this kind, the measure of damages is the full value of the goods converted, and the jury ought so to have been told, unless there were in the case some circumstances of mitigation which the jury ought to take into consideration. Such as if the plaintiff had a lien on the goods, as in Brierly v. Kendall (1), and the other similar cases which have been referred to. Or, as in Harvey v. Pocock (9), where the landlord, in distraining for rent, took goods which were not, in law, liable to be distrained. There the tenant who brought the action for illegal distress had had, in fact, part satisfaction by the return of the goods, and it might be used in mitigation of damages. Another case is that of an executor de son tort, who can set up the payment of debts owing by the deceased in answer to an action by the real executor to recover the assets. That is a very peculiar case; but I may observe, that there the act is done in due course of administration, and ought to have been done by the real executor, and the latter is only prevented from recovering the assets when they have been properly applied. Here the defendant at the time of the conversion had no right at all to the goods; nor any right to dispose of them; nor has he disposed of them in a way which can operate as any satisfaction of the plaintiff's claim. Subsequently to the conversion, the defendant acquired a right to the goods; but this is a right which he could not have exercised but for a wrongful act of his own in taking possession of the goods; and it would be against the plainest principle to allow a man to take advantage of his own wrong. As to there being a re-delivery, it would be contradicting the plain facts of the case to say there was anything like it. The defendant has here acted without the authority of the law, and much violence and illegality might occur, if it were left to the jury without any guidance by rules of law, to say, in each particular case, what damages the injured party had suffered. In conclusion, I would refer to the somewhat similar case of Gillard v. Brittan (10). It was there contended that in an action by the buyer against the seller of goods for wrongfully retaking possession of them after delivery, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover the full value of the goods because the buyer had never paid for them; and that the jury might treat the value of the goods retaken as a satisfaction pro tanto of the plaintiff's debt to the defendant. But the Court of Exchequer, for reasons which are equally applicable to this case, refused to accede to this contention, and held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the full value of the goods.

BYLES, J.—At first I entertained some doubts in this case, but they are now entirely removed. There is a great distinction between the re-delivery of goods to the owner and the application of them in a manner which may be to the owner's benefit but is not in accordance with his wishes. It is true the goods here have been applied in satisfaction of a debt due from the plaintiff; but then it is one which the plaintiff was unwilling to satisfy. This difficulty also occurred to me: that the defendant's debt was satisfied, and if the plaintiff recovered the full value of the goods he would be a great gainer. But that is not so, because the effect of our judgment will be, that the property in the goods is changed, and that the defendant can get fresh satisfaction of his claim against the plaintiff. I have no doubt whatever that the jury ought to have given the full value of the goods.

Rule absolute.

Nov. 17. } EICHHOLZ v. BANNISTER.

Sale of Chattel—Warranty of Title.

On the sale of goods there is a warranty of title, if the seller, at the time of the sale, either by words or conduct, affirm the goods to be his.

Where goods are sold in a shop, by a shopkeeper in the ordinary course of his business, such shopkeeper is understood by his conduct to affirm that he is the owner of such goods, and to warrant the title, and therefore, in case of defect of title and of the purchaser being deprived of the goods by the true owner subsequently claiming them, the money paid for the purchase may be recovered back from such shopkeeper.

This was an action brought in the court of record for the trial of civil actions within the city of Manchester, and which was tried before the Deputy Recorder of that city.

The declaration contained the common indebitatus counts, for money received for the use of the plaintiff, and for money paid; and the only plea was, never indebted.

The plaintiff claimed 19*l.*, as money received to his use by the defendant under the following circumstances: The defendant is a job-warehouseman, at Chorlton Street, Manchester, and on the 18th of April 1864 the plaintiff went to the defendant's warehouse and bought of him certain pieces of print, which the defendant represented as a job-lot just received by him. The following is a copy of the invoice which was made out at the time of the purchase:

" 20, Chorlton Street, Portland Street, Manchester, April 18, 1864.

" Mr. Eichholz Bought of R. Bannister, job-warehouseman. Prints, grey fustians, &c., job and perfect yarns, in hanks, cops and bundles:

" 17 pieces of prints, 52 yards, at 5½*d.* per yard . . . £19 6 0
1½ for cash . . . 0 6 0

£19 0 0"

The price, 19*l.*, was thereupon paid by the plaintiff, and the goods were afterwards duly delivered.

NEW SERIES, 34.—C.P.

The goods so bought by the plaintiff had, in fact, been stolen from the warehouse of John Krauss, by one Richard Aspinall, who was subsequently convicted of the offence; and the plaintiff, being ultimately obliged to restore the goods to Krauss, required the defendant to return the money he had paid for them. The defendant refused to comply with such request, and, therefore, the present action was brought.

At the trial, it was submitted, on behalf of the defendant, that the plaintiff could not maintain the action, as there was no warranty of title upon the sale in question. A verdict, however, was found for the plaintiff for the amount claimed, with leave reserved to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit, or a verdict for the defendant if the Court should be of opinion that there was no such warranty.

Holker afterwards obtained a rule nisi to that effect, citing Morley v. Attenborough (1), Crosse v. Gardiner (2) and Hall v. Conder (3).

C. Pollock now shewed cause.—This was a sale by the defendant under such circumstances as would amount to a warranty of title, or at all events, as would entitle the plaintiff to recover back the price paid for the goods, as upon a total failure of consideration. It is stated in Addison on Contracts, 5th edit. p. 224, that "wherever a man sells goods as owner, he impliedly undertakes and promises that the goods are his own goods, and that he has a right to make the sale and transfer he professes to make; and if he was not the owner at the time of the sale, and was not selling his own goods, but the goods of a third party, who subsequently claims them and deprives the purchaser of them, he is responsible in damages for the breach of such implied undertaking." In support of this, reference is there made to the French Cod. Civ. art. 1599. There is the authority of Mr. Justice Blackstone to shew that there is such implied warranty of title where the seller sells the article as his own—2 Black. Com. 451. Such, also, is the American law—2 Kent's Com. 478. Crosse v. Gardiner (2) was an action against a seller for falsely affirming that the goods were his own, and the action was held to lay on this bare affirmation. In Medina v. Stoughton (4) Lord Holt says, "Where a man is in possession of a thing, which is colour of title, an action will lie upon a bare affirmation that the goods sold are his own." Lee, C.J., in Ryall v. Rowles (5), referring to the case L'Apostre v. L'Plastrier (6) says, that it was there "held by the Court that offering to sell generally was sufficient evidence of offering to sell as owner." The decision of Morley v. Attenborough (1) was this: In a sale by a pawnbroker of an article described as a forfeited pledge, there is no implied warranty of an absolute title, for all that the pawnbroker undertakes is, that the article so sold is a pledge, and irredeemable; but in delivering the judgment of the Court in that case Lord Wensleydale said, "We do not suppose that there would be any doubt if the articles are bought in a shop professedly carried on for the sale of goods, that the shopkeeper must be considered as warranting that those who purchase will have a good title to keep the goods purchased." The case of Chapman v. Speller (7) does not militate against the plaintiff, as there the articles were sold at a sheriff's sale, where it is always understood that there is no warranty of title. In Sims v. Marryat (8) it was not necessary to determine whether there was an implied warranty of title, as there was there evidence to satisfy an express warranty; but Lord Campbell states there are many exceptions to the rule of caveat emptor, "which well nigh eat up the rule. Executory contracts are said to be excepted, so are sales in retail shops, or where there is a usage of trade; so that there may be a difficulty in finding cases to which the rule would practically apply."

Holker, in support of the rule.—In the sale of a specific chattel, such as the sale was in this case, there is no implied warranty of title, and in the absence of any fraud or knowledge of defect of title the seller is not responsible—Chandelor v. Lopus (9), Noy's Maxims, c. 42. s. 209, Hall v. Conder (3) and Ormrod v. Huth (10). The case which is perhaps nearest to the present one is that of Springwell v. Allen (11). That was "an action upon the case for falsely and fraudulently selling a horse to the plaintiff as the proper horse of the defendant, ubi revera, it was the horse of Sir J. L. because the plaintiff could not prove that the defendant knew it not to be his own horse (for the declaration must be that he did it fraudulently or knowing it to be not his own horse), for the defendant bought the horse in Smithfield, but not legally tolled; the plaintiff was nonsuited."

[ERLE, C.J.—Is there any case in which where goods have been sold as if they were the vendor's own, it has been decided that the purchaser cannot get back the money he paid for them on its turning out that the goods were not the vendor's?]

In Waller's case (12), it is said, "If a man sells goods for money to be paid at several days, in such case although the goods be taken by one who hath right before the day, yet the seller shall have an action of debt in respect of the contract."

[ERLE, C.J.—That is not a decision, but only the dictum of a Judge,]

The case of Morley v. Attenborough (1) is a decision in support of the proposition, that on the sale of personal chattels there is no implied warranty of title. In Early v. Garrett (13), Littledale, J. says, "It has been held that where a man sells a horse as his own, when in truth it is the horse of another, the purchaser cannot maintain an action against the seller, unless he can shew that the seller knew it to be the horse of the other at the time of the sale." And in Ormrod v. Huth (10), Tindal, C.J. states, "That although the cases may in appearance raise some difference as to the effect of a false assertion or representation of title in the seller, it will be found on examination that in each of those cases there was either an assertion of title embodied in the contract or a representation of title which was false to the knowledge of the seller." All the authorities are collected in Broom's Maxims, 3rd edit. p. 718, and it is there said in the words of the judgment of the Court in Hall v. Conder (3), "Upon the whole, we may safely conclude that with regard to the sale of ascertained chattels there is not any implied warranty of either title or quality, unless there are some circumstances beyond the mere fact of a sale from which it may be implied." If that be so, can it make any difference whether the sale is in a shop or not? In almost all sales the seller sells the article as if he was the owner; and if the sale itself is not sufficient to raise the inference of such warranty being intended, the mere circumstance of the sale being in a shop ought not to alter the matter. With respect to the question, whether the money paid by the purchaser can be recovered back as on a failure of consideration, it depends on the first question, viz., whether there has or has not been a warranty of title, for if there has been such warranty, and the same has been broken, it is admitted that such action would be maintainable. In Morley v. Attenborough (1), Parke, B. says in delivering the judgment, "The purchaser may recover back the purchase-money as on a consideration that failed, if it could be shewn that it was the understanding of both parties that the bargain should be put an end to if the purchaser should not have a good title; but if there is no implied warranty of title, some circumstances must be shewn to enable the plaintiff to recover for money had and received." Indeed, if there was no such warranty, the purchaser got what he bought, and he took upon himself the risk of want of title.

ERLE, C.J.—I think that this rule should be discharged. The plaintiff has brought an action to recover back the money which he paid for goods which he bought in the defendant's shop. The goods were afterwards taken from him by the true owner, they having in fact been stolen; and this action is brought to have the price which the plaintiff paid for such goods returned to him by the defendant. The verdict was for the plaintiff, and this rule was obtained by Mr. Holker, to set the same aside and to enter a verdict for the defendant, on the ground that in point of law a vendor of personal chattels does not enter into a warranty of title, but that the purchaser takes them at his peril, and the rule of caveat emptor applies. The matter has been well argued before us; and I decide, in accordance with the current of authorities, that if the vendor of a chattel at the time of the sale either by words affirm that he is the owner, or by his conduct give the purchaser to understand that he is such owner, then it forms part of the contract, and if it turn out that in fact he is not the owner the consideration fails, and the money so paid by the purchaser can be recovered back. Lord Wensleydale, in Morley v. Attenborough (1), so puts the law as I now decide, and he there says, "We do not suppose that there would be any doubt if the articles are bought in a shop professedly carried on for the sale of goods that the shopkeeper must be considered as warranting that those who purchase will have a good title to keep the goods purchased. In such a case the vendor 'sells as his own,' and that is what is equivalent to a warranty of title." I think where the sale is as it was in the present case, the shopkeeper does by his conduct affirm that he is the owner of the article sold, and he therefore contracts that he is such owner; and if he be not in fact the owner, the price paid for the purchase can be recovered back from him. So much for the present case; but Mr. Holker has contended that he is warranted by the dictum to be found in several of the authorities, that there is no implied warranty of title on the sale of personal chattels. I advert to the following passage in Noy's Maxims, p. 209: "If I take the horse of another man and sell him, and the owner takes him again, I may have an action of debt for the money; for the bargain was perfect by the delivery of the horse, and caveat emptor." This at first sight would shock the understanding of ordinary persons, but I take the meaning of the principle which it enunciates to be that where the transaction is of this nature: that I have the manual possession of a chattel, and without my affirming that I am the owner or not, you choose to buy it of me as it is, and to give me the money for it, you the purchaser taking it on those terms, cannot afterwards recover back from me the price you have paid because it turned out that I was not the true owner. The case of Morley v. Attenborough (1) was decided on that principle. A pawnbroker in selling a forfeited pledge gives notice that it is not his own, and that his title is only a right to sell by the statute, and therefore in that case it was held that upon the real owner recovering the article from the purchaser, the pawnbroker was entitled to keep the money. So in Chapman v. Speller (7), where goods had been bought at a sheriff's sale, which were afterwards claimed by the true owner, it was held that the price paid for them could not be recovered back. That was because a sheriff when he sells under an execution gives notice to all who may choose to buy at his sale that they take what they so buy at their own peril. And in Hall v. Conder (3) there was a sale of a share of a patent right, and it seems to me, therefore, that the subject of the sale was not matter, but a right which had not any material existence, and that the patent right (which was all that was so bought) was there transferred to the purchaser according to the contract. In all these cases I think the conduct of the vendor expressed that the sale was a sale of such title only as the vendor had; but in all ordinary sales the party who undertakes to sell exercises thereby the strongest act of dominion over the chattel which he proposes to sell, and would therefore, as I think, commonly lead a purchaser to believe that he was the owner of the chattel. In almost all ordinary transactions in modern times the vendor, in consideration of the purchaser paying the price, is understood to affirm that he is the owner of the article sold. That is so put by Mr. Justice Blackstone, and is also recognized by Lord Wensleydale in Morley v. Attenborough (1). I think the proposition in the passage quoted from Noy's Maxims is merely a dictum, and has been always so treated, and though often repeated, I can never find more than a repetition of such dictum. The present case shews, I think, the wisdom of Lord Campbell's remark on the judgment of Parke, B. in Morley v. Attenborough (1), when he said in Sims v. Marryatt (8), "It may be that the learned Baron is correct in saying that on a sale of personal property the maxim of caveat emptor does by the law of England apply, but if so, there are many exceptions stated in the judgment which well nigh eat up the rule."

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. It has been stated over and over again that the mere sale of chattels does not involve a warranty of title, but certainly, such statement stands on barren ground, and is not supported by one single decision, and it is subject to this exception, that if the vendor by his acts or by surrounding circumstances affirm the goods to be his, then he does warrant the title. Thus, it is stated in 2 Kent's Commentaries, p. 478, "If the seller has possession of the article and he sells it as his own and not as agent for another, and for a fair price, he is understood to warrant the title;" but in the passage just before this it is said by the same learned author "In every sale of a chattel, if the possession be at the time in another, and there be no covenant or warranty of title, the rule of caveat emptor applies, and the party buys at his peril." With respect, however, to such distinction between the vendor's being in and out of possession, which is founded on a dictum of Holt, C.J. in Medina v. Stoughton (4) Mr. Justice Buller says that, in his opinion, if there be any difference, the case in favour of a warranty is strongest against the vendor when he is out of possession—Pasley v. Freeman (14). Lord Campbell was right when he said that the exceptions to the application of caveat emptor had well nigh eaten up the rule.

KEATING, J.—I also am of the same opinion. Whether the present case be an exception to the general rule, or form part of it, we do not controvert any decision nor even dictum, when we say that under the circumstances of the present case there was a warranty of title, because the goods here were bought in a shop and the seller drew up an invoice, in which it was represented that he was selling the goods in the ordinary course of business. There was, therefore, here a sale in a shop, which is mentioned by Parke, B. in Morley v. Attenborough (1) as one of the circumstances which would shew a warranty of title. We have been asked by the learned counsel for the defendant what, if any, is the distinction between a sale of goods in a shop and a sale of goods out of a shop. The distinction may certainly be fine, and there may be a sale out of a shop by a person exercising a right of ownership over the article sold in the same way as by a sale in a shop, but it is not necessary to decide that point, because here the circumstances of the sale were such as to shew that the defendant sold the goods as owner.

Nov. 21. } HARRISON v. BLACKBURN.

Bill of Sale—Assignment of Personal Estate—Term of Years—Possession to maintain Trespass.

B, who was yearly tenant of the dwelling-house which he occupied, being indebted to the plaintiff, executed a bill of sale, by which he assigned to the plaintiff "all the household goods, furniture, stock-in-trade and other household effects, and all other goods, chattels and effects in or about the said dwelling-house," "and all other the personal estate whatsoever," of the said B, with power to the plaintiff to sell the same in case of default in payment of the debt due to him from B, and to stand possessed of the monies to arise from such sale, upon trust to satisfy the expenses and debt, and to account for the surplus, if any, to the said B:—Held, that notwithstanding the general words used, B's term or interest in the said dwelling-house did not pass under such bill of sale to the plaintiff.

Held, also, that even if the term did pass, the plaintiff could not before entry maintain an action of trespass in respect of such dwelling-house.

Trespass for breaking and entering the plaintiff's dwelling-house and premises, called the Bull's Head Inn, and seizing and converting to the defendant's use divers trade and other fixtures and goods of the plaintiff, and ejecting the plaintiff from the said dwelling-house and fixtures.

Pleas—first, not guilty; secondly, a traverse that the said dwelling-house, fixtures and goods were the plaintiff's; and thirdly, leave and licence.

The action was brought in the Common Pleas at Lancaster, and was tried before Williams, J., at the Liverpool Winter Assizes for 1863, when it was agreed that the facts should be stated for the opinion of the Court in the following SPECIAL CASE.

Prior to the month of July 1863, John Battersby was tenant of the Bull's Head Inn, in the declaration mentioned. In the month of December 1861 the said John Battersby was indebted to the plaintiff, and on the 20th of the same month Battersby executed a bill of sale to the plaintiff, which was duly filed on the 3rd of January 1862. The said John Battersby was tenant from year to year of the said Bull's Head Inn, under the trustees of the will of the late Duke of Bridgwater, who were the owners of the Bull's Head Inn, his tenancy commencing in the month of November many years ago. On the 21st of July 1863 the said trustees distrained for two years' rent in arrear of the said Bull's Head Inn, viz., for the sum of 54*l.* 11*s.* 4*d.* On the 27th of July 1863 a sale took place at the Bull's Head Inn under the said distress, at which sale the whole of the movables, including furniture, stock-in-trade and tenant's fixtures, were sold and disposed of. The goodwill, if any, was not put up for sale, and was not, nor was professed to be, dealt with at the said sale. The sale did not realize sufficient to satisfy the arrears of rent and expenses. On the same day, viz., the 27th of July 1863, the said John Battersby signed the following memorandum, and gave up possession of the Bull's Head Inn and premises to his landlords, the said trustees to the late Duke of Bridgwater. The memorandum above referred to is in the words and figures following:

I, James Battersby, occupier of the house known by the sign of the Bull's Head, in Bedford, and all premises, buildings, stabling and bowling-green connected therewith in my occupation as tenant to the trustees of the late Duke of Bridgwater. This agreement, made this day, witnesseth that I do hereby give up peaceable possession of all the aforesaid house and premises this day into the hands of Mr. Richard Higgins, the agent of the aforesaid premises for the trustees of the late Duke of Bridg-water. As witness my hand this 27th day of July 1863. (Witness)

On the same day, the 27th of July 1863, the said trustees let the said Bull's Head Inn and premises to the defendant, at a rent of 20*l.* per annum, who entered into possession on the same day, and still remains in possession. His tenancy commenced as and from the 12th of May 1863, but the payment of rent commenced from the said 27th of July 1863. The plaintiff by himself and by his agent has demanded of the defendant possession of the said Bull's Head Inn and premises, and has requested him to withdraw from the same, but the defendant has refused so to do. The goodwill of the said Bull's Head Inn and premises is of no value whatever.

The pleadings in this action on both sides, together with the said bill of sale which was in the words and figures following, formed part of this special case.

"This indenture, made the 20th day of December 1861, between James Battersby, of Bedford, in the county of Lancaster, innkeeper, of the one part, and John Harrison of Horwich in the said county of Lancaster, common brewer, of the other part. Whereas the said James Battersby is now indebted to the said John Harrison in the sum of sixty pounds for ale supplied by the said John Harrison to the said James Battersby between the 1st day of January 1858 up to the date of these presents, and the said James Battersby has agreed to secure the repayment thereof in manner hereinafter mentioned. Now this indenture witnesseth that, in pursuance of the said agreement in this behalf, and also in consideration of five shillings sterling to the said James Battersby now paid by the said John Harrison, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, he the said James Battersby doth by these presents grant, bargain, sell and assign unto the said John Harrison, his executors, administrators and assigns, all and every the household goods and furniture, stock-in-trade and other household effects whatsoever, and all other goods, chattels and effects now being, or which shall hereafter be, in, upon, or about the message or dwelling-house and premises occupied by the said James Battersby and known as the Bull's Head, situate in Bedford aforesaid, and all other the personal estate whatsoever of or to which the said James Battersby is now and from time to time and at all times hereafter, so long as any money shall remain due and payable to the said John Harrison, his executors, administrators and assigns, by virtue of these presents (1). And all the estate, right, title, interest, claim and demand of the said James Battersby, of, in, to, or upon the said several premises hereby assigned or intended so to be assigned, together with full power and authority which the said James Battersby doth hereby give and grant unto the said John Harrison, his executors, administrators and assigns, at the costs and charges of the said James Battersby, his executors or administrators, to use the name or names and act as the attorney or attorneys of the said James Battersby, his executors or administrators, in or about recovering, receiving, obtaining and giving effectual receipts and discharges for the same. To have, hold, take, receive and enjoy the said premises hereby assigned unto the said John Harrison, his executors, administrators and assigns, absolutely: provided, nevertheless, that in case the said James Battersby, his heirs, executors, or administrators, shall, on demand made thereof in writing by the said John Harrison, his executors, administrators or assigns, well and truly pay or cause to be paid unto the said John Harrison, his executors, administrators or assigns, the said sum of 60*l.*, the said payment to be made without any deduction, then these presents shall be absolutely void, anything hereinbefore contained to the contrary notwithstanding. And the said James Battersby doth hereby, for himself, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, covenant with the said John Harrison, his executors, administrators and assigns, that he, the said James Battersby, his executors, administrators, and assigns, shall and will, on demand made thereof as aforesaid, pay or cause to be paid unto the said John Harrison, his executors, administrators, or assigns, the said sum of 60*l.* in manner aforesaid, without any deduction and without fraud or further delay; but it is hereby expressly declared and agreed that, after default shall be made by the said James Battersby, his executors, administrators or assigns, in payment of the said sum of 60*l.*, contrary to the tenor and effect of the before-mentioned proviso, then and in such case it shall be lawful for the said John Harrison, his executors, administrators or assigns, to sell and dispose of the same premises, and every or any part thereof, for such price or prices as can be reasonably had or gotten for the same; and to receive and take the monies to arise from such sale or sales thereof, and to stand possessed of such monies upon the trusts following, that is to say, upon trust in the first place to retain, satisfy and discharge all costs charges and expenses incidental to these presents, and in the next place to satisfy, pay, deduct or return unto the said John Harrison, his executors, administrators or assigns, the said principal sum of 60*l.*, and from and after full payment and satisfaction of such costs, charges and expenses, and principal sum of 60*l.*, to render to and account for the surplus, if any, of the money arising from such sale or sales aforesaid, unto the said James Battersby, his executors, administrators or assigns. And it is hereby lastly declared and agreed, by and between both the said parties to these presents, that the receipt or receipts of the said John Harrison for any money payable to him under these presents shall be a good and sufficient receipt and discharge to any purchaser or purchasers.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether, upon the true construction of the said bill of sale and on the state of facts above appearing, any right or interest in the Bull's Head Inn and premises, and the goodwill thereof, passed to the plaintiff sufficient to sustain the declaration against the defendants.

Edward James (Baylis with him), for the plaintiff.—The bill of sale passed the term in the Bull's Head Inn, which was then vested in Battersby; the words "and all other the personal estate whatsoever" of Battersby, "and all the estate," &c. of Battersby "of, in, to or upon the said several premises hereby assigned," being large enough to pass his interest in the Bull's Head—Ringer v. Cann (2). The surrender to the landlord had no operation, as Battersby at that time had nothing to surrender.

Manisty, contra.—No sufficient interest in the inn has passed to the plaintiff to enable him to maintain this action. The plaintiff never entered, but only demanded possession of the premises; he cannot therefore maintain this action of trespass—Litchfield v. Ready (3) and Turner v. Cameron's Coalbrook Steam, &c. Company (4).

[ERLE, C.J.—Williams v. Bosanquet (5) shews that the assignee of a lease may be made liable for the rent, though he has never entered and taken actual possession.]

That case is cited by Pattenon, J. in Ryan v. Clark (6), as an authority "that entry is not necessary to the vesting of a term of years in the lessee"; "though," says that learned Judge, "for the purpose of maintaining an action of trespass, the lessee must enter; since that action is founded on the actual possession." As to the necessity of such entry before bringing trespass, many authorities are to be found cited in Roscoe on Evidence, 10th edit. p. 608. Moreover, there is nothing on the face of the bill of sale in this case to shew an intention to pass the term, or anything more than the personal goods and chattels of Battersby; and in that respect it differs from the case of Ringer v. Cann (2).

Edward James replied.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the verdict in this action ought to be entered for the defendant. The plaintiff has brought an action of trespass for breaking and entering his dwelling-house and premises, known as the Bull's Head Inn, and he claims to be entitled to the term Battersby had therein as having been assigned to him by Battersby by the deed of December 1861; and the first question is, whether such term was assigned to the plaintiff by that deed. That deed recites that Battersby had agreed to repay a sum of 60*l.*, which was due from him to the plaintiff. It afterwards assigns to the plaintiff all the household goods, chattels and effects in or about the dwelling-house and premises occupied by Battersby, and known as the Bull's Head, "and all other the personal estate whatsoever of the said James Battersby," "and all the estate," &c. "of the said J. Battersby of, in, to or upon the said several premises thereby assigned." Now, I think that leads me to the conclusion that the parties to that deed intended that it should be an assignment of chattels, as ordinarily understood by that expression, and not chattels real. General sweeping words have been often held to mean only things ejusdem generis with those which have been previously specified in the deed, and here they are confined to chattels, strictly so called; and such, I think, is the meaning of the deed. It is not likely that a creditor would take an assignment of a lease, by which he would make himself liable for the rent; and, at all events, if it had been meant that he should take the term, it is very reasonable to suppose that the deed would have contained some express provision about it. This deed provides that in case of default by Battersby in payment of the debt, the plaintiff may sell the premises—that is, the things assigned—and receive the money from such sale, upon trust to retain and satisfy the expenses and debt, and to render the surplus, if any, to Battersby; but there is no provision for paying the rent, which ordinarily would have been the case had it been intended that the plaintiff should become assignee of the term. Rent is always due from the assignee of a lease because of the covenant with the landlord; and it is therefore reasonable in such a case as this, had it been intended to pass the term, that some provision should have been made for the payment of the rent out of the proceeds of the sale. The case of Ringer v. Cann (2) was a decision upon a deed, in which there were terms like those in the present one; but there are two strong distinctions between that case and the present, for there the assignment was for the benefit of creditors, and in former days the rule was for a debtor to assign in such case all his property, and in the next place, there the trust to sell contained a provision for the payment of the rent out of the proceeds of the sale. I therefore think the term did not pass under the general words in this deed.

I am also of opinion that an assignee of a term cannot maintain trespass unless he has actually entered on the premises. The law is so stated by Patteson, J. in Ryan v. Clark (6) and in Roscoe on Evidence. The mere assignment will prove the averment of the premises being vested in the assignee in an action on the covenant; but that, according to the authorities, is not sufficient, without actual entry, to enable the assignee to maintain trespass.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. No doubt, the personal estate of a person would include a term of years, whether such term was beneficial or not; but whether the term would pass under an assignment of the personal estate would depend on the intention of the parties, to be collected from the instrument. In Payler v. Homersham (7) the general words of release were restrained by the particular recital; and in Rawlings v. Jennings (8) the word "effects" in a will was restrained to articles ejusdem generis with those specified. The only difficulty I have felt has been occasioned by the case of Ringer v. Cann (2); but my Lord has well distinguished that case from the present one. I observe also that Parke, B., in Ringer v. Cann (2), refers to the clause as to the payment of the rent, and says that "it is not confined to the future, but applies to the bygone rent as well," and that "the provision enables the trustees to pay it, whether they take possession of the property or not." In the present case, if the intention had been to pass the term, the first directions of the trust would have been to pay the rent; but that is not so, and the plaintiff is to apply the proceeds to other purposes. There is also this further distinction, that in the case of Ringer v. Cann (2) growing crops were assigned, which made it more necessary that the term should have been also assigned. With respect to the other point, I overlooked at first the distinction between "ejectment" and "trespass"; but my Brother Keating has pointed that out to me, and that the objection against bringing ejectment before entry was obviated by the party defending being obliged to enter into an admission confessing the entry and ouster.

KEATING, J. — Not having heard the whole of the argument, I can only say that, as far as I have heard, I concur in the judgment of the Court as expressed on both points.

Judgment for the defendant.

Nov. 21. } MITCALFE v. WESTAWAY.

Deed, Construction of—Reservation out of Lease—Assigns—Easement—Licensee.

To trespass for entering the plaintiff's land, described as land on each side of a certain slip, the defendant pleaded that before the plaintiff was possessed of the land, in which, &c., a certain railway company were the owners in fee of the said land and slip, and that they demised the land in which, &c., "excepting and reserving thereout the said slip, and the dues payable for the use thereof, and excepting and reserving to the said company, their assigns, officers, servants and workmen, free access to and from the said slip, for the purpose of using and working the same or otherwise," and that the said company granted their licence to the defendant to work and use such slip, and the plea justified the trespass as being committed in the exercise of such licence:—Held, a good defence, as the reservation in the demise enabled the company to use the slip by themselves or their licensees, and the word "assigns" was not to be construed as limited to persons taking an estate in the land.

Trespass for breaking and entering land of the plaintiff, described as land on each side of a certain slip, and placing and keeping on the plaintiff's land, on each side of the said slip, divers tools, &c.

Plea—That before the plaintiff was possessed of, or had any title, estate or interest in the said land, the then Eastern Counties

Railway Company, now called the Great Eastern Railway Company, were and still are seised in their demesne as of fee of and in the said land, and also of and in certain land and premises called and used, and to be used as a slip; and being so seised they, by a deed made between them of the one part, and William Stephen Andrews of the other part, demised and leased the said land, in which, &c., to the said W. S. Andrews, to hold the same to him for a certain term therein mentioned, and not yet expired, the said company excepting and reserving out of that demise the said slip, shewn and distinguished by the letter A in a map or plan drawn in the margin of the said deed, and the machinery and apparatus connected therewith, and the site thereof, and excepting and reserving unto the said company, their successors and assigns, officers, servants and workmen, free access at all times to and from the said slip for the purpose of working and using, or repairing the same or otherwise, and which said deed was and is in the words and to the tenor following: "This indenture, made the 25th day of March 1856, between the Eastern Counties Railway Company of the one part, and William Stephen Andrews, of Lowestoft, in the county of Suffolk, Esquire, of the other part, witnesseth that, in consideration of the rent hereinafter reserved, and of the covenants, stipulations and agreements hereinafter contained on the part of the said W. S. Andrews, his executors, administrators and assigns, to be observed and performed, the Eastern Counties Railway Company do hereby demise and lease unto the said W. S. Andrews, his executors, administrators and assigns, all that piece or parcel of land, situate, lying and being at Lowestoft aforesaid, adjoining or near to the harbour there, now and for some time past used as a ship-yard, together with the buildings, workshops, sheds and other erections now standing and being therein, as the same are particularly delineated and shewn on the map or plan in the margin of these presents, and thereon coloured pink, together also with all and singular the rights, members, easements and appurtenances to the said piece of land, ship-yard and premises belonging, or in anywise appertaining, as the same are now in the occupation of the said W. S. Andrews, *except and always reserved out of this demise the patent slip, shewn and distinguished by the letter A in the said map or plan, and the machinery and apparatus connected therewith, and the site thereof, and the dues and payments payable for the use thereof, and except and always reserved unto the said company, their successors and assigns, officers, servants and workmen, free access at all times to and from the said slip for the purpose of using and working, or repairing the same or otherwise, to have and to hold the said piece of land, yard, erections, buildings and premises hereinbefore demised, or expressed and intended so to be, unto the said W. S. Andrews, his executors, administrators and assigns, henceforth for and during and unto the full end and term of twenty-one years, computed from the 25th day of March 1856, yielding and paying therefore yearly and every year during the said term the annual rent or yearly sum of 80*l*." by the quarterly payments therein mentioned.*

(The deed contained a covenant by the said W. S. Andrews to pay the company the said rent, also to build on the demised land and premises further buildings fit for a ship-building yard, and to insure and keep the premises in repair, and that the same should not be used otherwise than as a ship-building and repairing yard without the consent of the said company, their successors or assigns. There was also a proviso against the said W. S. Andrews being entitled to use the Lowestoft Harbour or works for loading or shipping materials (except for his own private use in the said demised yard), or for any other purpose than for launching or hauling up vessels from or to the said yard, and for the said W. S. Andrews to indemnify the said company against any injury occasioned by such launching or hauling up. And the deed further contained a proviso for re-entry by the said company for non-payment of rent or breach of any of the covenants before contained, and also a proviso for determining the said lease on giving certain notice therein mentioned, and a stipulation that if the lease should be so determined by the said company, in pursuance of such proviso, they should pay to the said W. S. Andrews, his executors, administrators or assigns, the amount of the working value to an incoming tenant, at the determination of the lease, of all workshops, sheds, erections, buildings or improvements which should have been erected or made by W. S. Andrews in the said demised premises in pursuance of his covenant.)

The plea then averred that the said company, before and at the said times when, &c., gave and granted to the defendant their licence and permission to work and use the said slip, and he at the said times when, &c., worked and used the same under such licence and permission, and the trespasses complained of were a use and exercise by him of the said right and power so excepted, reserved and given by the said deed. The plea then justified the committing the trespasses complained of for the purpose of using the said slip under the said licence.

Demurrer to the plea, and joinder therein.

Keane (Douglas Browne with him), in support of the demurrer.—The plea does not justify committing the trespass on the plaintiff's land on the ground of the defendant being a servant or workman of the railway company, and as such exercising on behalf of the company the right of free access reserved to them by the deed for the purpose of enabling them to use the slip; neither does the plea shew that any estate in the slip had been assigned by the said company to the defendant, so as to constitute the defendant an assign of the company within the meaning of the reservation, and as such entitle him to have free access over the plaintiff's land; but it only states, that the company granted to the defendant their licence to work and use the said slip; and it is submitted that a mere licensee is not entitled under this reservation to exercise the right of easement which is claimed over the plaintiff's land. The right of a licensee may be seen with reference to commons. In Com. Dig. tit. 'Common,' (F. 2), it is said, "But he who has common appendant or appurtenant for cattle levant and couchant, cannot use the common with the cattle of a stranger."—"Nor can he license his tenants at will to put their cattle there," citing 1 Roll. Abr. 402, l. 36. It is admitted that the company themselves, and the assignees of the reversion, have the right of access claimed in this plea. But that right ought not to extend to the licensees of the company, for they might license any number of persons, and the consequence might be most serious to the plaintiff and fatal to the enjoyment of his property if the right of access over the plaintiff's land could be claimed by every such licensee. The following passage in the judgment of Vaughan, C.J., in Thomas v. Sorrell (1), is quoted with approval by Alderson, B. in delivering the judgment of the Court of Exchequer in the case of Wood v. Ledbitter (2): "A dispensation or licence properly passes no interest, nor alters or transfers property in anything, but only makes an action lawful which without it had been unlawful." This subject is discussed in Whaley v. Laing (3), and in a note to Armory v. Delamirie (4). If this be so, then no estate whatever passed to the defendant under the licence granted to him by the company, and he consequently had no right to any easement over the plaintiff's land, and the plea is no answer to the action.

Bovill (O'Malley with him), contra.—The question depends on the construction of the deed set out in the plea. The reservation of the slip to the company would, without anything more in the deed, have carried with it all things necessary for the convenient use of the slip by the company. The exception is to be construed as a grant, and in 1 Shep. Touch. 89, it is said, "Touching things granted, these rules are first to be known: where anything is granted, all the means to attain it, and all the fruits and effects of it, are granted also, and shall pass inclusive together with the thing by the grant of the thing itself, without the words cum pertinentiis, or any such like words."—"By the grant of trees is granted withall (unless the right of cutting be restrained, and it may be restrained so as to preserve them for ornament, &c.) power to cut them down and take them away. By the grant of mines is granted the power to dig them, and by the grant of fish in a man's pond is granted power to come upon the banks and fish for them." In a note thereto by Mr. Preston it is added, "and he may justify doing so, but he cannot justify the digging a trench to let the water out to take the fish, for he may take them by nets and other devices; but if there were no other means to take them, he might dig a trench—Finch's Law, 63." The case of Dand v. Kingscote (5) also supports the construction now contended for, and shews that what is necessary for having the right reserved by the reservation is also reserved with it to the owner of the soil, and in Richard Liford's case (6) it was resolved, "that when the lessor excepted the trees and afterwards had an intention to sell them, the law gave him and them who would buy power as incident to the exception to enter and shew the trees to those who would have them, for without sight none would buy, and without entry they could not see them." To the same effect is 1 Wms. Saund. 323, note 6. Therefore, without the word "assigns," under the mere exception of the slip, all that would be necessary for the use of it by the company and their servants would pass; but the exception in this case goes further: it excepts and reserves to the company the dues and payments payable for the use of the slip, which necessarily contemplates dues and payments payable by other persons than the company, shewing that it was contemplated that the slip might be used by other persons than the company, and who would have to pay the company for being allowed by them to so use it. There is, lastly, the express reservation of free access to and from the slip to the company, their assigns and servants.

Keane, in reply, cited The Durham and Sunderland Railway Company v. Walker (7), The King v. Tardebigg (8) and The King v. the Inhabitants of Mellor (9).

(4) 1 Smith's L.C. 304, note, 5th ed.

This is an action of trespass on land, and the case turns on the meaning of the exception in the demise of the land under which the plaintiff claims to be entitled to the same. The demise is a demise by the Great Eastern Railway Company, excepting and reserving thereout a certain slip, and excepting and reserving to the said railway company, their successors and assigns, officers, servants and workmen, free access at all times to and from the slip for the purpose of using and working or repairing the same. Now the effect of such exception and reservation was, I think, that the slip was retained by the grantors and owners in fee simple, and that they were at liberty to make any use of it, by themselves, their servants or licensees, which they pleased. The company might so use the slip themselves or they might pass their interest therein for any part of the term demised to any person, who would then be an assignee thereof. The intent of the reservation was, I think, to enable the company to make the slip available for earning dues, or for being used in any other manner in which an owner might choose to exercise his right of dominion over it.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I should have come to the same conclusion if the word "assigns" had been absent from this part of the deed. The case of Harrison v. Blackburn (10), which we have just decided, is an instance in which a deed should be construed, not strictly, but according to the apparent intention of the parties. Now, in this case the company, who have been in the habit of receiving dues in respect of this slip and ship-yard, demise the ship-yard, excepting therefrom this slip, and they reserve to themselves, their assigns, officers, servants and workmen free access to and from such slip. It may be admitted that these words, "officers, servants and workmen," exclude a licensee, but they would be satisfied if the persons exercising such right of access were the officers, servants or workmen of a licensee of the company. It is plain that if the company lent the slip by assigning it to any one for a week, such assignee would be a licensee for that purpose, and his officers would be those of an assignee to which the reservation extends. Are we then to give the word "assign" the strict literal interpretation of only such persons as have an estate in the premises sufficient to maintain trespass, or are we to construe it as meaning those who have a right to use the slip, by which means the company are able to earn dues in respect of it? I think that the latter is within the true meaning of the deed.

KEATING, J.—It is impossible, I think, that the word "assigns" can be limited to persons taking an estate in the land; for, as has been pointed out by Mr. Bovill, the subject-matter of the exception is not merely the slip, but extends also to dues and payments payable for the use of the slip, and it is therefore clear that it was contemplated there would be a use of the slip by others than the company, and by persons who would render dues and payments to the company for the privilege of having such use. But if that be the case, then the construction which has been contended for by Mr. Keane would preclude the company from enjoying what they have by this deed expressly reserved to themselves, namely, dues for the use of the slip by persons whom they may license for such purpose, and who are not persons coming within the strict legal meaning of assignees.

HOBBS v. HENNING.

*Marine Insurance—Contraband of War

The declaration was on a policy of insurance on goods from London to a port not alleged to be neutral. It was in the usual form, and alleged a loss by a peril insured against. The defendant pleaded that the goods were contraband of war, and were shipped for the purpose of being sent to and imported into a belligerent port, and also that the ship was carrying goods and papers which rendered her liable to be seized, and that she was seized accordingly, which was the loss complained of; of all which the defendant, at the time of signing the policy, was ignorant:—Held, a bad plea, as, upon the true interpretation of the first allegation, it was consistent therewith that the ship was on her voyage to a neutral port, in which case there was no breach of neutrality; and that the allegation that the ship was carrying goods and papers which rendered her liable to be seized was insufficient, because it was not shown that the goods were the plaintiff's goods, or that he was responsible for the state of the ship's papers.

The defendant also pleaded, by way of estoppel, a judgment, by a foreign Court, of condemnation of the ship and cargo, in which it was found, as a ground of condemnation, that the ship was laden in whole or in part with articles contraband of war, and had them in the act of transportation at sea; and that she was not truly destined to the port of Matamoras, but to some other port, and in aid and for the use of persons then at war with the United States, and in violation of the law of nations; and that the ship's papers were simulated and false as to her real destination:—Held, that this judgment did not conclusively find that the ship had not sailed for Matamoras, or that she had deviated from her voyage, but only that the ultimate destination of the ship, or goods, or both, was some other port than Matamoras, and that upon this interpretation of the judgment the facts conclusively found were insufficient.

Held, also, per Erle, C.J. and Byles, J., that such a judgment could not be pleaded as an estoppel.

Declaration against an underwriter, on a policy of insurance made by him with the plaintiff, who was agent for Messrs. Weatherell & Co., on goods on board the Peterhoff, at and from London to Matamoras, with leave to call at any intermediate port or ports, valued at 600*l*. The perils were the ordinary perils, and a loss was alleged by a peril insured against.

Third plea, that the said ship, with the said goods on board thereof, did not sail on the voyage covered by the said policy, as in the declaration alleged.

Seventh plea, that the said goods were contraband of war, and were shipped by the plaintiff and the said Messrs. James Weatherell & Co. for the purpose of being sent to and imported into a port in North America, situate in a State then and now engaged in hostilities with the United States of America, and were liable to be seized by the cruisers of the United States as contraband of war; and that the ship in the policy mentioned was, during the continuance of the risk, and at the time of the loss, carrying goods and papers which rendered her liable to be seized by such cruisers; and that the said ship and goods were seized accordingly, which is the loss complained of; of all which the defendant, before and at the time of making the said insurance and subscribing the said policy, was totally ignorant.

Eighth plea, that before action brought the said ship and goods were, during hostilities between the United States of America and the Confederate States, seized by the cruisers of the United States of America, and carried into a port of the said United States, and such proceedings were thereupon duly and according to the law of nations had, that afterwards and before action brought it was duly adjudged and determined by a United States Prize Court, held at New York, in the said United States, and then having competent jurisdiction in that behalf, that the said ship was knowingly on the voyage aforesaid laden in whole or in part with articles contraband of war, and had them in act of transportation at sea; and that the said ship, with her said cargo, was not truly destined to the port of Matamoras, but, on the contrary, was destined to some other port or place, and in aid and for the use of persons then at war with the said United States, and in violation of the law of nations; and that the ship's papers were simulated and false as to her real destination; and thereupon it was considered and adjudged by the said Court, then having competent jurisdiction in that behalf, that the said ship and her cargo were subject to condemnation and forfeiture, and that the same should be condemned and forfeited accordingly, which is the loss complained of. And the defendant says, that before action brought all things had happened and all times had elapsed necessary to make the said judgment binding on the plaintiff, and to entitle the defendant to plead the same as an answer to this action; and the said judgment so pronounced was absolutely final and conclusive, and is still in full force and effect, not reversed, annulled or otherwise vacated.

First replication, taking issue on all the pleas.

Second replication, to the seventh plea, that the voyage in the declaration and in the policy of insurance mentioned was a voyage to a certain port in Mexico, to wit, to Matamoras, and not a voyage to any port in North America situate in a state then or now engaged in hostilities with the United States of America; and that the said ship and goods, while proceeding on the said voyage to the said port of Matamoras, were seized as in the declaration alleged.

The plaintiff also demurred to the seventh and eighth pleas.

First rejoinder—The defendant, as to so much of the plaintiff's first replication as relates to the defendant's third plea, says, that the plaintiff ought not to be admitted to take issue on the third plea, and deny the truth thereof, because he says that before action brought the said ship and goods were, during hostilities between the United States of America and the Confederate States, seized and carried into port as in the eighth plea mentioned, and such proceedings were thereupon had, and such adjudication made as in that plea mentioned, and that before action brought all things had happened, and all times had elapsed necessary to make the said adjudication binding on the plaintiff, and to entitle the defendant to rejoin the same as an estoppel to the plaintiff's said replication to the defendant's third plea, and that the said judgment was absolutely final and conclusive, and still is in full force and effect, and not reversed, annulled, or otherwise vacated.

Third rejoinder—And for a further rejoinder to the plaintiff's second replication to the defendant's seventh plea, the defendant says, that the plaintiff ought not to be admitted to plead the second replication to the seventh plea, because he says that before action brought the said ship and goods were, during hostilities between the United States of America and the Confederate States, seized by the cruisers of the said United States, and carried into a port of the said United States, and such proceedings were thereupon duly and according to the law of nations had, that afterwards and before action brought it was duly adjudged and determined by a United States Prize Court held at New York, in the said United States, and there having competent jurisdiction in that behalf, that the said ship was knowingly on the voyage aforesaid, laden in whole or in part with articles contraband of war, and had them in the act of transportation at sea, and that the said ship, with her said cargo, was not truly destined to the port of Matamoras, a neutral port, and for the purpose of trade and commerce within the authority and intentment of public law; but, on the contrary, was destined for some other port or place, and in aid of and for the use of the enemies of the said United States, and in violation of the law of nations; and that the ship's papers were simulated and false as to her real destination; and that it was considered and adjudged by the said Court, then having competent jurisdiction in that behalf, that the said ship and her cargo were subject to condemnation and forfeiture, and that the same should be condemned and forfeited accordingly. And the defendant says, that before action brought all things and times had happened and elapsed necessary to make the said judgment binding on the plaintiff, and to entitle the defendant to rejoin the same as an estoppel to the plaintiff's second replication to the seventh plea; and the said judgment of the said prize court was and is absolutely final and conclusive, and still is in full force and effect, and not reversed, annulled, or otherwise vacated.

There were also demurrers to the second replication, and to the first and third rejoinders.

The case was argued in last Michaelmas Term (Nov. 16) by—

S. Temple (Hannen with him), for the plaintiff.—The seventh plea is bad. The allegation that the goods were liable to be seized is immaterial; the policy would not be void unless the voyage was commenced or carried out with the fixed purpose of the goods being sent to an enemy's port. But the declaration alleges that the goods were shipped for Matamoras, and that allegation is not traversed. It is probable that the market at Matamoras attracted this with many other cargoes, and that it would ultimately be bought for the use of belligerents; but that is not such a purpose as is contemplated by the rule of law which avoids policies as above stated — Arnould on Insurance, s. 279 (1).

The eighth plea is also bad. The judgment of the foreign prize court is not conclusive, unless the grounds of the judgment are set out and they are sufficient — Dalglish v. Hodgson (2). Tindal, C.J. there says, "The general law upon this subject is well known, that the sentence of a foreign Court of Admiralty of competent jurisdiction is binding upon all parties, and in all countries, as to the fact upon which the condemnation proceeded, where such fact appears on the face of the sentence free from doubt and ambiguity. But it is at the same time well established, that in order to conclude the parties from contesting the ground of condemnation in an English Court of law, such ground must appear clearly upon the face of the sentence; it must not be collected by inference only, or left in uncertainty, whether the ship was condemned upon one ground which would be a just ground of condemnation by the law of nations, or on another ground which would amount only to a breach of the municipal regulations of the condemning country." In Bernardi v. Motteux (3), it was held, that in an action on a policy of insurance, a condemnation by a foreign Court of Admiralty was not conclusive evidence that the ship was not neutral unless it appeared that the condemnation went upon that ground. Moreover, the judgment is only conclusive as to the express ground of the sentence, and not as to any of the considerations which may have led to it—Christie v. Secretan (4), Calvert v. Bovill (5), Fisher v. Ogle (6). The case of Saloucci v. Woodmas (7), cited and commented on in 2 Smith's Lead. Cas., 5th edit. 691, has been relied on as an authority for the position that the sentence of condemnation must be presumed to be on the ground that the ship was lawful prize. But that position is contested by Mr. Smith in his remarks on that case, and it is shewn that the cases above cited are at variance with it. The allegation that the ship's papers were simulated and false as to her real destination cannot affect the shipper of innocent goods; Arnould on Insur. s. 264. The other side will probably rely on Bell v. Carstairs (8), Oswell v. Vigne (9), Bell v. Bromfield (10), Horney v. Lushington (11), Steel v. Lacy (12). But there is nothing in any one of those cases to shew that carrying simulated papers alone is a breach of neutrality. It is only evidence from which it may be inferred that the ship or goods are liable to seizure.

(1) The passage in Arnould referred to, speaks only of the violation of the laws of blockade.

(2) 7 Bing. 495.

(3) Dougl. 575.

Lush (Honyman with him), for the defendant.—The seventh plea is good. The several allegations of the plea must be borne in mind. Shipping contraband goods for a belligerent port is a breach of neutrality; Wheat. Int. Law, ed. 1863, p. 737; Kent's Com. 139, 142, and this is, in effect, what is alleged by this plea to have been done. By the allegation that the goods were "liable to be seized," is meant that they were exposed to an increased risk of capture, which is not covered by the insurance. The intention of the insured is important in considering the liability of the insurer. There is more than an expectation; there is a purpose that the goods shall be sent into a belligerent port.

[ERLE, C.J.—I understand the distinction between purpose and attempt, but how do you distinguish between purpose and expectation?]

If a man knows the purpose for which he is required to do a certain act, and he does it, he is a participator in the ultimate act also—The Gas Light Company v. Turner (13).

[ERLE, C.J.—There it is pointed out by Lord Abinger that the lease in question was alleged by the plea to have been granted expressly for an illegal purpose. The plea here does not go nearly to that length.]

The fair meaning of the plea is, that contraband goods were shipped for the express purpose of being carried into a belligerent state. That is a breach of neutrality, and exposes the goods to a risk not contemplated by the insurer. This view is supported by all the authorities—Lightfoot v. Tenant (14), Langton v. Hughes (15), Waymell v. Reed (16).

Secondly, as to the effect of the foreign judgment. The total loss here is the seizure—The Franklin (17). The proposition contended for is contained in the passage of the judgment of Tindal, C.J., in Dalglish v. Hodgson (2), which is quoted in 2 Smith's Lead. Cas. 692, and in which it is said that "the general law upon the subject is well known, that the sentence of a foreign Court of Admiralty of competent jurisdiction is binding upon all parties, and in all countries, as to the fact upon which such condemnation proceeded." Now, what is "the question upon which the condemnation proceeded" in this case? Clearly that the goods were not destined for Matamoras, but for a belligerent port. That was the very ground of condemnation.

Temple, in reply.

ERLE, C.J. now (Jan. 30) delivered the judgment of the Court (18).—The declaration is on a policy of insurance on goods from London to Matamoras in the usual form, and alleges a loss in the course of that voyage, by a peril insured against. The seventh plea alleges that the goods were contraband of war, and were shipped by the plaintiff for the purpose of being sent to, and imported into a port in a state engaged in hostilities with the United States, and were liable to be seized by the cruisers of the United States as contraband of war, and that the ship was carrying goods and papers which rendered her liable to be seized by such cruisers; and that the ship and goods were seized accordingly, which is the loss complained of; of all which the defendant, at the time of subscribing the policy, was wholly ignorant.

The demurrer to this plea raises the question, whether the facts alleged shew a defence, and our answer is in the negative.

The plea was probably intended to be a defence, on the ground of the concealment by the plaintiff of material facts, but we do not find sufficient averments to establish that defence, as we read the plea. We take it to be consistent therewith that the goods of the plaintiff were sent from a neutral port to a neutral port in a neutral ship. The allegation in the declaration that the goods were sent from London to Matamoras is admitted by the plea, and although we cannot notice judicially the situation of Matamoras, so neither can the defendant rely on its proximity to the Confederate States, or make any unfavourable inference therefrom against the plaintiff. If the goods were in the course of transport from a neutral port to a neutral port the better opinion (see the authorities collected in Ortolan's Diplomatie de la Mer, vol. ii. p. 181) seems to be, that war does not give to a belligerent any right to seize them on account of their quality (19). The allegation that the goods were shipped for the purpose of being sent to an enemy's port, is an allegation of a mental process only; we are not to assume, therefore, either that the plaintiff had made any contract, or provided any means for the further transmission of the goods into the enemy's state, or that the shipment to Matamoras was an unreal pretence. If the goods were in a course of transmission, not to Matamoras, but to an enemy's port, the voyage would not be covered by the policy, and that defence is raised in direct terms by the third plea. Here the allegation does not deny the destination to the neutral port to which the insurance relates, but introduces a purpose existing in the mind of the assured, after the termination of the voyage insured for, as to the ulterior disposition of the cargo and ship. It is consistent with that purpose, as here alleged, that the plaintiff made the consignment for mercantile profit, as the end to be attained by him; in other words, that he knew of an effective demand for warlike stores at Matamoras, and was induced to send a supply by the expectation of a high price, and that he expected that the purchase would probably be made on behalf of the Confederate States, and in that sense had the purpose that the goods should pass into those States. In this sense, price was the ultimate end which he purposed to attain, and Federal and Confederate were alike indifferent as means, provided he attained that end; and in a neutral territory he might lawfully sell to either. The distinction between a mere mental purpose that an unlawful act should be done, and a participation in the unlawful transaction itself, is made more clear by referring to the cases of Holman v. Johnson (20) and Lightfoot v. Tennant (14). In the first, the plaintiff in a foreign country sold goods to the defendant, knowing that he purposed to smuggle them into England, and in one sense, the plaintiff there sold them with the purpose that they should be so smuggled; but as he did not participate in any way in the unlawful transaction, the mere mental purpose did not avoid the contract of sale. In the second case, Lightfoot v. Tennant (14), the plaintiff sold goods to the defendant, to be delivered abroad, in order that they should be sent unlawfully to the East Indies. After a verdict for the defendant, on a plea alleging this fact, on motion for judgment non obstante veredicto, the objection was raised, that the mere mental purpose of the vendor did not avoid the contract of sale; but the objection was answered by suggestion of the fact that the plaintiff's participation in the unlawful transaction went beyond the mere mental purpose, that he was taken to be a party to the whole project, and to be acting in the execution thereof, in the sale which was the cause of action; and upon these facts the contract was held void.

(19) This reference is perhaps to the 3rd edition of M. Ortolan's work. In the 2nd edition the prohibited commerce is somewhat loosely described as "le transport chez l'ennemi des marchandises ayant un rapport direct aux opérations militaires," vol. 2, p. 166.

For these reasons we think the averment "that the goods were shipped for the purpose of being sent to an enemy's port," construing those words as we have done, is insufficient to establish that they were liable to seizure for a breach of neutrality.

The effect of the other allegations in the plea depends much on that which we have last considered.

If goods fit for immediate use in war, and therefore of the quality denoted by the term "contraband of war," are passing between neutrals, it seems that they are not liable to seizure by a belligerent. The right of capture, according to Sir William Scott's opinion, expressed in the case of The Imina (21), attaches only where they are passing on the high sea to an enemy's port; they must be taken in delicto, that is, in the actual prosecution of a voyage to an enemy's port. The liability, therefore, of these goods to lawful seizure, although their quality was such as might make them contraband of war, depended on their destination, and they were not liable unless it distinctly appeared that the voyage was to an enemy's port. The further allegation, that the ship was carrying goods and papers which made them liable to be seized, is immaterial as a ground of defence; for these goods are not alleged to be the plaintiff's goods, and the plaintiff is not shewn to be responsible for the ship's papers, nor for any other goods than his own; also, if the voyage was to a neutral port, and the law be as above stated, the facts alleged do not shew that the ship and goods were liable to seizure. Furthermore, the allegation that the ship was carrying papers which made it liable to be seized, is not strictly accurate in reference to the law of nations. The papers alone are not a breach of neutrality so as to work a forfeiture of the ship; they are only evidence from which a cause of forfeiture may be inferred; they may be evidence either of enemy's property, or of destination to a blockaded port, or to an enemy's port with contraband, and so be evidence on which the Judge may find a cause of forfeiture proved; but they are, in themselves, no cause of forfeiture. The language of Sir William Scott, in the case of The Franklin (17), speaking of simulated papers, and saying that "this fraudulent conduct justly subjects the ship to confiscation," must be taken with reference to the question before him, whether the ship should be confiscated as well as the contraband cargo; and his decision is in the affirmative, and rightly, if the shipowner was knowingly conveying contraband to an enemy's port, of which knowledge papers indicating a false destination would raise a presumption. These being the premises alleged in the plea, the allegation that the defendant was ignorant of them is of no avail. If the defence is, that the plaintiff has concealed a fact which he was bound to disclose, the plea should have been framed accordingly. As it stands, it shews no wrongful act on the part of the plaintiff towards the insurer. If the proper construction of the premises in the plea be different from that which we have come to, still the allegation of the defendant's ignorance of those premises would not make the plea a good defence on the ground of concealment. The insurance is against capture, lawful and unlawful; and the defendant, in order to discharge himself, must shew a concealment by the assured. Mr. Phillips (vol. 1, p. 531) says: "Concealment is where one party suppresses or neglects to communicate a material fact." It is quite consistent with anything appearing on this record that a letter from the plaintiff may have miscarried, or that the defendant may have remained in ignorance without any default of the plaintiff. The allegation, therefore, of the ignorance of the defendant is, of itself, immaterial, and has no effect in avoiding the policy; and the result is, that we consider the seventh plea to be bad.

We proceed now to the eighth plea, which, in substance, alleges that the ship did not sail on the voyage covered by the policy. The third plea pleads the same ground of defence, as a fact, in direct terms; the eighth plea pleads it by way of estoppel, setting out a judgment, in which the fact is supposed to be stated as a matter whereon the Court had adjudicated, and then relying on the judgment to estop the plaintiff from denying that fact. The same estoppel is the ground of two rejoinders to two replications, and the eighth plea and the two last rejoinders may be considered together.

The defendant, in support of these pleas, relied on the rule that sentences of foreign Courts deciding questions of prize are to be received as conclusive evidence in actions on policies, on every subject immediately and properly within the jurisdiction of the Court, on which it has professed to decide judicially—see the opinions of the Judges in Henderson v. Lothian (22); and he contended that the judgment, as pleaded, shewed that the voyage on which the ship was captured was not a voyage from London to Matamoras.

The plaintiff in answer contended, first, that the decision does not profess to decide the matter of fact on which the defendant relies; secondly, that if it had decided that matter of fact, still the decision could not be pleaded as an estoppel; and we are of opinion that the plaintiff is right. The rule making the decision of a Court, which creates the status of a person or thing, conclusive upon all persons as to the existence of that status, has been regarded as salutary. Sentences of nullity of marriage in the Ecclesiastical Courts, of forfeiture in the Exchequer, of settlement of paupers by the Quarter Sessions, and of prize in Prize Courts, are examples. In Hughes v. Cornelius (23) the rule was applied within salutary limits, where, in trover for a ship by the former owner, the sentence of a prize court was held conclusive to shew that the property had been changed. (See Doe v. Oliver (24), where the whole subject is fully considered with much learning and lucid arrangement.) But the rule making the finding of a Judge upon any matter of fact upon which he professed to form his judgment conclusive upon all the world has been supposed to be anomalous, and to produce pernicious results—see Lord Eldon's opinion in Henderson v. Lothian (22) to that effect. Also in Geyer v. Aquilac (25) Lord Kenyon speaks of the rule as a source of the grossest injustice. So in Donaldson v. Thompson (26), Lord Ellenborough, speaking of this rule, says, that the doctrine rests on a case in Shower (23) which does not fully support it, and the practice of receiving these sentences often leads in its consequences to the grossest injustice. We would further refer to the rule in Dalgleish v. Hodgson (2), where Tindal, C.J. says that the sentence of the prize court is not conclusive as to the ground of condemnation, if there be any ambiguity as to what the ground is. It must not be left in uncertainty whether the ship was condemned on a ground which would be justified by the law of nations, or on another ground which would amount only to a breach of the municipal regulations of the condemning country. Although these sentences must be received in evidence, still the precedents shew that they have been carefully examined for the purpose of seeing whether the matter of fact, in proof of which they are adduced, was clearly and certainly found by the Judge whose sentence is relied on. Bernardi v. Motteux (3) and Calvert v. Bovill (5) are two amongst numerous cases which might be cited to this effect.

We now proceed to examine the judgment set out in the eighth plea. The condemnation appears to us to have been for carrying contraband of war intended to be for the use of the enemy of the United States, and the sentence, so far from deciding that the ship with the said goods did not sail on the voyage from London to Matamoras, appears to us to express that she was on that voyage when she was taken. The first matter of fact found by the Judge is, that the ship was knowingly on the voyage aforesaid (that is, from London to Matamoras), laden with contraband. The second is, that the said ship with the said cargo was not truly destined to Matamoras, a neutral port, and for the purpose of trade and commerce within the authority and intendment of public law; but was destined for some other port or place, and in aid and for the use of the enemy and in violation of the law of nations, and that the ship's papers were simulated and false. If the Judge meant to find that the ship was not bound to Matamoras, but on the contrary to a port of the enemy, the finding would have been so expressed. But if he meant to find she was bound to Matamoras, not for the purpose of commerce with the inhabitants thereof, but for the purpose of such a sale or transfer there as that the Confederates should get the use of the cargo, all the words of the judgment have their usual meaning and effect. We have no jurisdiction to inquire into, nor are we at all considering the validity of the legal grounds of the judgment; our task is to ascertain what matter of fact the Judge found to exist. He may have considered that trading with the Confederates was not within the authority and intentment of public law, and was a violation of the law of nations, and that a voyage to Matamoras, in order that the plaintiff's goods and cargo should be transferred from thence to some port or place for the use of the Confederates, was a destination of the cargo for such port or place, and made it liable to confiscation, and that the papers were simulated and false because they represented Matamoras as the final destination, and concealed a purpose of ulterior destination.

By this examination of the judgment set out in the plea, we are led to the conclusion that the learned Judge did not intend to find as a matter of fact, either that the ship had not sailed on a voyage to Matamoras, or that after having so sailed she had deviated from that voyage. But on the contrary he condemned her as lawful prize, because she was in prosecution of that voyage, with an ulterior destination either for the cargo or the ship, or both, as above explained.

The judgment therefore does not sustain the inferences of fact which the defendant seeks to establish thereby, nor does it sustain his claim of right to prevent the plaintiff from shewing the truth in respect of this fact, and the plea is therefore bad. So far this is the judgment of myself and my Brothers Byles and Keating: the other answer to that plea is the opinion of my Brother Byles and myself; and my Brother Keating does not assent or dissent.

We are further of opinion that the eighth plea, and the same rejoinder as last mentioned, are bad, because the finding of a matter of fact in the course of the adjudication of a prize court cannot be pleaded as an estoppel, in the cases where, if adduced in evidence, the judgment would be received as conclusive evidence of the fact so found. Although the cases are numerous in which the evidence has been admitted, still there is no precedent for the plea of the fact as an estoppel that we have been able to find. The principle on which the evidence was held admissible is not clear. Lord Eldon, in Henderson v. Lothian (22), says, it was introduced at first against the insurers to prove the loss, and was afterwards used by the insurers for their defence. Lord Ellenborough, in Fisher v. Ogle (6), speaks of it as a matter of comity between the two Courts. Such evidence does not fall within any legal description of matter of estoppel, nor is it guarded by the safeguards against abuse which restrict matters of estoppel in respect of parties and of subject-matter. In Brain v. Jackson (27) Knight Bruce, V.C., gives an elaborate judgment on estoppel, and lays down the principle thus: "Generally neither the judgment of a concurrent nor of an exclusive jurisdiction is conclusive evidence of any matter which came collaterally in question before it though within the jurisdiction, or of any matter incidentally cognizable, or of any matter to be inferred by argument from the judgment;" and that a judgment is final only for its proper purpose and object. The admissibility of the judgments of prize courts upon matters of fact is not restricted within these limits; and although we are bound here to hold that they are admissible as far as the decided cases have established their admissibility, yet beyond that limit we would not go, and we consider that the attempt to use the judgment as an estoppel does transgress that limit, there being no precedent for it. In relying upon the absence of any precedent, we do not consider that this objection is confined to a matter of form; it restricts in some degree the tendency of such evidence to defeat real truth by technical proof, and it may have the effect of preventing the foreign judgment from being misunderstood or misapplied. If the judgment can only be adduced in evidence, and is not pleadable as an estoppel, the meaning may be ascertained by adducing in evidence the preliminary proceedings and other matters referred to in the judgment. In Bernardi v. Motteux (26) Lord Mansfield admitted a French arrêt, and expressed his opinion that the procès verbal, on which the judgment was founded, ought to have been given in evidence at the trial by the plaintiff to shew the meaning of the judgment; that is, to shew whether the Court intended to find enemy's property, and so to prove a breach of warranty of neutrality, or to condemn by reason of arrêt against throwing papers overboard. So in Christie v. Secretan (4), the Court by the special case had power to refer to the proceedings before the Tribunal de Commerce, and also to a printed copy of a treaty between France and America to shew the meaning of the judgment. So in Pollard v. Bell (28), the Court referred for the same purpose to judgments in the Tribunal de Commerce at Bordeaux, in the Tribunal Civil de la Gironde, and in the Cour de Cassation at Paris. So in Dalgleish v. Hodgson (2), the circumstances under which the ship entered the River Plate were admitted in evidence to shew the meaning of the judgment; that is, to shew whether she was condemned for breaking blockade, or for disobedience to municipal law of Brazil. These are the considerations which induce us to adhere to precedent, and reject the plea of estoppel. If the judgment here in question should be hereafter adduced in evidence in support of the third plea, it may be that it would be found to refer to pleadings and doctrines of public law, and to various classes and items of proof relating to acts and declarations of parties on board, and so forth; and if the judgment was given in evidence these matters so referred to therein might be also adduced in evidence, and might shew that the fact was not found by the Judge as supposed by the defendants. This inquiry would not tend to impeach the conclusive effect of the judgment upon the question of prize, but might prevent a mistaken assumption from prevailing over the truth. For these reasons we give our judgment on these demurrers for the plaintiff.

(27) 1 You. & C. C.C. 58; cited in Doe v. Oliver, 2 Smith's Lead. Cas. 428.

We consider the eighth plea open to the further objection that it does not plead the issuable fact in respect of the voyage, but the evidence which might prove that fact; it pleads the probans and not the probandum, but as this objection would not apply to the rejoinder to the replication to the third plea, we do not further advert to it.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

Jan. 13. } COX v. BOCKETT AND OTHERS.

Practice—Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, s. 7.—Plaintiff's Name and Abode.

Though it is a matter of discretion whether a Judge at chambers will order an attorney to disclose the name and place of abode of his client, under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, s. 7, the motives of the party making the application ought not to be narrowly inquired into; and it is not sufficient to deprive the party of his right to such information, that he will thereby be enabled to enforce some other right against the party whose name and abode he seeks to obtain.

Keane applied for a rule calling upon the defendant to shew cause why an order of Willes, J., at chambers, should not be rescinded. The order in question was made on the plaintiff's attorney, requiring him to give the name and place of abode of his client, under the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, section 7.

The plaintiff had made an affidavit that a writ of attachment had been issued against him by the defendants to enforce obedience to an order for the payment of costs in certain Chancery proceedings, and that one of the defendants had avowed that his object in requiring the plaintiff's name and address was in order to execute this writ. He relied on Harris v. Holler (1), where Patteson, J. refused a similar application on the ground that the object was to take criminal proceedings against the plaintiff. He also referred to Pearson v. Turner (2).

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that there ought to be no rule in this case. We are not to scan narrowly the motives of the party making this application. He has a right to know the name and place of abode of the plaintiff for the purposes of this action, and he ought not to be deprived of that information because he has also some right which that information may enable him to enforce.

WILLIAMS, J. concurred.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not at all mean to say that a Judge has no discretion in such a case, and it by no means follows that the decision of Mr. Justice Patteson was wrong in the case before him; on the contrary, I think a Judge at chambers ought not to allow himself to be made the mere instrument of bringing a man to answer a criminal charge.

Jan. 23. } FESSARD v. MUGNIER.

Debtor and Creditor—Composition Deed—Bankruptcy Act, 1861—Tender of Composition—Creditor abroad—Pleading.

To a declaration for a debt due on a foreign contract entered into with the plaintiff abroad, a plea of a composition-deed made and registered under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, whilst the plaintiff resided abroad, by which the defendant covenanted to pay a certain composition in the pound to his creditors on a day since passed, must shew that the defendant paid or tendered such composition to the plaintiff, notwithstanding the plaintiff was abroad when it became payable.

The want of an averment in such plea of payment or tender of the composition was held to be not cured by an averment that the defendant was always ready and willing to pay to the plaintiff the said composition according to the provisions of the deed, and that all conditions having been performed and all things having happened necessary in that behalf, the plaintiff became bound by the deed, as if he had executed the same.

Declaration containing a count on a foreign bill of exchange drawn by the plaintiff, at Paris, upon and accepted by the defendant, with counts for goods sold and delivered, and for money due for interest, and on accounts stated.

Second plea, stating a deed of composition, signed by three-fourths in number and value of the creditors of the defendant who had become bankrupt, made under sections 185, 186. and 187. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and that the further proceedings in the bankruptcy had been stayed in consequence of a resolution of such creditors, confirmed by the Bankruptcy Court, that the defendant's estate should be wound up under a deed of composition. The deed as set out in the plea was as follows:

"This indenture, made the 2nd day of April 1863, between James Julius Mugnier, of 10, Westbourne Grove, Bayswater, in the county of Middlesex, watch and clock-maker, a bankrupt, of the one part, and the several persons whose names and seals are hereunder subscribed and set, and all other persons who at the date hereof are respectively creditors of the said James Julius Mugnier, a bankrupt, of the other part. Whereas the said James Julius Mugnier was on the 17th day of March last duly adjudged a bankrupt; and whereas the estate of the said James Julius Mugnier is not sufficient to pay his debts and liabilities in full; and whereas the said James Julius Mugnier has proposed to pay his creditors a composition of 5s. in the pound on the amount of their respective debts, to be paid on the 8th day of May next, and three-fourths in number and value of the creditors of the said James Julius Mugnier have agreed to accept the said proposal and to execute the release hereinafter contained, and have agreed to sign a resolution to be passed at a meeting of creditors of the said James Julius Mugnier, that the estate of the said James Julius Mugnier ought to be wound up under a deed of composition, and to consent to an application to the Court of Bankruptcy to stay all further proceedings under the said adjudication: Now, this indenture witnesseth that, in consideration of the release hereinafter contained, he, the said James Julius Mugnier, doth hereby for himself, his heirs, executors and administrators, covenant with the parties hereto of the second part, and each and every of them, their and each and every of their heirs, executors and administrators, that he, the said James Julius Mugnier, will, on or before the 8th day of May next, pay unto each and every of them, the said parties hereto of the second part, a composition of 5s. in the pound on the amount and in full discharge of their respective debts and claims. And this indenture also witnesseth that, in consideration of the said covenant, they, the said several creditors, parties hereto of the second part, do and each and every of them doth by these presents acquit, release, and for ever discharge the said James Julius Mugnier, his executors and administrators, and his estate and effects, of and from all actions, suits, claims and demands whatsoever, which the said parties hereto of the second part, or either of them, now have against the said James Julius Mugnier. Provided always, and it is hereby agreed and declared, that these presents shall not extend to invalidate, prejudice, or in any manner affect any mortgages, charges, or other securities or liens which any of the said parties hereto of the second part may have upon any of the real or personal estate of the said James Julius Mugnier, or any bonds, bills, notes, or other securities given or payable by any other person, by way of security for any debt due and owing by the said James Julius Mugnier to either of the said parties hereto of the second part, but that all such several mortgages, charges, securities, liens, and also all such bonds, bills, notes and other securities, from third parties, shall be and continue available in the hands of the several creditors, parties thereto, holding the same, in the same manner, to all intents and purposes, as if these presents had not been made. Provided always, that if the said James Julius Mugnier shall make default in payment of the said composition on the said 8th day of May next, and such composition shall remain unpaid for the space of fourteen days next after that day, the release hereinbefore contained shall be void and of none effect. In witness," &c.

The plea then alleged that the said Court of Bankruptcy, after the said production, and after the making, of the said deed, and after hearing the defendant, and upon reading the affidavit of the defendant verifying the execution thereof, duly considered the said deed, and being satisfied that it had been duly entered into and executed, and that its terms were reasonable and calculated to benefit the general body of the creditors under the said estate, did order and declare that such deed had been completely executed, and also directed that the same be, and it was thereupon, registered with the chief registrar of the said Court of Bankruptcy. And further, that all the matters aforesaid happened before this suit, and that before and at the time of the happening thereof the plaintiff was a creditor of the defendant in respect of the sums of money and the causes of action herein pleaded to, within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. And also that he, the defendant, had always been and still was ready and willing to pay to the plaintiff the said composition or sum of 5s. in the pound on the amount of the said sum herein pleaded to, according to the provisions of the said deed of composition. And also that all conditions having been performed, and all things having happened necessary in that behalf, the plaintiff became, and was, bound by the said deed of composition as if he had been a party thereto and had duly executed the same.

Demurrer thereto.

Also replication that the defendant made default in payment of the said composition, on the said 8th of May 1863, and the said composition still remained unpaid to the plaintiff, and had never been paid or tendered to the plaintiff.

Rejoinder—That the plaintiff was not, on and during the said 8th day of May, and for the space of fourteen days next after that day, within the realm of England, but was out of the realm of England.

Surrejoinder—That he the plaintiff was a native of the empire of France, and that long before the accruing of the said debt in the declaration mentioned was and has always thence hitherto been resident and carried on his business at Paris in the said empire, and not in England; and that the plaintiff was not in England at the time of the contracting or accruing of the said causes of action, and that the said bill of exchange in the declaration mentioned was drawn by the plaintiff at Paris aforesaid, and the said accounts were stated for and in respect of the price of certain goods which were supplied by the plaintiff to the defendant; and the said goods mentioned as sold and delivered were also supplied and sent by the plaintiff from his said place of business at Paris to the defendant; and that the plaintiff was not in England at the time of the making of the said deed by the defendant; of all which premises the defendant had notice at the time of the executing of the said deed by him; and that the plaintiff had not notice of the making thereof at the time or on the said 8th of May 1863, or within fourteen days after that day.

Demurrer thereto.

Dowdeswell, for the plaintiff.—The plea is bad. In the first place, the deed contains a proviso that it shall not prejudice or affect any mortgage or other security of the defendant's creditors; therefore, in order to give effect to such a reservation, the deed must operate, not as a release, but as a covenant not to sue, and so it cannot be pleaded in the present form—Solly v. Forbes (1), Willis v. De Castro (2) and Price v. Barker (3).

[WILLIAMS, J.—The cases are reviewed by Turner, V.C. in Squire v. Ford (4).]

Secondly, payment of the composition was the act necessary to be done by the defendant in order to discharge him, and therefore it was incumbent on him to have averred in his plea that he had either paid or tendered the composition to the plaintiff. In the notes to Cumber v. Wane (5), with reference to composition-deeds, it is said, "Nor will the debtor be entitled to the benefit of it if he neglect to perform accurately what is to be done on his part. Thus he must tender the composition-money on the appointed day, for, as Lord Ellenborough said, in Cranley v. Hillary (6), the party to be discharged is bound to do the act which is to discharge him." It is not enough to aver, that the defendant was always ready and willing to pay the composition, the plea must shew either a payment or tender—Hasard v. Mare (7). Thirdly, it was the duty of the defendant to have sought out the plaintiff and to have tendered to him the composition, and the facts stated in the surrejoinder afford an answer, if an answer be necessary, to the rejoinder. According to section 340. of Littleton, with reference to feoffment in mortgage and the payment of the money to the feoffee at the day appointed, it is laid down that the feoffor is bound to seek the feoffee if he be then within the realm of England; and Lord Coke remarks thereon, that "if he be out of the realm of England he is not bound to seek him or to go out of the realm unto him; and for that the feoffee is the cause that the feoffor cannot tender the money, the feoffor should enter into the land as if he had duly tendered it according to the condition."

[WILLES, J.—That passage in Co. Litt. applies only to a person who was in England at the time of the contract and afterwards goes out of the realm.]

Yes—no doubt if the plaintiff had been in England at the time, and had afterwards prevented the tender being made to him by going out of the realm, the defendant would have been excused from tendering the money, because the plaintiff had by his own act disabled the defendant from making the tender in England; but where, as here, the debt is contracted abroad, and the creditor resides abroad, it is the duty of the debtor to pay the debt there, and he cannot in that case excuse himself from making the tender because the creditor is abroad. Shep. Touch. 8th edit. p. 378, is also the same as Co. Litt. as to the duty of the debtor to find out and pay his creditor wherever he be if extra quatuor maria. To the same effect is Haldane v. Johnson (8).

Tapping, contra.—With regard to the first point, the deed operates as a sufficient release, and not as only a covenant not to sue, there not appearing here to be any joint debtor or surety who was liable for this debt to the plaintiff. The case of Keyes v. Elkins (9) is precisely in point, and establishes the validity of this deed. Then as to the other objections, it is said the plea is bad, because it does not aver a payment or tender of the composition to the plaintiff. It avers that the defendant has been always ready and willing to pay it to the plaintiff, and although that is not an offer to pay, and insufficient in the case of a direct condition precedent, as said by Crompton, J. in Roberts v. Brett (10), yet the general averment at the end of the plea, of performance of all things necessary in that behalf, is sufficient since the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, s. 57.—Bentley v. Dawes (11). The onus is therefore on the plaintiff to shew in his replication that there has been a non-performance of such condition precedent.

[Dowdeswell.—The general averment in the plea is limited to the performance of all that might be necessary to make the deed binding on the plaintiff. It is quite consistent with this that the defendant did not afterwards tender the composition.]

At all events, the objection (if any) has been cured by the plaintiff pleading over. The passages from Sheppard's Touchstone and Coke upon Littleton shew that the duty imposed on the obligor to seek out the obligee is limited to where the obligee is intra quatuor maria, and in Cranley v. Hilary (6) Dampier, J. refers to the passage from Littleton as shewing that the obligor is bound to seek the obligee "if he be in England." The case of Haldane v. Johnson (8) does not carry the rule of law any further; and there is no authority for saying that if the creditor is out of the realm at the time of payment, the debtor is still bound to seek him out. Then the plaintiff's surrejoinder is bad as containing no answer to the rejoinder. The allegation in it, that the plaintiff was not in England at the time of the contracting or accruing of the causes of action, is immaterial. The time of payment is the material time—Rothschild v. Currie (12), which decides that the place where a bill of exchange is payable determines whether it is a foreign bill or not. Then the allegation that the plaintiff was not in England when the deed was made is also immaterial, for section 187. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, gives the binding effect to the deed only after registration; therefore the plaintiff should have shewn he was not in England at the time of registration of the deed.

Dowdeswell, in reply, cited The London Dock Company v. Sinnott (13) to shew that excuse would not do, but that the defendant must plead performance.

ERLE, C.J.—I think that judgment in this case should be for the plaintiff. The question whether the deed which has been pleaded amounts to a release or a covenant not to sue, it is not necessary to decide, because I consider the plea is bad for not shewing a payment or tender of the composition to the plaintiff. The plea states that the defendant was always ready and willing to pay to the plaintiff the said composition, but it contains no averment that the composition was paid at the time when it was stipulated to be paid, or anything equivalent to averring that it was tendered, but it only states that the defendant was ready and willing to pay it. We think that is not enough. The averments at the end of the plea of general performance of conditions only relate to such as are necessary to make the deed binding on the plaintiff as a non-executing creditor, but do not relate to conditions which may have to be performed subsequently to the deed having become binding on the plaintiff. Then, as for the excuse for not tendering the composition because the plaintiff was in Paris when it became payable,—I think the authorities establish that if the plaintiff was in England when the contract was made, and he had afterwards gone abroad, it would not have been the duty of the defendant to follow him out of the realm in order to pay or tender him the money. But here it appears that the contract was a French contract, made when the plaintiff was residing in Paris, and who was living there when the composition-deed was executed and registered. I therefore think that the plaintiff's absence abroad is no excuse for the Patent—Assignment—Registration—Account of Profits—15 & 16 Vict. c. 83. ss. 35, 42.

The executors of a patentee assigned the patent, and registered the assignment, but the probate was not registered until afterwards:—Held, that the assignment was good, and that the title of the assignee was completed in accordance with the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 83. s. 35.

The Court, in making an order for an account under the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 83. s. 42, will only direct an inquiry into the profits actually made by the defendant, and will not direct a general inquiry into any other damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff in consequence of the infringement.

The assignee of a patent is only entitled to an account of profits from the time that his title is complete, that is, when the assignment is completely registered.

This was an action for the infringement of a patent relating to the manufacture of a new kind of hat or helmet to be used in hot climates.

The plaintiffs claimed an account of the profits made by the defendants from the 5th of February 1864, and during the pendency of the suit, and also a writ of injunction to restrain the defendants from further using the patent.

The action was tried, before Erle, C.J., at the Sittings at Westminster, after last Trinity Term, when it appeared that the person to whom the patent was originally granted was dead, and that his executors had assigned the patent to the plaintiffs. Probate of the will was granted on the 3rd of December 1863. On the 5th of February 1864 the executors assigned the patent. On the 10th of April, probate of the will was entered upon the register, and on the 14th of that month the assignment to the plaintiffs was also registered.

The verdict was found for the plaintiffs, and an order was made by the learned Judge for an account to be kept by the defendants from the date of the verdict, without prejudice to any application for a further account which the plaintiffs might think fit to make.

An objection was, however, taken at the trial that the plaintiffs were not entitled to maintain the action, inasmuch as the provisions of the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 83. s. 35. had not been duly complied with at the time the executors assigned the patent to the plaintiffs. The learned Judge overruled the objection, but reserved leave to the defendants to move to enter the verdict for them on this ground.

Bovill (Nov. 5) moved accordingly.—He contended that the executors had no power to assign the patent until they had perfected their own title. The 15 & 16 Vict. c. 83. s. 35. provided that until the entry shall be made in the register, "the grantees or grantees of the letters patent shall be deemed and taken to be the sole and exclusive proprietor or proprietors of such letters patent."

Per Curiam (1).—Registration will complete an inchoate title. Upon this point there will be no rule.

Rule refused.

Aston (Nov. 25), for the plaintiffs, obtained a rule calling on the defendants to shew cause why the Master should not take an account of all profits made by the defendants by means of the infringement of the plaintiffs' patent, and why the defendants should not pay to the plaintiffs the amount of such profits, and why a writ of injunction should not issue to restrain the defendants from continuing to infringe the plaintiffs' patent. Against this rule

Murray shewed cause (Jan. 27).—He contended that there was no necessity for a reference to the Master, as the defendants were ready to produce an account verified by affidavit of the net profit on every hat or helmet made by them up to the present time. He also contended that the plaintiffs were only entitled to an account of profits from the 14th of April, when the title was completely registered.

(1) Erle, C.J., Byles, J. and Keating, J.

Hindmarch and Aston, in support of the rule.—The statement offered by the defendants is not sufficient. The mere profit and loss account of each hat may not nearly represent the injury inflicted on the plaintiffs. The defendants may have sold the hats at a cheap rate, for the express purpose of depreciating the invention. In Walton v. Lavater (2), the rule was drawn up on the principle contended for.

[WILLIAMS, J.—No such order was made in Holland v. Fox (3), or in Vidi v. Smith (4).]

The statement put forward is entirely ex parte.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that substantial justice would be done in this case if the rule were discharged. But precisely because it would be adopting the statement of one party without giving the other an opportunity of controverting it, I scruple to take this course. The rule must, therefore, be made absolute to refer the matter to the Master to take an account of the profits actually made by the defendants from the date of complete registration. The plaintiffs are not entitled to any other account than this, and, if they do not surcharge the defendants one-sixth upon the account produced, they must pay the costs of the inquiry and of this rule.

WILLIAMS, J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not apprehend that this Court in any way sanctioned the form of order in Walton v. Lavater (2). The motion was not contested.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. We do not at all decide that, if the plaintiffs had suffered damage by such conduct as has been suggested by the counsel who supported the rule, they could not recover compensation in the shape of damages; but that must be at the hands of a jury, and not by means of an account to be taken by the Master.

Rule accordingly.

1864. }
Nov. 30. } LEE AND ANOTHER v. JONES.*

Guarantie—Avoidance of Contract—Fraud—Concealment—Misrepresentation.

P. was employed by the plaintiffs, who were coal-merchants, to sell their coals on commission, on the terms that he was to be answerable for the price of the coals sent out to customers on his order, and to pay for them monthly. T. guaranteed the due performance by P. of his engagements to the amount of 300*l.* After some years, P., not paying for the coals supplied according to his agreement, and owing the plaintiffs, on the coal account, above 1,300*l.*, the plaintiffs required further security. P. having stated to the plaintiffs that the defendant would become surety for him, the plaintiffs prepared an agreement, which, after reciting the original agreement between P. and the plaintiffs, the guarantie by T. and that P. had for some time been salesman to the plaintiffs on the terms stated, and that in order to induce the plaintiffs to continue the arrangement with P. the defendant had agreed to guarantee, went on to provide that the defendant should give a floating and continuing guarantie to the plaintiffs for three years to secure the amount of any balance that might at any time during the three years be due from P. to the plaintiffs. This agreement was sent to the defendant by the plaintiffs, and executed by the defendant. It, however, did not recite that any debt was then due from P. to the plaintiffs, nor did the plaintiffs inform the defendant of the fact. The defendant made no inquiry of the plaintiffs. In an action against the defendant on his guarantie, he pleaded that the guarantie was obtained from him by the fraud of the plaintiffs, and by the fraudulent concealment by the plaintiffs of material facts:—Held, by the majority of the Court of Exchequer Chamber that there was some evidence, taking the circumstances of the case and the recitals in the agreement together, from which a jury would be justified in saying that the plaintiffs had been guilty of intentional fraudulent misrepresentation to induce the defendant to sign the agreement.

This was an appeal, by the plaintiffs, against the decision of the Court of Common Pleas, discharging a rule to set aside the verdict for the defendant, and to enter a verdict for the plaintiffs for 100*l*.

The action was to recover 100*l*. The declaration was framed upon an agreement between Charles Jones, the defendant, and four other persons of the one part, and the plaintiffs, Lee & Jerdein, coal-merchants, of the other.

The agreement, dated October 1861, commenced in the following terms: "Whereas James Packer has for some time past been a salesman of coals upon commission for the said Lee & Jerdein, he the said James Packer giving bills of exchange to the said Lee & Jerdein for all such coals as may be delivered to his order, such bills being floating bills, to be settled for and paid up at the expiration of the current months during which such bills are respectively running; and whereas the said Lee & Jerdein requiring security from the said James Packer, they stipulated (amongst other things) that the said Charles Jones" [and the four other persons naming them] "should give them a floating and continuing guarantee for the term of three years from the date hereof on behalf of the said James Packer, to secure to them, the said Lee & Jerdein, the amount of any balance which might at any time or times be due to them, the said Lee & Jerdein, from the said James Packer upon any such coal account on bills, to the amount of 300*l*., in the proportions following: the said Charles Jones in the sum of 100*l*." [it then stated the proportions of the other four sureties], "making together the said sum of 300*l*.; and in order to induce the said Lee & Jerdein to continue the said arrangement with the said James Packer, the said Charles Jones" [and the other four sureties] "agreed to enter into this agreement for guarantee in manner hereinafter appearing: Now this agreement witnesses, that in consideration of the said Lee & Jerdein agreeing to allow the said James Packer a certain commission upon coals, under an agreement between them, and bearing date the 1st of November 1856, they the said Charles Jones" [and the other four sureties] "do hereby severally and respectively guarantee, promise and agree to and with the said Lee & Jerdein, that they the said Charles Jones" [and the other four sureties] "shall and will pay and make good in the respective proportions hereinbefore mentioned, to the said Lee & Jerdein, or their executors, administrators or assigns, all such sum and sums of money as may be due and owing to them at any time or times during the said term of three years from the said James Packer, in relation to the said agreement or bills of exchange, not exceeding in the whole the said sum of 300*l*., such guarantee to be a continuing guarantee, and to be made good at any time by the said Charles Jones" [and the other four sureties] "for any balance or amount due to the said Lee & Jerdein in respect of the said agreement between the said James Packer and the said Lee & Jerdein during the said term of three years."

The agreement then further stated, that giving time to James Packer should not invalidate the agreement, and continued: "That this agreement is to be taken as supplemental and in addition to an agreement bearing date the 1st of November 1856, made between Sarah Tinson of the one part, and the said Lee & Jerdein of the other."

The original agreement between Lee & Jerdein and Packer, made the 1st of November 1856, stated that it was agreed that Packer should continue as agent for the sale of coals on the terms that Packer should obtain customers for Lee & Jerdein, and have coals delivered to his order, for which Packer was to receive a specified commission; and in consideration thereof that Packer should give bills of exchange to Lee & Jerdein, as security for the amount in value of the coals so to be delivered, the intention being that Packer should make himself personally responsible for the payment of such amounts to Lee & Jerdein; that the customers so introduced should be deemed customers of Lee & Jerdein, and all bills and accounts sent in to them as such. And it went on: "that all monies received by the said James Packer from any of such customers shall be so received by him as agent for the said Lee & Jerdein, and paid over and accounted for by him within six days after the receipt thereof by him; that such amounts so accounted for shall from time to time be taken off or credited upon the said floating bills so to be given from time to time by the said James Packer as aforesaid." The agreement further proceeded to witness that, in consideration of the commission, James Packer promised and agreed to perform and keep all the foregoing agreements and stipulations.

The agreement of the same date, the 1st of November 1856, between Sarah Tinson and Lee & Jerdein, recited that Packer was her son, that he was a salesman on commission for Lee & Jerdein, "he, the said James Packer, giving bills of exchange to the said Lee & Jerdein for all such coals as may be delivered to his order, such bills being floating bills, to be settled for and paid up at the expiration of the current months during which such bills were respectively running." It then provided that Sarah Tinson guaranteed that she would pay and make good to Lee & Jerdein "all such sum and sums as may be due and owing to them at any time or times from the said James Packer in relation to the said agreement or bills of exchange, not exceeding in the whole 300*l.*; such guarantee to be a continuing guarantee," &c.

The defendant pleaded that the supposed agreement and promises were obtained from him by the plaintiffs, by the fraud of the plaintiffs, and by their fraudulent and undue concealment of material facts within their knowledge, material to be made known to the defendant before he entered into the said agreement.

From November 1856 Packer had acted as agent for the plaintiffs, selling coals on the terms of the original agreement of that date; but he did not, for a long time previous to October 1861, pay the plaintiffs for the coals delivered to his order pursuant to the agreement, and in October 1861 was in debt to the plaintiffs, in respect of the coal account, 1,332*l.* The plaintiffs, on this, required from him further security, and he obtained the consent of the defendant and of the other persons mentioned as sureties in the agreement declared on to become sureties. On this, the plaintiffs caused the agreement declared on to be prepared, and sent it to the defendant by their collector, who had no authority to answer any statements respecting it. The defendant made no inquiry of the plaintiffs respecting the state of Packer's account, nor did the plaintiffs give the defendant any information respecting it. Nothing was stated in the agreement of guarantee executed by the defendant respecting the debt due from Packer to the plaintiffs, or respecting the state of the accounts or the course of business between them, except as is above set out. The case found that there was no evidence to shew that the plaintiffs were aware that Packer had actually received from the customers for the coals the monies making up the 1,332*l.*; and it did not otherwise than inferentially from the above statement aver that Packer himself had received the money. The defendant, when he executed the agreement, was not aware of the debt due from Packer to the plaintiffs.

On the trial a verdict was found for the defendant, Erle, C.J., before whom the case was tried, holding that there was evidence of fraud for the jury. Leave was reserved to the plaintiffs to move to set aside that verdict, and enter a verdict for 100*l.*

The plaintiffs having moved accordingly, the Court of Common Pleas supported the ruling of the Chief Justice.

The case was argued, in the Exchequer Chamber (June 18, 1864), by Collier (Solicitor General) (Prentice with him), for the plaintiffs, the appellants. —There was no evidence of any fraud on the part of the plaintiffs. There was no moral or legal duty obliging the plaintiffs to tell the defendant that Packer had not paid his bills monthly, and that they had not enforced their strict rights, according to the agreement between them. If the defendant wished for information from the plaintiffs respecting the state of Packer's account with the plaintiffs, he ought to have asked the plaintiffs. If he chose to trust to Packer's statement alone, or to make no inquiry at all, the plaintiffs ought not to suffer from his indiscretion. The plaintiffs ought not to be in a worse position because the defendant acted without due caution. Packer was not a defaulter in the sense of having received money and having not paid it over. He was a del credere agent.

The plaintiffs did not think Packer a defaulter. It may be that there was no actual default. It is not found that the parties for whom Packer was responsible had paid him. They may have all been solvent. The very fact of the plaintiffs asking for further security was enough to put the defendant upon making due inquiry. There was no misrepresentation on the plaintiffs' part. Every statement in the document submitted to the defendant is true and fair. The principle which governs in marine and life insurances, that the party insuring is bound to disclose every circumstance material to the subject of the contract, is peculiar to such insurance contracts only, and does not extend to guaranties—Hamilton v. Watson (1), North British Insurance Company v. Lloyd (2). There must be actual fraud to vitiate any other contract. To avoid this contract there must have been a plain misrepresentation. It cannot reasonably be argued that the omitting to recite in the agreement that Packer was in debt to the plaintiffs amounts to a representation that he had duly paid his bills. Railton v. Mathews (3) is very distinguishable. The marginal note there is incorrect. The only decision there was that the ruling of a Scotch Judge was incorrect. It turned on the law of Scotland, which is different, it seems, from the English law; and, further, the principal there was known to be a defaulter.

Honyman, for the defendant, the respondent.—There was evidence of fraud. The defendant had a right to have communicated to him by the plaintiffs the state of the accounts between them and Packer, who was in arrear to a very large amount, 1,332*l.*—Pidcock v. Bishop (4). The mode of the recital of the prior agreement in the agreement which the defendant was induced to sign leads naturally to the inference that the plaintiffs mean to represent that that prior agreement had been substantially carried out, and that the further security was required respecting future debts. The recitals in the agreement amount in substance to evidence of actual intentional misrepresentation, which misled the defendant to his hurt.

Cur. adv. vult.

The learned Judges, differing in opinion, delivered their judgments seriatim, on the 30th of November 1864.

SHEE, J.—The question for our decision is, whether on the facts before us as stated in the case, and in the agreements which are to be taken as parts of it, there was any evidence for the jury, in support of the defendant's plea, that the supposed agreement and promises were obtained from him by the fraud of the plaintiffs, and by their fraudulent and undue concealment of material facts within their knowledge respecting the said James Packer, material to be made known to the defendant before he entered into the agreement. The facts were as follows: Under an agreement of the 1st of November 1856 James Packer had been for five years a commission agent of the plaintiffs for the sale of coals, to be delivered by them to his order, on the terms that he should from time to time give to the plaintiffs his bills for the amount of the coals so delivered, and pay to them within six days of its receipt all money received by him from customers for such coals, to be taken off and credited upon the bills so to be given by him. And by an agreement of the same date, between the plaintiffs and Sarah Tinson, the mother of Packer, she had become surety to the plaintiffs to the extent of 300*l.* for the due performance by Packer of his agreement. Packer not having for a very considerable time "carried out his agreement by settling for and paying up his bills at the expiration of the months during which they were current," had become debtor to the plaintiffs in the sum of 1,332*l.*, and Sarah Tinson, on her guarantie for him, had become their debtor to the extent of 300*l.*, when the plaintiffs informed Packer that they wanted further security, and could not without it continue him in their employment, and stipulated with him that the defendant and the other parties, sureties with him in the agreement sued upon, should, by their several and continuing guaranties, give the plaintiffs further security to the extent of 300*l.* against the said James Packer. In pursuance of this stipulation the plaintiffs caused the agreement sued upon to be prepared. Although in legal construction it extends to defaults already made as well as to defaults which might be in the future made, it gives no intimation in any part of it of an intention that it should operate retroactively, or of any ascertained default on which it could so operate. It is silent on the fact of the breach by Packer of his agreement, that he would for the coals delivered to his order give from time to time his acceptances, and take them up at the expiration of the months during which they were current; on the fact that by not having done so he had incurred a debt to the plaintiffs of 1,332*l.*, and involved Sarah Tinson in a liability for 300*l.*; on the fact that the plaintiffs had informed him that he must give them further security or relinquish their employment; on the fact that the defendant, on his signature of the agreement, would, not contingently only on future defaults, but at once, become liable for 100*l.*: and none of these facts, of which the defendant was entirely ignorant, were communicated to him by the plaintiffs, nor was any opportunity for inquiry of them, or of those who represented them, afforded to the defendant. The plaintiffs personally had no communication with him, and never saw him; it was left to Packer, whose employment and livelihood, as well as the liability of Sarah Tinson, were at stake, to obtain the consent of the defendant and of the other sureties in the best way he could, and as he thought proper; and the collector of the plaintiffs, who was sent round with the agreement to procure the signatures of the defendant and of the other sureties, had no authority to answer questions. It is clear from the case of The North British Insurance Company v. Lloyd (2), correcting the dictum of Lord Truro in Owen v. Homan (5), that the rule which prevails in assurances upon marine and life risks, that all material circumstances known to the assured must be disclosed by him, and that the non-disclosure of them, though innocent and not fraudulent, vitiates the contract, does not apply to contracts of guarantee. But upon a discussion in which the question is, whether there was any evidence to be left to the jury to support a plea, not of non-disclosure merely, but of fraud and fraudulent concealment of facts material to be made known to the defendant, this singularity of insurance law is surely little better than an intruder. What place can it have in the argument, unless they who put it forward are at liberty to assume the negative of the plea. Whether there was any evidence of fraud and fraudulent concealment is the subject of inquiry, and there is no definition of guilty, as distinguished from innocent silence, or of bad faith and fraud in contracts which the facts in this case do not exactly fit. Aliud simulatum aliud actum (6), the making one state of things appear to those with whom you deal to be the true state of things, while you are acting on the knowledge of a different state of things—among the oldest definitions of fraud in contracts—is here exemplified; for the agreement was prepared by the plaintiffs as a security to them against a defaulter, with whom, on account of his default, except on further security, they had declined to continue their arrangement; and the defaulter is held out by them as their commission agent, with a five years' character in their service, who had been guaranteeing by his own bills during that time the customers introduced by him, under the protection of a pre-arranged system of short reckonings, settlements and payments from all temptation to dishonesty, irregularity or rash dealing. Sarah Tinson, whom presumably he would be reluctant to imperil, is held out as a person who was willing after five years' experience of the working of her son's commission agency, to continue liable to the same extent in amount and time with the defendant and the other proposed sureties; whereas her guarantee, to which theirs is described as "supplemental and additional," was exhausted, the first and immediate office of their guarantee being to make hers good should she fail in doing so; they, should she discharge it, continuing liable to the extent of 300*l.* for the balance, and any future addition to it remaining due by Packer to the plaintiffs. The only hint in the agreement sued upon of the real state of things between the plaintiffs and Packer is to be found in the recital that, "in order to induce the said Lee & Jerdein to continue the said arrangement with the said James Packer, the said sureties had agreed," &c., the effect of which recital was for the jury, and which, when read with the context was more likely to lead the proposed sureties to the inference that the existing security had, by reason of the increase of Packer's transactions on account of Lee & Jerdein, become inadequate than that it was already forfeited. "The guilt of fraud," says the Digest, "is not in him only who, for the purpose of deceiving, uses obscure language, but in him who insidiously and without appearing to do so dissembles what he thinks"—Digest, l. 43, s. 2, de Dolo Malo. "Dolus malus non tantum in eo est qui fallendi causâ obscure loquitur, sed etiam qui insidiosae vel obscure dissimulat." It is difficult to conceive language more obscure and better calculated to mislead, or dissimulation more insidious than in this agreement. Who would imagine that a recital "that James Packer has for some time past been a salesman of coals on commission for the said Lee & Jerdein, he the said James Packer giving bills of exchange to them for all such coals as may be delivered to his order, such bills being floating bills, to be settled for and paid up at the expiration of the current months during which such bills are respectively running," was, if true in any sense, true only in the loose sense that he had contracted five years before to give bills from time to time for such coals as might be delivered to his order, without any stipulation as to their being settled for and paid up at the expiration of the current months during which they were running, and that the course of dealing thus described, if it ever existed, had not, as the case expressly states, been observed by Packer for a very considerable time? What plain man, bargaining with one whom he thought honest and did not care to insult, could reasonably be expected to inquire whether the words, "should give to Lee & Jerdein a floating and continuing guarantee for the term of three years," might not mean, or be intended to mean, that he was to be liable before his signature to the agreement was dry, absolutely and inevitably to the extent of 100*l.*, or whether the words in the operative part of the agreement, "do hereby guarantee, promise and agree that they shall and will pay and make good all such sum and sums of money as may be due to Lee & Jerdein at any time during the said term of three years," might not be intended to mean—do hereby guarantee, promise and agree that they shall and will pay and make good to the extent of 300*l.* a debt of four times that amount now due, and all further debts which may become due during the term of three years? "To be silent is one thing, concealment is another. You may be silent respecting facts within your knowledge without being guilty of concealment. You are guilty of it, when the motive of your silence is a wish that others for your advantage should be ignorant of facts which you know, and which it is for their interest that they should know." Such is the description or definition of undue concealment in the Treatise de Officiis:—"Aliud est celare, aliud tacere (7). Neque enim id est celare quidquid reticeas; sed cum quod tu scias id ignorare emolumenti tui causâ, velis eos, quorum intersit id scire. Hoc autem celandi genus quale sit et cujus hominis quis non videt? Certe non aperti, non simplicis, non ingenui, non justis, non viri boni; versuti potius, obscuro, astuti, fallacis, malitiosi, callidi veteratoris, vafri, hæc tot et alia plura nonne inutile est subire nomina? (8) These definitions and maxims, though cited in all the books on the contract of insurance, are of much older date than any certain trace of that contract, and not more applicable to it than to the contract of guarantee. Is there not in this agreement a studied effort to conceal the truth from those who were interested in knowing it, and whom the plaintiffs and Packer wanted not to know it? Under this impression I should on the argument of this case, had it not been for the dissent of my Lord Chief Baron and some of my learned Brothers, have arrived at a confident opinion, that there was not only some evidence, but cogent evidence of such a suppression of the truth, by a partial, inaccurate and subdolosus setting forth by the plaintiffs in the agreement of facts within their knowledge material for the proposed sureties to be informed of, as along with the non-communication of other facts material for them to know, amounted to a misrepresentation to the proposed sureties, that they were asked to come under none but the more ordinary liabilities of sureties—a contingent liability; and that Packer during his five years' agency had proved himself to be a man worthy of trust and confidence—a satisfactory guarantor of others and himself the safe subject of a guarantie.

But it was urged, on the part of the plaintiffs, and with the apparent assent of some of my Brothers, that we are concluded on this point by authority, and that if the cases which had been cited to us had been more maturely considered in the Court below, its judgment would have been different. I do not think so. The two cases in the House of Lords, and the case in the Court of Exchequer, appear to me to have been rightly understood by the Chief Justice at Nisi Prius, and by the Court of Common Pleas, and to be in favour of the defendant. There is not a word in them tending to weaken the principle that an undue and fraudulent concealment of matters material to be known by the guarantor vitiates the contract which is tainted by it. The case of Railton v. Mathews (3) decided, that on an issue "whether the pursuer was induced to subscribe the bond by undue concealment or deception on the part of the defenders,"—as explained by the summons of reduction of suretyship, to mean "whether when the defenders accepted and took possession of the said bond they fraudulently suppressed and concealed the said whole facts and circumstances regarding the conduct and irregularities of the debtor,"—it was a misdirection to tell the jury that "such concealment, to vitiate the bond, must be wilful and intentional on the part of the person obtaining it, and with a view to an advantage to himself." Undue concealment, though not wilful and intentional and with a view to the advantage of the person taking a guarantie, being thus held sufficient to vitiate it, the case is strongly in favour of the defendant, for there was in this case, as it seems to me, evidence that the non-communication to him by the plaintiffs was not merely undue, but wilful and intentional; and it was for their immediate advantage, and, as they knew, and knew that the defendant did not know, for his immediate disadvantage, if an underhand dealing of guarantie by the party taking it can ever be so.

But Railton v. Mathews (3) is said to have been qualified by the later case—Hamilton v. Watson (1). Quite otherwise, as it appears to me. In Hamilton v. Watson (1) (the true grounds of the decision of which are to be found in the judgment of Lord Cottenham, and in what fell from him in the course of the argument rather than in the judgment of Lord Campbell), a cash credit on the guarantie of sureties had been granted to a man already in debt to the bankers who granted it, and the debt which had not been mentioned to the sureties was discharged by a cheque which, but for the new cash credit, the debtor would not have been in a position to draw. There was no allegation, as was observed by Lord Cottenham, of fraud or misrepresentation, or of any secret agreement as to the way in which the cash credit should be applied.

But it was pressed upon the House at the bar, that it was the duty of bankers taking a guarantie for a cash credit to inform the party giving the guarantie of every circumstance in the previous dealings of the party guaranteed, which might influence the consideration whether the guarantie should be given or refused. Lord Cottenham and Lord Campbell combat this contention in their judgment. The latter suggests as a criterion of innocent silence on the part of a creditor taking a suretyship bond, whether the fact not disclosed be one the existence of which might naturally be expected by the surety, as the indebtedness to his bankers of a person asking friends to be sureties for him to those bankers in a new cash credit would be. Their decision is, that where there is no fraudulent concealment it is not necessary to the validity of a cash credit surety bond, that all the circumstances of the dealings between the debtor and the creditor taking it should be voluntarily disclosed by him to the party giving it. There is a wide difference, as respects what might naturally be expected to be the actual state of the account of one man with another, between the case of a suretyship for a man requiring and applying for a cash credit to bankers with whom he had had previous dealings, and whose business it is to lend capital to penniless persons on the security of sureties, and the case of a suretyship for a surety of others—a surety between whom as such and his employers, short reckonings as the defendant was led to suppose, had for five years been observed as a rule. But it is unnecessary to dwell upon the distinction, for in Hamilton v. Watson (1) neither fraud nor fraudulent concealment was charged; whereas here they are charged, and the only question is, whether there was any evidence to be left to the jury of them.

The case of The North British Insurance Company v. Lloyd (2) would not probably have been cited had it not been for the distinction re-established in it by my Lord Chief Baron, between the contracts of insurance and of guarantie. The fact not disclosed in that case was considered by the jury not to have been one material for the surety to have been informed of, and the Court concurred in their decision upon that point. It is stated in the case that there was "no evidence to shew that the plaintiffs were aware at the time when the agreement of the 3rd of October 1861 was entered into, that Packer had actually received payment from the customers for the coals delivered to his order." This seems to imply that Packer had received such payment, and though we are not at liberty to infer the plaintiffs' knowledge of it, we are at liberty to infer that, while contemplating the obtaining of the suretyship of the defendant and of the other sureties, the plaintiffs were deliberately and grossly negligent of a duty which, for the sake of the proposed sureties, it was incumbent upon them to discharge—the duty of ascertaining the cause of Packer's default; whether he had received payment for the coals delivered to his order, and if so whether the money which he ought to have paid over to the plaintiffs within six days of its receipt had been applied by him to other uses—Dissoluta negligentia propè dolum est; Digest b. 1. 1, a. 29. If Packer, with the plaintiffs' authority, had actually received payment for the coals delivered to his order, the observation of one of my learned Brothers in the course of the argument, that the customers, notwithstanding Packer's intervention, were, as well as he, and they primarily, responsible to the plaintiffs, would have less weight than it might otherwise be entitled to. This double liability of Packer and of the customers to the plaintiffs could in no case, as it appears to me, countervail the inherent ugliness of the transaction. Upon the whole, I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas should be affirmed.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of opinion that in this case the decision of the Court below should be affirmed. The question is, whether, under the circumstances stated in the case there was evidence to go to the jury in support of the averment of fraud; for I think that the averment of undue concealment carries the case no further, and that unless actual fraud was proved, the substance of the issue was not proved. It was decided in The North British Insurance Company v. Lloyd (2) that the rule that all material circumstances known to the assured must be disclosed, is peculiar to contracts of insurance, and that it does not extend to contracts of guarantie. I concur in this, which, I think, is founded upon principle as well as authority. It was pointed out by the Chief Baron, in the argument in the present case, that a surety is, in general, a friend of the principal debtor, acting at his request, and not at that of the creditor; and in ordinary cases it may be assumed that the surety obtains from the principal all the information which he requires; and I think that great practical mischief would ensue, if the creditor were by law required to disclose everything material known to him, as in a case of insurance. If it were so, no creditor could rely upon a contract of guarantie unless he communicated to the proposed sureties everything relating to his dealings with the principal to an extent which would, in the ordinary course of things, be so vexatious and annoying to the principal and his friends, the intended sureties, that such a rule of law would practically prohibit the obtaining of contracts of suretyship in matters of business. This is well pointed out by Lord Campbell, in his judgment in Hamilton v. Watson (1). But I think, both on authority and on principle, that when the creditor describes to the proposed sureties the transaction proposed to be guaranteed (as in general a creditor does), that description amounts to a representation, or, at least, is evidence of a representation that there is nothing in the transaction that might not naturally be expected to take place between the parties to a transaction such as that described. And if a representation to this effect is made to the intended surety by one who knows that there is something not naturally to be expected to take place between the parties to the transaction, and that this is unknown to the person to whom he makes the representation, and that if it were known to him he would not enter into the contract of suretyship, I think it is evidence of a fraudulent representation on his part. I think that it appears in Hamilton v. Watson (1) that such was the opinion of Lord Campbell, and I think that on this principle are founded the judgments of Lord Eldon in Smith v. the Bank of Scotland (9), and of the Court of King's Bench in Pidcock v. Bishop (4). In the present case the plaintiffs had no personal communication with the defendant, the surety, and when they sent the agreement to him for execution they sent it by an agent, who had no authority from the plaintiffs to make any statement whatever, or to do anything more than obtain the defendant's signature to the agreement thus sent. The argument for the plaintiffs before us was, in substance, that under such circumstances, though there might be a concealment or non-disclosure of material facts, there was not and could not be any misrepresentation on the plaintiffs' part, and that without it there could be no fraud; and during the argument I was inclined to be of that opinion; but on consideration I have come to the conclusion, that in this case there was evidence of intentional deceit by a false representation, of the kind I have above referred to, amounting to actual fraud. The written agreement, which before it was executed the plaintiffs sent to the defendant, recites, that Packer, the principal, had been for some time salesman to the plaintiffs on terms by which he was, in substance, to be a del credere agent, settling and paying for what he had sold monthly, and that they had required from him security to induce them to continue him in the employment, and stipulated that the defendant and others should give them a floating and continuing guarantee for the term of three years from the date thereof, to secure the amount of any balance which might, at any time, be due to them on the coal account. I think this was evidence of, or rather, if not qualified by other matters, amounted to a representation that there was nothing in the transaction between the plaintiff and Packer which might not, in the ordinary course of affairs, be expected to have taken place between them as parties to such a transaction. It is stated in the case that at the time when this agreement was sent to the defendant, a balance of 1,332*l.* was actually then due from Packer, he not having for a very considerable time settled for and paid up at the expiration of the current month, as stipulated by the agreement. It is, however (in favour of the plaintiffs), further stated, that there was no evidence that the plaintiffs were aware that Packer had actually received the money from the customers. Now, whether the handing the agreement by the plaintiffs to the defendant amounted to an inaccurate representation or not depends, as I think, on the question whether, in such a transaction as that described in the agreement, it might, or might not, naturally be expected that the masters might have allowed a balance of this extent to accumulate, and might have allowed the amount to stand over unsettled for so long a time. In Hamilton v. Watson (1) the transaction was a security for a banker's cash account, and the decision of the House of Lords was, that in such a case it might be so naturally expected that the proposed principal had already overdrawn his account, that there was no evidence of a representation that he had not. In Smith v. the Bank of Scotland (9), where the security was given for the good behaviour of a bank agent, it was held, that an allegation that the bank knew that the principal had misconducted himself in his office, and that this fact was concealed from the sureties, ought to have been admitted to proof in the Court below. I think the effect of Lord Eldon's judgment in that case is, that it was so little to be expected that a bank would continue in their service an agent who had already, by breach of trust, run into their debt, that the application for security amounted, as he says, to holding him forth to the sureties as a trustworthy person—1 Dow, 292. I think that it must in every case depend upon the nature of the transaction, whether the fact not disclosed is such that it is impliedly represented not to exist, and that must generally be a question of fact proper for a jury. If in this case the amount of the balance already due had been small, or the period during which the accounts were left unsettled short, there would, in my opinion, have been such a mere scintilla of evidence as would not have warranted the jury in finding the verdict of fraud, and the Judge would have been justified in withdrawing the question from their consideration. But as it is, the amount of the balance already due being, relatively to the amount of the security, so large, and the period during which no settlement had taken place being so considerable, I think the Judge could not have withdrawn the case from the consideration of the jury, who might well come to the conclusion that the sending of the agreement in these terms, amounted to an inaccurate representation. This would not be enough to support the verdict on the plea of fraud, unless it was further established, that the plaintiffs made the inaccurate representation, intending to deceive the defendant, and induce him to enter into the contract in the belief that what was represented did exist; whilst the plaintiffs knew it did not exist. But of that also I think there was sufficient evidence. The improbability that any one could suppose that sureties would have entered into such an agreement, if they had known the truth, is so great, that the jury might well think that the plaintiffs knew that the defendant was in ignorance of it; and if the jury so thought, they might from that alone have drawn the inference that the representation was fraudulently intended to deceive. This is strengthened by the facts that the plaintiffs apparently avoided having any personal communication with the proposed sureties, and sent the agreement for execution by an agent, who had no authority from them to make any statements, from which the jury might perhaps draw the further inference, that the plaintiffs took pains to avoid the risk of the sureties asking questions and being undeceived. It is not essential to constitute fraud that there should be any misleading by express words. It is sufficient if it appears that the plaintiffs knowingly assisted in inducing the defendant to enter into the contract by leading him to believe that which the plaintiffs knew to be false, the plaintiffs knowing that if he had not been thus misled he would not have entered into the contract. For the reasons above given, I think there was, on this case, evidence to support the verdict; and consequently the judgment, in my opinion, should be affirmed.

BRAMWELL, B.—I think this judgment should be reversed. It is clear that nothing turns on the defendant being a surety. The question raised, and properly raised, by the pleadings is, was the defendant's engagement obtained by the plaintiffs' fraud, actual moral fraud? The question argued before us was, was there evidence of such fraud? The Court below says there was; but unfortunately does not point out in what it consisted. With very great respect I see none, and I think it can be shewn there is none. To constitute fraud there must be—first, the assertion of something false, which is not the case here; or, secondly, the suppression of something true, where there is a duty or profession of stating everything material; and here there is no such duty; or, thirdly, what perhaps is included in one of the foregoing, a suggestion of falsity by statement of some facts, and suppression of others which would qualify those stated. As if one should say A. was seised and died, B. was eldest son, entered and enjoyed, and suppressed that A. had made a will and given B. a life estate. To my mind there is nothing of that kind here. Perhaps, but most improbably, the defendant inferred or guessed that no arrears were due to the plaintiffs. I should not have so concluded: on the contrary, I should have concluded that there was some change in the circumstances of the parties which induced the plaintiffs to require further security. But supposing that the defendant's was a right conclusion, and supposing that if he could not inform himself further, he was justified in acting on it, I say that here he was not so justified, because he might, if he cared to know them, have informed himself of the actual facts from the plaintiffs, or if they had refused to tell him he might have refused to be surety. I think a man has great right to complain of another who charges him with fraud, because he, the accuser, had not taken the trouble to make a few inquiries. I really can see no evidence of any fraud, of anything dishonest in this case. There is nothing inconsistent with the plaintiffs' honesty. But when the facts are equally consistent with a conclusion one way or the other, they are no evidence either way. I think the opinion that there was evidence of fraud is founded on a misapprehension. Packer was not a dishonest defaulter to the knowledge of the plaintiffs. He was liable to them to a large amount, every shilling of which might have been due from solvent debtors. The plaintiffs continued him a long time after in their service. They sent the agreement of suretyship to the defendant, and left it with him several days for him to make such inquiries as he thought fit. He makes none. Suppose he had asked and been told the truth, could anybody say that there had been any fraud or attempt at fraud? Suppose he had employed an attorney, would anyone say that there was any attempt to deceive the attorney? The notion of fraud arises from the defendant being likely to behave foolishly, to make no inquiry, making none and being a surety. I think this very mischievous, that a man should have his carelessness rewarded by liberty to call out Fraud!—very mischievous that people should be charged with fraud by careless persons simply on account of their own carelessness. No one is safe if this is allowed. No one can ever know that he has sufficiently guarded against the rash conclusions and folly of those he deals with, and saved himself from the uncharitable and foolish conclusion to which a jury may be disposed to come in favour of a surety.

CROMPTON, J.—The judgment I am about to deliver is one in which my Brother Channell concurs.

The question in this case is, whether the Court of Common Pleas was wrong in holding that there was some evidence of fraud to go to the jury. It is quite clear that the mere non-disclosure of material facts will not operate so as to avoid a contract of the nature of the one in this case, such defence being, as pointed out in the case of The North British Insurance Company v. Lloyd (2), peculiar to the contract of insurance. Such non-communication avoids the contract of insurance without fraud and however innocent the conduct of the party may be, on grounds peculiar to the contract of insurance and not applicable to the case of a guarantie. I cannot say that the Court below was wrong in holding that there was some evidence of fraud to go to the jury in this case, or that the learned Judge who tried the case could properly have withdrawn it from the jury.

To constitute a fraudulent misrepresentation, it need not be made in terms expressly stating the existence of some untrue fact; but if it be made by one party in such terms as would naturally lead the other party to suppose the existence of such state of facts, and if such statement be so made designedly and fraudulently, it is as much a fraudulent misrepresentation as if the statement of the untrue facts were made in express terms. It seems to me that the defendant in the present case would be naturally led by the guarantie, and the original agreement with Packer annexed thereto, and the reference to the agreement with Mrs. Tinson, referred to in the guarantie which is said to be supplemental to that agreement, to suppose that a different state of things existed from the real state of things known to the plaintiffs. It was known to the plaintiffs that Packer the principal had not carried out his original agreement with them, and that there was a large sum due from him on his floating bills. By his agreement with them, the monies to be received by him from the customers from time to time were to be paid over and accounted for within six days, and were to be applied to the floating bills. Surely on perusing such documents as were sent, the proposed sureties would be led to suppose that the monies to be received from time to time would be applicable, in the first instance, to the bills to be given from time to time, and not to a large deficit on the old bills. In truth, none of the money to be received would be applicable to the new transactions till the large balance was wiped off; and it is very unlikely that the surety would have joined in the new guarantie had he been aware of the existence of the old debt. I think also that the new sureties would naturally be led to suppose from the draft guarantie, and from its being stated that their engagement was to be supplemental, and in addition to Mrs. Tinson's, that her guarantie was practically applicable to the new dealings; whereas, whether the defendant's suretyship was applicable retrospectively or not, hers would really be in effect absorbed by the large balance. I think, therefore, that there was evidence that the defendant was led by the sending of the documents in question to the belief in an untrue state of facts, where the knowledge of the true state of facts would have prevented his joining in the contract of suretyship.

It was said, indeed, that the plaintiffs sending the documents in this shape may have been without any intentional fraud on their part, and that they may merely have got the documents drawn by their professional advisers in a proper state, and forwarded them without moral fraud. This seems, however, to me to be a question which the jury were to determine; and it is not necessary for me to consider whether in their place I should have found the fraud. We are only to decide whether there was evidence to go to the jury. The sending the documents to the defendant and leaving them with him; the largeness of the sum in arrear; the improbability that the defendant would have become surety if he had known the real facts on the one hand, and on the other hand the circumstances of the plaintiffs not having seen the proposed sureties and merely having sent the papers to them, and the other circumstances referred to in the argument were, as it seems to me, matters entirely for the jury; and I cannot say that the Court of Common Pleas were wrong in holding that there was some evidence for their consideration, and I therefore think that the judgment of the Court below should be affirmed.

POLLOCK, C.B.—The question in this case is simply whether there was any evidence of fraud on the part of the plaintiffs, such as to prevent them from recovering from the surety the amount guaranteed.

The facts are very short and plain. James Packer acted as commission agent for the plaintiffs, selling goods which they supplied and receiving payment for them, charging a commission upon each transaction. He gave bills to the plaintiffs which were to be paid at stipulated times. As this involved considerable responsibility on the part of Packer, he originally gave security to the plaintiffs by his mother, Sarah Tinson, to the amount of 300*l*. The business went on, and his accounts became in arrear to some extent, upon which the plaintiffs told him that they could not allow his employment to go on unless he found further security, whereupon he undertook to do so, and procured the defendant and others to undertake to sign the agreement on which this action is brought. This was a further security for 300*l*. more, expressed to be supplemental and in addition to the former; so that the new sureties were to be liable for whatever Sarah Tinson was to be liable to, and this was distinct notice that the suretyship was to be retrospective. The plaintiffs never had any communication with the defendant, and never interfered in any way beyond sending the agreement to be signed which they had been told by Packer that the defendant had approved of, and which was true. It is said there was in this matter concealment or misrepresentation. In fact, there was no representation at all, and therefore there could not be misrepresentation; and as to concealment, the plaintiffs never undertook to make any disclosure; and in my judgment were not under any legal or moral obligation to make any disclosure under the circumstances.

It must be taken that the occupation of Packer was a profitable one—one in which a prudent man might have recovered himself though he had fallen into some difficulties. The plaintiffs say to him, if you can procure from your relations or friends a further guarantie, we will allow you to continue notwithstanding the present state of your accounts, but if you cannot we will stop now. He undertakes to procure, and does procure a further guarantie; and the business therefore went on. Whether Packer made to his sureties a faithful and true representation of the state of his affairs is entirely a matter of indifference; if he did, then they have no ground of complaint at all; if he did not, it is no fault of the plaintiffs. The defendant has trusted Packer, whom the plaintiffs would trust no longer; and Packer has deceived the defendant, but the plaintiffs never directly or indirectly made any communication to the defendant on the subject of the state of the accounts. It was, however, manifest that the plaintiffs required further security, and retrospective security. It was therefore the duty rather of the sureties to inquire, than of the plaintiffs to inform them, what was the state of the accounts. In my opinion, there is a total absence of any evidence of fraud, and, I should add, no just ground for any suspicion of it. I think the rule ought to be made absolute.

Judgment affirmed.

Feb. 6. } FIELDING v. LEE AND ANOTHER.

Bankrupt—Order and Disposition—
12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. s. 125.

A Commissioner in Bankruptcy made an order, under the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. s. 125, in these terms: "That the household goods, furniture, &c. being in or about the messuage or dwelling-house and premises in the occupation of the said T. Taylor, in Cross Street, Middleton, and known as the Cross Keys, be sold and disposed of by the assignees for the benefit of the creditors of the said T. Taylor":—Held, per Erle, C.J., and semble per Byles, J., that the order was sufficiently specific.

Held, also, per Byles, J., that the order was not bad upon the face of it; and could not be held to be bad, unless it appeared from the evidence that a more specific order might have been made.

This was an action tried, before Mr. Serjeant Atkinson, at the Assizes held at Manchester in August last.

The action was in trover and trespass for taking away certain household goods and furniture. The defendants pleaded not guilty, by statute, referring to the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. s. 159; 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61. s. 19; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 54. s. 6. Secondly, a denial that the goods in question were the property of the plaintiff. Thirdly, a plea that after the passing of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, one Thomas Taylor was duly declared a bankrupt, and that a warrant of seizure was duly issued by the Judge of the Court having jurisdiction in the matter of the said bankruptcy, whereby the bailiffs of the said court and others were required "to enter into and upon the house of the said bankrupt, and then and there to seize the goods of the said bankrupt, and in case of resistance or of not having the key or keys of any door or lock of any premises belonging to the said bankrupt where any goods of his were, or were suspected to be, to break open, or cause the same to be broken open, for the better execution of the said warrant." And the defendants alleged that John Harper, a bailiff of the court, entered into the house of the bankrupt and took peaceable possession of certain goods; that he was afterwards ejected therefrom, and the defendants thereupon entered the said house for the purpose of enabling the said John Harper to assist in the execution of the said warrant, and seized, took and carried away the goods in the declaration mentioned, which were the grievances complained of. There was also a fourth plea that the plaintiff had given no notice of action.

The plaintiff took issue on the above pleas, and he also new assigned, to which the defendants pleaded not guilty.

It appeared at the trial that a person of the name of Taylor had formerly kept a beer-house called the Cross Keys, at Middleton, near Manchester. On the 15th of January 1863 Taylor left the Cross Keys, and went to live in a neighbouring cottage. He was succeeded in the business at the Cross Keys by his son-in-law, one Ogden, who took from him the furniture and fixtures in the beer-house at a valuation. While Taylor was residing in the cottage, namely, on the 7th of September, his furniture was seized under a writ of fi. fa. at the suit of Lee, one of the defendants in this action, and was sold by Aspinall, another defendant. The plaintiff bought the furniture at the sale, and replaced it in Taylor's cottage. In the following October, one Kenyon, Taylor's brother-in-law, bought the goodwill and furniture of the Cross Keys of Ogden, and subsequently took out a licence in his own name, and put his name over the door; but put Taylor into the house to manage the business for him. When Taylor returned to the Cross Keys he took with him from the cottage the furniture which the plaintiff had bought at the sale and replaced in the cottage. In February 1864 Taylor was committed to prison on a judgment-debtor summons by the Judge of a county court, and on the 1st of April he was declared bankrupt, the proceedings being carried on in the same county court. The defendant Lee was appointed creditors' assignee, and on the 16th of June, upon the application of Lee, the Judge of the county court, sitting as a Commissioner in Bankruptcy, made the following order: "That the household goods, furniture, &c. being in or about the messuage or dwelling-house and premises in the occupation of the said T. Taylor, in Cross Street, Middleton, and known as the Cross Keys, be sold and disposed of by the assignees for the benefit of the creditors of the said T. Taylor." He also issued a warrant of seizure in the terms stated in the third plea. In accordance with this warrant the high bailiff of the county court took possession of all the furniture in the Cross Keys, which was subsequently sold by auction by the defendant Aspinall.

The present action was brought by the plaintiff to recover that part of the goods seized, which consisted of the furniture brought from Taylor's cottage, and which he had bought at the sale on the 9th of September.

The learned Serjeant was of opinion that, under the circumstances, the defendants could not set up as a defence under the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. s. 125, that the goods were in the order and disposition of the bankrupt, and the only question he asked the jury was whether the goods claimed by the plaintiff were bonâ fide his property at the time of seizure. The jury found that they were, and the verdict was entered for the plaintiff accordingly.

Temple, in Michaelmas Term, obtained a rule for a new trial, upon the ground of misdirection by the learned Serjeant, in telling the jury that the defendants could not set up, as an answer to the action, that the goods were in the order and disposition of the bankrupt as reputed owner.

E. James, Baylis and Pope shewed cause. — They contended that the order of the Commissioner under which the assignee claimed was not sufficiently specific (1); and they referred to Heslop v. Baker (2) and Quartermaine v. Bittlestone (3).

Temple, Wood and Torr, in support of the rule, referred to Freshney v. Carrick (4) and Graham v. Furber (5).

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule ought to be made absolute for a new trial. The action is brought by the alleged owner of goods in trover and trespass. The defendants, of whom Lee is the assignee in bankruptcy and the other is Lee's agent, plead not guilty by statute. The evidence shewed that Lee caused the goods to be seized under his assumed rights as assignee of one Taylor; and I take it that the plaintiff was the true owner of the goods, and that the goods were at the time of the seizure in the order and disposition of Taylor, the bankrupt, and Lee had a right, under section 125. of the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, to take these goods for the benefit of Taylor's creditors, if he has provided himself with the proper order. By section 159. of the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, in every action brought against any person for anything done in pursuance of that act, the defendant may plead the general issue. Now the defence is, that the alleged wrongful act is one which the act of parliament really authorizes. The evidence shews, that the goods in question were in the order and disposition of the bankrupt with the consent of the true owner. But the great argument has been, that there has not been the order of the Commissioner as required by section 125, in order to give the assignee a right to take these goods. That order is before me, and it is as follows: "That the household goods, furniture, &c. being in or about the messuage or dwelling-house and premises in the occupation of the said T. Taylor, in Cross Street, Middleton, and known as the Cross Keys, be sold and disposed of by the assignees for the benefit of the creditors of the said T. Taylor." The question is, whether that is a sufficient order under section 125. In Heslop v. Baker (2) it was held that goods of which the bankrupt was reputed owner did not vest in his assignees without an order having been first made. In Quartermaine v. Bittlestone (3) it was held that a general order to sell all goods which were in the possession, order or disposition of the bankrupt was insufficient. That was an order in the most general terms. But this order is much more specific. To some extent at least it makes it clear what goods are to be sold, inasmuch as it specifies them as household goods and furniture, and as being in a certain public-house. There is much force in the observation, that the object of this section is to give to the creditors protection against claims which are only put forward by friends of the bankrupt to protect him in his distress, and if it was necessary in every case that the true owner should be found, and that he and the goods to be seized should be minutely described and specified in the order, these provisions of the statute would be completely paralyzed. In this case de corpore constat to a sufficient extent.

I should have come into this line of reasoning without any authority, but I am much fortified in it by the case of Freshney v. Carrick (4), which has been referred to, and by the remarks of Baron Martin in giving judgment in that case.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. These were goods in the possession of the bankrupt, and it is plain that there was a true owner apart from the apparent owner, and that the goods were in the possession of the bankrupt with the consent of the true owner. Then the Commissioner makes an order that the household goods and furniture in a certain house should be sold by the assignees for the benefit of the creditors. That order is objected to as being too general, on the authority of Quartermaine v. Bittlestone (3). There the order contained no description at all, and was clearly bad; here the goods are described to some extent, because they are described as being on certain premises. It is said that the order is bad because the name of the true owner is not mentioned, and because the particular goods are not specified. As to the first objection, the case of Freshney v. Carrick (4) to which Mr. Wood has referred is precisely in point. My Brother Martin says, "it is necessary that the attention of the Commissioner should be directed to particular goods, but it is unnecessary that it should be mentioned in the order who was the party claiming as the owner." That is precisely in point as to the first objection. As to the second objection, I think it is sufficient to describe them as they are described in this order, namely, as goods of a certain kind in a certain house. At any rate, it cannot be said that this is an order bad upon the face of it, and if the objection had been taken at the trial, it might have been shewn by the evidence to have been under the circumstances as good an order as could have been made.

Rule absolute.

Feme Covert—Acknowledgment—3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 74. s. 85.

The affidavit accompanying the acknowledgment by a married woman of a deed executed by her, made abroad may be sworn before a notary public, having authority by the laws of his country to administer an oath.

M'Leod applied that the proper officer of the Court might be directed to receive and enrol the certificate of acknowledgment of Frances Cooper, a married woman, of a deed executed by her, together with the affidavit verifying the same, under the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 74. s. 85.

It appeared that Mrs. Cooper was resident in Wisconsin, one of the United States of America, and that a commission was sent out for the purpose of taking her acknowledgment. The affidavit stated that she had duly acknowledged the deed, and was sworn before a notary public. It was accompanied by a certificate, by the Secretary of State for Wisconsin, that a notary was a person authorized to administer oaths in that State.

The difficulty suggested was, that the affidavit was not sworn before a magistrate, in accordance with a rule of Hilary Term, 14 Geo. 3, relating to common recoveries, by which it is required that the affidavit shall be sworn "either before some person duly authorized to take affidavits in this Court, or before some magistrate of the place where such acknowledgment shall be taken, having authority to administer an oath, and in the presence of a public notary."

ERLE, C.J.—I think you are entitled to have this acknowledgment enrolled. The essence of the rule is, that the affidavit should be sworn before a person having authority to administer an oath. The very question arose in the case of In re Way (1), and the affidavit was held to be sufficient.

(1) 6 Man. & G. 1046.

So in Ex parte Hutchinson (2), an affidavit sworn before the British Consul at Madeira, who was certified to have power, by the laws of that island, to administer an oath, was held sufficient. There is, therefore, ample precedent for granting this application.

1865. }
Jan. 16. } FALKE v. FLETCHER.

Principal and Agent—Unpaid Vendee.

D, a merchant in London, was in the habit of shipping salt for exportation at the port of Liverpool. He usually employed the plaintiff to purchase the salt, and the plaintiff shipped it, taking receipts in his own name from the mate for each delivery, and when the cargo was complete, taking bills of lading in his own name, which he remitted to D, in exchange for D's acceptances for the price of the salt. The plaintiff was paid no commission, but he charged D. an advance on the price of the salt. On the present occasion D. had chartered a ship to load a full cargo of salt for Calcutta, and the plaintiff had placed on board her, in accordance with instructions from D, 1,000 tons of salt which he had purchased for that purpose, and for which he had taken the mate's receipts in the usual course. When this quantity had been placed on board D. stopped payment, and the plaintiff then ceased loading, and demanded bills of lading for the salt already on board in his own name. The defendant, the shipowner, refused to allow them to be given and filled up the ship, and sent her with the salt to Calcutta. The jury found that when the plaintiff put the salt on board he did not intend to pass the property therein to D, but to retain it in himself:—Held, that this was the proper question for the jury, and that on this finding and these facts there was a conversion of the salt by the defendant at Liverpool.

This was an action tried, before Blackburn, J., at the Summer Assizes at Liverpool, 1864.

(2) 5 Com. B. Rep. 499; s. c. 17 Law J. Rep. (N. S.) C.P. 111.

The action was brought for the conversion of 1,000 tons of salt. The defendant pleaded not guilty, and that the salt was not the property of the plaintiff.

It appeared at the trial that the plaintiff was a salt-merchant, carrying on business at Liverpool, and that the defendant was the owner of a vessel called the Savoir Faire. In the month of November 1863 one De Mattos, a merchant in London, through the plaintiff, chartered the Savoir Faire to load a complete cargo of salt and proceed therewith to Calcutta; the captain to apply to the plaintiff for cargo and custom-house business.

It was proved that De Mattos was frequently in the habit of employing the plaintiff to charter vessels for the conveyance of salt, and that the course of business was for the plaintiff to purchase the cargo, and to load it in his own lighters and at his own expense. That in the course of doing so he took the mate's receipts, which were made out in his own name, and, when the whole cargo was loaded, he took bills of lading in his own name. These he sent to De Mattos, with invoices of the price of the salt, and received in exchange De Mattos's acceptances for the amount. The plaintiff charged no commission to De Mattos, but charged such a price for the salt as would remunerate him for his trouble.

This course was followed in the present instance, until about 1,000 tons of salt were loaded, when the plaintiff having heard that De Mattos had stopped payment, declined to load any more. The defendant thereupon filled up the ship on his own account. The plaintiff demanded of the captain bills of lading in his own name for the salt on board in exchange for the mate's receipts. These the defendant refused to permit him to give, and the plaintiff thereupon sent the mate's receipts to his agents at Calcutta with directions to them to claim the salt on its arrival. This was done, but the captain refused to deliver up the salt.

The learned Judge directed the jury that, if the property in the salt remained in the plaintiff, the sailing away from Liverpool after the demand and refusal of the bills of lading was a conversion by the defendant; and that, if the plaintiff did not intend to part with the property in the salt when he placed it on board, it remained in him as against De Mattos and also as against the defendant.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, with damages, 582*l*. 19*s*. 6*d*., the damages being estimated on the assumption that there had been, in accordance with the direction of the learned Judge, a conversion at Liverpool.

Edward James now moved for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection, and that the damages were wrongly estimated, there having been no conversion until the vessel reached Calcutta. He contended that the salt having been purchased by the plaintiff, as agent for De Mattos, and delivered on board a ship chartered by De Mattos, the property in it had passed to De Mattos, and that the defendant had a right to refuse to give bills of lading made out in the name of any other person than De Mattos.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that there ought to be no rule in this case. The plaintiff was in reality in the situation of an unpaid vendor. Having undertaken to procure salt as agent for De Mattos he puts it on board a ship chartered by him for De Mattos, and takes the mate's receipts in his own name. Upon this the proper question was submitted to the jury, namely, whether the plaintiff intended thereby to vest the property in the salt in De Mattos, or whether he intended to retain the control over it which he would have, if such was not his intention; and the jury have found that question in favour of the plaintiff. Then the question is, whether there was a conversion by the captain's sailing away from Liverpool and refusing to give the plaintiff bills of lading in his own name. By reason of his doing so, goods to which the plaintiff was entitled have been absolutely lost to him; and I think the learned Judge was right in saying that, under the circumstances, there was a conversion when the defendant caused the goods wrongfully to be taken out of the control of the plaintiff.

WILLIAMS, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is a pure matter of fact: what was the intention of the plaintiff in putting the goods on board? There was evidence upon this point which might have justified the jury in finding either way. One of the circumstances to be taken into consideration was, that the plaintiff was also the agent for the vendee, and no doubt that was pressed, on the part of the defendants, upon the jury. As to the damages, it is clear that as soon as the plaintiff was deprived of the power to exercise his right to resume possession of the goods there was a conversion.

WILLES, J.—I am also of opinion that the learned Judge left the proper question to the jury, namely, whether, looking at all the circumstances, there was an intention by the plaintiff to appropriate the salt to De Mattos and to pass the property to him, when he put it on board the vessel. Looking to the course of dealing between the parties, I think it is clear that the jury were right. The practice of sending the bill of lading together with the invoice direct to the principal, produced great hardships in Key v. Cotesworth (1), the goods having got into the hands of a bankrupt consignee. That eventually led to the practice being adopted similar to that in Turner v. the Trustees of the Liverpool Docks (2), namely, for the merchant to ship the goods on board on his own account. That was the course of business adopted in previous transactions between the plaintiff and De Mattos, and there is every reason to suppose that in this case also he meant to retain that security. With respect to the argument that has been used that the plaintiff put the goods on board as agent for De Mattos, that appears to me to be only one circumstance in the case, and not a conclusive one. In one sense, no doubt, he was the agent of De Mattos, but for the purpose of considering this question he must be treated as a vendor, as was done in Feise v. Wray (3). With respect to the conversion, I am satisfied that the learned Judge was right in his direction to the jury.

*Contract — Surveyor's Certificate —

A declaration, after setting out an agreement by which the plaintiffs contracted with the defendants to do certain works for a certain sum to be paid them by the defendants on production by the plaintiffs of the certificate of the surveyor of the defendants that the works had been efficiently performed to his satisfaction, averred that, although all things had been done by the plaintiffs to entitle them to such certificate, yet the said surveyor had not given such certificate, but had wrongfully and improperly neglected and refused so to do, and the defendants had not paid the money payable on such certificate:—Held, on demurrer, bad as not disclosing any cause of action against the defendants.

This was an action, by the assignee of Francis Ayers, a bankrupt, and one William Mallows, and one William Johnson, and the first count of the declaration stated that, before F. Ayers became bankrupt, by an agreement in writing made between the said F. Ayers, W. Mallows and W. Johnson, therein called the contractors of the one part, and the defendants of the other part, the said contractors agreed with the defendants to do certain works in conformity with certain plans, drawings and sections therein mentioned, and also in conformity with certain specifications, as well as to the satisfaction and approval of the engineer to a certain local board of health for the time being, should such be found necessary, for 312*l.* 15*s.* to be paid as follows: 156*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* on production by the contractors to the defendants, or one of them, of the certificate of William Lambert, or other the surveyor for the time of the defendants, that the contractors had duly and efficiently performed and completed such portion of the work as, according to the judgment of the said surveyor, should be not less than three-fourths thereof in extent and value; 78*l.* 3*s.* 9*d.* on the production by the said contractors to the defendants, or to one of them, of the certificate of the said surveyor as aforesaid, that the whole of the works mentioned and referred to in the said plans, drawings and specifications had been duly and efficiently performed and completely finished to his satisfaction, and also to the satisfaction of the engineer for the time being of the local board of health, if necessary; and the balance of 78*l.* 3*s.* 9*d.* at the expiration of four months from the date of the said surveyor's certificate of completion, provided the therein mentioned roads, pathways, drains and culverts, and every part thereof, should then be certified by the said surveyor to be in good repair and in perfect and sound condition in all respects, and the defendants thereby agreed with the said F. Ayers, W. Mallows and W. Johnson, in consideration of the due performance of the said agreement therein contained on their part, to pay to them the said sum of 312*l.* 15*s.* at the times and in the manner therein-before mentioned.

Averment, that, although 156*l.* 15*s.*, part of the said sum of 312*l.* 15*s.*, has been paid, and all things necessary on the part of the said contractors to entitle them to have the certificate of the surveyor of the defendants that the whole of the work in the said plans, drawings and specifications had been duly and efficiently performed and completed to his satisfaction and also to the satisfaction of the engineer of the said local board of health, have been done and performed by them, yet the surveyor has not given such certificate, but has wrongfully and improperly neglected and refused so to do, nor have the defendants paid the said sum of 78*l.* 3*s.* 9*d.* payable on such certificate; and further, that although more than four months since the surveyor ought to have given such certificate have elapsed, and although all things have been done by the said contractors on their part to entitle them to a certificate by the said surveyor that the said roads, pathways, drains, culverts and every part thereof were at the expiration of the said four months in good repair and in perfect and sound condition in all respects, yet the said surveyor has not granted such certificate, but has wrongfully and improperly neglected and refused so to do, and the defendants have not yet paid the said balance of 78*l.* 3*s.* 9*d.*

Demurrer thereto and joinder in demurrer.

Henry James, in support of demurrer.—The defendants, by the contract set out in the declaration, were only to pay the contract price on the production of the certificate of their surveyor, and the defendants are sued in this court for the wrongful refusal by such surveyor to give his certificate. This is a novel action and without precedent. The allegation is, that the surveyor "wrongfully and improperly" refused to give the certificate. Work might be done to the value of 150*l*. and the surveyor might perhaps bona fide suppose the value of the work done was only to the extent of 100*l*., and therefore refuse to give a certificate for 150*l*. This would be a wrongful refusal by him, but could it be said that the defendants would be liable? The Court stopped him, and called on—

Parry, Serj. (Joyce with him) to support the declaration.—The surveyor is the agent of the defendants. They employ him to certify, according to the contract, and the fair meaning of both parties to such contract was that the defendants should employ a surveyor who would rightfully and honestly perform the duty of surveyor, and if under such circumstances the surveyor they appointed improperly refused to certify, that would be (it is submitted) a wrong done to the plaintiffs by the agent of the defendants, for which of course the defendants would be responsible. In Macintosh v. the Great Western Railway Company (1), a railway company had contracted to pay on the completion of certain works, with a proviso that unless the engineer of the company should give his certificate, the works should not be considered as completed, and the Court of Chancery overruled a demurrer to a bill filed by the contractor, alleging that the engineer in collusion with the company refused his certificate, and praying for an account and payment of the sums due to such contractor. In Scott v. the Corporation of Liverpool (2), the engineer appeared to have acted properly, and therefore the bill in Chancery was dismissed; but Vice Chancellor Stuart was of opinion that the result would have been otherwise "if the evidence had established a case of gross misconduct in the engineer, or of wilful neglect, refusal or absolute incapacity in him to perform his duties." The same Vice Chancellor, in a case where the architect had acted unfairly, relieved the contractor, and decreed payment of the balance due to him—Pauley v. Turn- bull (3). It is submitted that the defendants by appointing a surveyor who will not certify when he ought to do so, dispensed with the condition in the contract requiring such certificate as precedent to any payment.

[WILLES, J.—If the surveyor appointed by the defendants will not act, he ceases to be their surveyor, and therefore the proper course in that case would be for them to appoint some other surveyor. WILLIAMS, J.—If the defendants in such a case were to refuse to appoint another surveyor, would not an action lie against them at the suit of the plaintiffs, for so refusing?]

In Batterbury v. Vyse (4) works were contracted to be done by the plaintiff to the satisfaction of the defendant and his architect, and no payment was to be considered due unless upon production of the architect's certificate. In an action for withholding the certificate, the declaration alleged that the architect unfairly and improperly neglected to certify, and so neglected in collusion with the defendant and by his procurement; and the declaration was held, on demurrer, to disclose a good cause of action. The cases of Milner v. Field (5) and Grafton v. the Eastern Counties Railway Company (6) do not militate against the plaintiff's right of action, where the certificate has been improperly withheld.

ERLE, C.J.—I think that judgment should be for the defendants. This is a contract by the defendants to pay, on the production of the certificate of the surveyor of the defendants that the contractors had efficiently performed a certain portion of the work. Many contracts are so made, and every one is master of the contract which he chooses to make; and it is of the last importance that contracts should be construed according to the meaning of the words in which they are made. Now, here the contract by the defendants to pay, is on the production of such certificate of the defendants' surveyor, and in the present case no such certificate was produced; but the plaintiffs allege that the surveyor wrongfully and improperly neglected and refused to give his certificate. That is not sufficient.

If it had been alleged that the defendants and their surveyor colluded to withhold the giving of the certificate in order to prevent the plaintiffs from being paid for their work, there is abundant authority, both at law and in equity, to shew that the defendants could not shelter themselves by means of any such misconduct. This is an attempt to take away from the defendants the protection afforded by the opinion of their surveyor, and to substitute a jury in his place. I think, however, that the allegations in this declaration are not such as to entitle the plaintiffs to maintain this action.

WILLIAMS, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Jan. 27. } SWIRE v. LEACH.

Landlord and Tenant—Distress—Damages—Pawnbroker.

Goods in the possession of a pawnbroker as security for money advanced cannot be distrained for rent.

In an action by the pawnbroker to recover goods distrained under such circumstances, the pawnbroker is entitled to recover the full value of the goods.

This was an action tried, at the Liverpool Summer Assizes, 1864, before Pigott, B.

The declaration was for the conversion by the defendant of goods pledged with the plaintiff as a pawnbroker, to which the defendant pleaded not guilty.

It appeared that the plaintiff occupied a house and shop and two cottages, as tenant to one Gray. One of the cottages was used by him as a pawnbroker's shop, and the rent being in arrear, Gray directed the defendant to distrain generally on the premises. The defendant accordingly did so, and proceeded to sell the articles distrained, but whilst the sale was going on the plaintiff's attorneys gave notice to the defendant that the articles in one of the cottages were pledged goods, and that he was not to sell them; the defendant, however, removed the goods, and from time to time restored some of them as the owners applied to redeem them. Subsequently the plaintiff demanded that the pledged goods which remained in the defendant's possession should be delivered up to him, and as the defendant refused to comply with this demand, the present action was brought.

The learned Judge told the jury that the unforfeited pledges were exempt from distress for rent, and they found for the plaintiff, giving as damages the full value of the goods in the defendant's possession at the time of the demand. Leave was reserved to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit, if the Court should be of opinion that the above direction was wrong in point of law.

Monk, in Michaelmas Term last, obtained a rule accordingly, and also to reduce the damages.

W. Saunders and Holkar shewed cause.—The direction was right. A landlord cannot distrain unforfeited pledges. The ground of the exemption is given, by Bayley, B., in Adams v. Grane (1), namely, the interest of the public, in enabling persons to carry on their trade. In that case goods sent to an auctioneer to be sold by him were held to be privileged. So of materials delivered to a manufacturer to be worked up—Gibson v. Ireson (2); and of an animal sent to a butcher to be slaughtered—Brown v. Shevill (3). The other side may rely on Muspratt v. Gregory (4), but that case was decided expressly on the ground that the goods were left on the premises for the convenience of the owner of the goods, and not deposited with the owner of the premises in the way of his trade. Joule v. Jackson (5), where it was held that a brewer's casks in a public house might be seized, is also distinguishable. There the casks were sent by the brewer for his own convenience. In Findon v. M'Laren (6) it was held, that goods in the hands of a commission agent for sale were exempt from distress. The same was held in Brown v. Arundel (7), in Williams

v. Holmes (8) and in Adams v. Grane (1) of goods deposited with an auctioneer. The case of Fonkes v. Joyce (9), where it was held, that cattle on their way to market, and put into a close to graze for the night, might be distrained for rent, is commented on in 2 Wms. Saund. 290, a. In Thompson v. Mashiter (10) it was held, that goods deposited with a wharfinger were privileged. In Brown v. Shevill (3) it was held, that the carcass of a beast sent to a butcher to be slaughtered was privileged; and that case is recognized in Gibson v. Ireson (2). The plaintiff is entitled to full damages, he having a right as against the defendant to the absolute possession of the property.

Monk, in support of the rule.—These are not goods delivered to a man in the way of his trade. Strictly speaking, a pawnbroker is not a trader; he is merely a bailee for reward. It was repeatedly said in Muspratt v. Gregory (4) that these exemptions ought not to be extended. In Parsons v. Gingell (11), it was held that horses and carriages standing at livery are not privileged. Moreover, the damages ought to be confined to the actual interest of the plaintiff in the goods; that is, the amount due to him for the advance on the goods with the arrears of interest—Johnson v. Stear (12).

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule ought to be discharged. The action is brought by a pawnbroker against his landlord, to recover articles which were taken as a distress for rent in arrear, and which articles were at the time in the plaintiff's possession upon the premises in respect of which rent was due, having been deposited with him as securities for advances made in the way of his business as a pawnbroker. The governing point is, whether goods pledged with a pawnbroker can be taken as a distress for rent. Certain classes of goods are exempt from distress, and many Judges have endeavoured to lay down a rule which should embrace all exemptions; but in the application of the rule we are obliged to be guided by the specific instances which have occurred. I think that these goods fall within the description of "things delivered to a person exercising a public trade to be managed in the way of his trade," (13), which is one of the classes of goods which are said to be privileged. I see no distinction for this purpose between an auctioneer, or wharfinger, and a pawnbroker. His business is to keep the goods and make a profit by doing so; and he is bound to keep the goods carefully. It is clear to my mind that pledged goods in the possession of a pawnbroker are within the principle of the exemption to which I have referred. As to the damages, I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to the full value of the goods. The case of Johnson v. Stear (12) has no application to the present, because, as against the plaintiff in this case, the defendant has no right whatever. The bailee in an ordinary action of trover recovers the full value of the goods. The plaintiff holds the goods for the pawnor.

WILLIAMS, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the goods were privileged upon the general ground that they were in the hands of a pawnbroker to be held by him as security in the way of his trade. The case is very similar to that of a wharfinger which has been referred to. As to the damages, it is clear that the plaintiff may recover the full value of the goods.

make the judgment obtained by him in this action available by issuing a writ of fiat facias or capias ad satisfaciendum, notwithstanding the registration of the deed of composition by the said defendant, he, the said defendant, not having paid or tendered to the said plaintiff and others the first instalment payable under the said deed.

It appeared from the affidavits in support of the motion, that in the month of July 1864 the defendant executed a deed of composition for the benefit of his creditors by which he covenanted to pay to his creditors 1s. 6d. in the pound within three months, and 1s. in the pound within twelve months after the execution of the deed. The plaintiff asserted that these covenants had not been performed, but the defendant asserted that the sums covenanted to be paid had either been paid or tendered. The defendant accordingly brought this action and recovered judgment; and it was upon this judgment that the defendant sought to issue execution.

Kenealey shewed cause against the rule. —The question depends on section 198. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. Section 197. provides, that after the registration of a composition-deed in conformity with the act, the debtor and creditors, and trustees, parties to such deed, or who have assented thereto, or who are bound thereby, shall, in all matters relating to the estate and effects of such debtor, be subject to the jurisdiction of the Court of Bankruptcy. And the section then goes on to put the compounding creditor under the control of the Court of Bankruptcy, in exactly the same way as if he had been made a bankrupt. By section 198, "after notice of the filing and registration of such deed has been given as aforesaid, no execution, sequestration, or other process against the debtor's property in respect of any debt, and no process against his person in respect of any debt, other than such process by writ or warrant as may be had against a debtor about to depart out of England, shall be available to any creditor or claimant without leave of the Court; and a certificate of the filing and registration of such deed, under the hand of the chief registrar and the seal of the Court, shall be available to the debtor for all purposes as a protection in bankruptcy." The Court to which the plaintiff ought to apply for leave to issue execution is the Court of Bankruptcy — Walter v. Adcock (1) and Ex parte Morrison (2). This is clearly shewn by the meaning put on the word "Court" in the interpretation clause.

Griffiths, in support of the rule, referred to Baerselman v. Langlands (3), and said the question was entirely as to the jurisdiction of this Court.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule ought to be discharged. A deed of composition with his creditors had been registered by the defendant in this case, and all the requisitions of the statute had been complied with, so as to entitle the defendant to the protection conferred on compounding debtors by the Bankruptcy Act of 1861. The question is, what is the meaning of the section, which says, that no process shall be available against the person or property of such a debtor without leave of the Court? I think that may well refer to the Court of Bankruptcy, and that the interpretation clause shews that it does so. That Court has power to suspend the protection of the bankrupt, if it should see fit, and the Court of Bankruptcy in entertaining such an application as this does not in the least interfere with the process of this Court; it only removes an impediment which otherwise exists.

WILLIAMS, J. concurred.

WILLES, J.—If the party were wrongfully arrested we should be bound to discharge him. The cases are collected in Chit. Arch. 11th edit. pp. 770, 771, and there are several instances of privileged persons arrested under the process of one Court, and discharged by another. This protection of the creditor is in the nature of a privilege, and looking to the very general terms in which the powers and authorities of superior Courts of law and equity are given to the Court of Bankruptcy by section 1. of the act of 1861, I am not sure that if process were to issue in this Court against the defendant, the Court of Bankruptcy would not have power to release him. It is clear to me that the Court of Bankruptcy is the only Court which can grant the permission required by section 198.

JAN. 19. } HOGG v. SKEEN AND ANOTHER.

Bill of Exchange—Acceptance by one Partner in Fraud of the other—Title of Indorsee—Onus of Proof—Evidence.

In an action by an indorsee against the members of a firm on a bill accepted in the name of the firm, upon its being proved that the acceptance was by one of the partners in fraud of the partnership and contrary to the partnership articles, the onus is cast on the plaintiff of shewing that he gave value.

The case of Musgrave v. Drake (1) commented upon.

Action by indorsee against the acceptors of a bill of exchange for 38*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* The defendant Skeen pleaded that he did not accept. Issue thereon.

Judgment for want of appearance was signed against the other defendant Pizey Vincent.

The cause was tried, before Willes, J., at the London Sittings after Trinity Term, 1864. It was proved that the acceptance, which purported to be that of "Vincent and Skeen," (the bill being drawn on that firm) was in the handwriting of the defendant Vincent, who was then in partnership with the defendant Skeen, and so accepted the bill in the name of the partnership firm, but for his, Vincent's, own private use. The defendant Skeen produced the deed of partnership, by which it appeared that Vincent was expressly prohibited from drawing or accepting bills in the partnership name; and the defendant Skeen also gave evidence that he had never authorized Vincent to accept the bill in question, and that Hodgkinson, who was the drawer of the bill, knew that Vincent had no authority to accept.

The plaintiff attempted to prove that he had given value for the bill; but the jury found a verdict for the defendant Skeen, leave being reserved to the plaintiff to move to enter a verdict for the amount claimed, if the Court should be of opinion that it was not incumbent on the plaintiff to prove that he had given value.

A rule nisi was afterwards obtained to enter the verdict for the plaintiff pursuant to the leave reserved, or for a new trial on the ground of the verdict being against the evidence. Against this rule—

Griffiths shewed cause.—With respect to that part of the rule which seeks to enter a verdict for the plaintiff, it must be assumed that the plaintiff did not prove to the satisfaction of the jury that he had given value for the bill; and the only question therefore is, whether, after evidence had been given by the defendant Skeen that the bill had been accepted by one partner in fraud of the other, it was not then incumbent on the plaintiff to prove that he had given value for the bill.

[C. Pollock stated that he should contend in support of the rule that the defendant ought to have shewn that the plaintiff had notice that the bill was tainted with illegality or fraud, and that here there was no evidence of such general notice of fraud as is explained in Byles on Bills, p. 113, 8th ed. to be necessary to destroy a holder's title.]

[ERLE, C.J.—It must be taken for the purpose of the present question that no value was given for this bill by the plaintiff; then, the bill being tainted with fraud, that would seem to amount to a verdict for the defendant.

The Court then called on—

C. Pollock to support the rule.—It is submitted that evidence that the bill was accepted by one of the partners in fraud of the partnership articles, is not alone an answer to this action, without further circumstances shewing that the plaintiff had notice of the fraud—Musgrave v. Drake (1). That was an action by an indorsee against the acceptors of a bill of exchange. Some of the defendants pleaded that they did not accept, and it was proved that all the defendants were partners, and that one of them, who had suffered judgment by default, had accepted the bill in the name of the firm in fraud of the partnership, and not for partnership purposes. The Court of Queen's Bench held that such proof without evidence of knowledge on the part of the plaintiff, did not under this issue oblige the plaintiff to shew that he gave consideration for the bill.

[WILLES, J.—That case turned on the form of pleading.]

The decision, it is submitted, goes further than that. Lord Denman, C.J. in delivering judgment, which he stated was after consulting the Judges of the other Courts, said, "Though the defendant shews that this signature was a fraudulent act on the part of such partner, yet, if the proof does not affect the plaintiff with knowledge of the fraud, that does not put the plaintiff to an answer, nor make it necessary for him to give any explanation or account of the transaction."

[KEATING, J.—I see my Brother Byles, in his work on Bills, page 44, adds, by way of note to the case of Musgrave v. Drake (1), that the case of Grant v. Hawkes (Chitty on Bills, p. 32, 10th edit.) does not appear to have been brought to the notice of the Court, though perhaps distinguishable.]

No doubt Grant v. Hawkes is an authority that Lord Ellenborough ruled that the indorsee must shew that he gave value where the bill has been accepted by one partner in fraud of the other partners; and in a more recent case of Smith v. Braine (2), the Court considered the amount of evidence which would be sufficient to raise the presumption that the holder received the bill without consideration, so as to put the plaintiff to prove that he had given value. Here, as in Musgrave v. Drake (1), the acceptance was in the ordinary name of the firm, and there was nothing likely to raise a suspicion of any fraud in the mind of the plaintiff when the bill was indorsed to him. Therefore, it is submitted that the plaintiff under these circumstances was not called on to prove that he had given value. With respect to the verdict being against the evidence, that of course must depend on whether the learned Judge who tried the cause is dissatisfied or not with it.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. The action is by the holder and indorsee of a bill of exchange against the acceptor, and the plea is non acceptit. The evidence is, that one partner accepted the bill in fraud of the other partner, and that he applied the proceeds therefrom for his own benefit; and the question is, whether that cast the onus on the plaintiff of shewing that he gave value for the bill. I consider it to have been now long established, that proof of a bill being tainted with fraud in its inception throws the burden on the holder of shewing that he gave value for such bill. Mr. Pollock has, however, relied on the case of Musgrave v. Drake (1), where there was this species of fraud committed by one partner accepting the bill in the name of the firm in fraud of the partnership; and in an action on the bill by the holder, on an issue joined on the plea of non acceptit, the Court of Queen's Bench held, that on these pleadings and proof that the acceptance was the signature of one partner competent to bind the firm, the plaintiff was entitled to recover without proving the circumstances under which the bill was indorsed to him. But I think that the judgment in that case was entirely on the effect of that plea, and was not a judgment upon the law. At that time there was a variation of opinion amongst the Courts as to what was put in evidence by that form of plea. It was, moreover, not the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench alone, but it was delivered after the Judges had spoken to the Judges of the other courts, and often when other Judges have been consulted the real point is lost sight of. I should have considered it of more value as an authority if it had been only a judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, instead of being founded on what had been learnt from the other Courts. It is to be observed, that Lord Denman there says, "Where issue is joined on a plea of non acceptit, and the proof offered of the acceptance is the signature of one partner competent to bind the firm," which is not the present case, "then, though the defendants shew that this signature was a fraudulent act of such partner, yet, if the proof does not affect the plaintiff with the knowledge of the fraud, that does not put the plaintiff to answer, nor make it necessary for him to give any explanation or account of the transaction." The Court in that case thought that the defendant should have pleaded specially, and did not mean to alter the rule of law that where it is shewn the bill is tainted with fraud in its inception, the onus is on the holder to prove that he gave value for it. My Brother

(2) 16 Q. B. Rep. 244; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N. S.) Q. B. 201.

Willes is satisfied with the verdict, therefore the verdict must stand.

WILLIAMS, J.—As to the necessity of the plaintiff's shewing that he had given value, as soon as there was evidence that the bill was tainted with fraud in its inception, it would have been impossible for Mr. Pollock to have contended as he did, but for the case of Musgrave v. Drake (1). I agree with what has fallen from the Chief Justice as to that case. It was a decision on the form of the pleading. The Court there considered that the signature of the firm, in fraud of the other partner, was not involved, in that case, in the issue on the plea of non accepit, though they considered it would have been so involved if the plaintiff had been affected with knowledge of the fraud, because one partner has no power to bind his co-partner in fraud of the partnership, as against a person who has notice of the fraud. Here, however, no question is raised about the form of the pleading.

WILLES, J.—I also am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. As to the case of Musgrave v. Drake (1), that is distinguishable from the present. That was simply the case of a partner accepting a bill for his private purposes, in fraud of the partnership, he having, however, authority to accept bills in the course of the partnership business; and I think that the Court of Queen's Bench, in their desire to narrow the issue for convenience, omitted to consider the effect their decision might have on the general law. I am satisfied that that Court would not have come to the conclusion they did in a case like this, in which the partner who accepted never could have had authority to accept the bill in question. But treating that case of Musgrave v. Drake (1) as a decision on the pleading, I do not assent to it. The reason why, in the case of partnership, a person is bound by an acceptance which is not his own, but is the acceptance of his partner, is founded on the law of estoppel in pais; it is because he has consented to his partner having authority to accept bills in the name of the firm that he is, therefore, bound by the exercise of such authority (even though fraudulently exercised), as against all persons who have taken the bill for value, and without notice of the fraud.

In such a case he is estopped, from what I why from denying his acceptance. The question, therefore, arises on the plea of non accepit. It seems to me to be a contradiction to say that he can go into the question of whether it is his acceptance by reason of the holder of the bill being holder with notice, but that he cannot go into that question by reason of the holder being holder without value. He must, I think, be as much estopped from doing so in the former case as in the latter. If, then, he may go into the question, it resolves itself simply into one of evidence. I will only add, that my Brother Byles, in his work on Bills, at p. 111 (8th edit.), lays it down that where the bill is infected with fraud or illegality in its inception, the holder must shew that he gave value, stating that "it is not for the defendant to prove the absence of value, but the plaintiff, the transferee, to prove value given either by himself or by some one under whom he claims." I also refer to my Brother Byles's notice of Musgrave v. Drake (1), at p. 44 of his book on Bills, where he treats that case as depending on the form of the pleading, for he puts in italics the words "where issue is taken on the acceptance"; so that it is clear that he considers it as an exception to the general rule by reason of the narrow issue which was there set up. I may add, also, that I am not dissatisfied with the verdict of the jury.

Sale—Terms of Contract—Goods to be taken from Quay—Condition Precedent.

In a contract to sell "500 bales of cotton to arrive in Liverpool per ship or ships from Calcutta," there was the following stipulation: "the cotton to be taken from the quay; customary allowances of tare and draft, and the invoice to be dated from date of delivery of last bale":—Held, that the stipulation, "the cotton to be taken from the quay," was an independent stipulation for the seller's benefit, and not a condition precedent, which the purchaser had a right to insist on being performed.

Action for not delivering 500 bales of cotton according to the terms alleged to have been agreed on.

The declaration stated that the defendants bargained and sold to the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs bought of the defendants certain cotton at 15½d. per lb., that is to say, 500 bales of cotton, guaranteed to be October shipment, to arrive from Calcutta in Liverpool per ship or ships, and to be fair Bengal cotton. The said cotton to be taken from the quay; customary allowances of tare and draft, and the invoice to be dated from the date of the delivery of the last bale. The said cotton to be in merchantable condition; the damaged, if any, to be rejected, provided it could not be made merchantable. Should the said cotton be transhipped into other vessels arriving, the contract to hold good; but if any of the vessels, should be lost the contract to be void so far as regarded such ships only. Payment for the said cotton to be made in cash within ten days, made equal to ten days and three months, and cash on account to be paid before delivery if required. Averment, that all conditions were fulfilled, and all things happened, and all times elapsed necessary to entitle the plaintiffs to the delivery of the said cotton as agreed; yet the defendants made default in delivering the said cotton as agreed, whereby the plaintiffs have lost and been deprived of the profits which would have accrued to them from the delivery of the said cotton, and were prevented from fulfilling a contract entered into by them for the re-sale of the said cotton, and thereby lost great gains, and by reason of the premises the plaintiffs incurred expenses in and about endeavouring to procure the delivery of the said cotton by the defendants as agreed.

Pleas: first, that the defendants did not bargain and sell to the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs did not buy from the defendants the cotton in the declaration mentioned upon the terms therein alleged; secondly, that the defendants did not make default in delivering the cotton in the declaration mentioned as therein alleged.

Issues thereon.

At the trial, before Pigott, B., at the last Liverpool Summer Assizes, the following facts were admitted by both parties. On the 2nd of October 1863 the defendants, through their brokers Messrs. Trueman & Rouse, made the contract with the plaintiffs which was the subject of this action. The contract was made by bought and sold notes, and the following is a copy of the bought-note:

"Bought for account of Messrs. Neill Brothers, of B. Whitworth & Brothers, Manchester, 500 bales of cotton, at 15½d. per lb., guaranteed October shipment, to arrive in Liverpool, per ship or ships from Calcutta.

"The cotton guaranteed fair Bengal. Any slight variation in mark not to vitiate this contract. In case of dispute arising out of this contract, the matter to be referred to two respectable brokers, who shall decide as to quality and the allowance, if any, to be made.

"The cotton to be taken from the quay; customary allowances of tare and draft, and the invoice to be dated from date of delivery of last bale.

"To be in merchantable condition, the damaged, if any, to be rejected, provided it cannot be made merchantable. Should the cotton be transhipped into other vessels arriving, the contract to hold good; but if any of the vessels be lost, the contract to be void so far as regards such ships only.

"Payment cash within ten days, made equal to ten days and three months. Cash on account before delivery if required."

(Signed) "Trueman & Rouse."

On the 8th of January 1864 the defendants declared the 500 bales of cotton to arrive as follows: 250 bales per Talavera and 250 bales per Fort George. The Talavera arrived on the 3rd of February 1864 at the port of Liverpool, with a cargo of cotton, which was landed at the quay there. By the dock regulations goods landed on the quay must be removed within twenty-four hours, and in pursuance of such regulations the 250 bales which had been brought by the Talavera were removed and warehoused by the dock authorities.

The Fort George was wrecked in Carnarvon Bay. The cotton in question, which formed her cargo, was sent by rail from Carnarvon, and was, on the 24th of February 1864, placed in the wreck transit shed of Prince's Dock, Liverpool, and which it was agreed was to be looked upon as part of the quay. This cotton was afterwards removed from the wreck transit shed and warehoused in like manner as the cotton per the Talavera. Applications were made from time to time to the defendants for delivery-orders of the cotton under both shipments, but none could be obtained until all the cotton had been warehoused.

The defendants afterwards offered to deliver both cargoes from the warehouses at quay weights, and without charging warehouse-rent, or to cart them back to the quay and there deliver them to the plaintiffs; but the plaintiffs refused this, and insisted that the defendants had failed to deliver the cotton according to the contract, as they had not delivered it ex quay.

A verdict was entered for the plaintiffs for 2,109*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.*, with leave to the defendants to move to enter a verdict for them or to reduce the damages, and the Court were to be at liberty to draw inferences of fact and to make all such necessary amendments as a Judge at Nisi Prius might have done.

A rule nisi to that effect was afterwards obtained on the ground as to the point on which it was sought to enter a verdict for the defendants, that the stipulation "the cotton to be taken from the quay" was in favour of the vendors, or if not that it was a stipulation only, and not a condition in the contract.

E. James, Mellish and Baylis shewed cause.—The construction of the contract is, that the plaintiffs may if they choose receive from the quay. It is an essential part of the contract that the defendants should deliver the cotton to the plaintiffs during the time the cotton is allowed by the dock authorities to remain on the quay. It is not a mere stipulation in favour of the defendants, but one which the plaintiffs had a right to insist on being performed.—[They then argued at considerable length as to the right of the plaintiffs to recover the damages for which the verdict had been entered; but this is omitted, as the decision made it unnecessary.]

Brett and Holker, in support of the rule.—The delivery of the cotton ex quay was not a condition precedent which the plaintiffs have a right to insist on; and yet to maintain this action they must shew that it is such a condition precedent, and that a delivery anywhere else than on the quay will not fulfil the contract. It is submitted that the sellers are not bound to deliver the cotton in a merchantable condition as soon as the cotton is landed on the quay, or within twenty-four hours afterwards; but the sellers have a reasonable time during which they may make it merchantable, for the sale is not a sale of any specified cotton; indeed, at the time of the contract, the sellers have the power of performing it by delivering cotton brought in any ship, and even after the name of the ship has been declared it was still unspecified cotton, and a delivery of any 250 bales out of the ship would suffice. The defendants therefore had a right to apply any of the cotton brought by these vessels to satisfy their contract, and might have delivered the cotton at any time whilst there were 250 bales on board. Therefore, the stipulation, "the cotton to be taken from the quay," was not a condition precedent to a delivery or acceptance under the contract. The question as to what is a condition precedent, and what only a representation a breach of which will not justify a repudiation of the contract, but can only be compensated by damages, was very fully considered, and the authorities thereon referred to, by Williams, J. in delivering the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Behn v. Burness (1). In Abbott on Shipping, part 4, c. 1, s. 5, it is said: "Whether or not a particular covenant by one party is a condition precedent, the breach of which will dispense with the performance of the contract by the other, or an independent covenant, is a question to be determined according to the fair intention of the parties to be collected from the language employed by them. An intention to make any particular stipulation a condition precedent should be clearly and unambiguously expressed." This passage is cited by Pollock, C.B., in giving his judgment in Tarrabochia v. Hickie (2). — [They also cited Ritchie v. Anderson (3) and Jonasohn v. Young (4).]

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be made absolute to enter a verdict for the defendants. This is an action for not delivering certain cotton. The defendants say that they did not make default, and that they were willing to deliver the cotton. The plaintiffs allege that there was a condition precedent, which the defendants did not perform, and that, therefore, this action lay; and the question is, whether these terms in the contract, "the cotton to be taken from the quay," form a condition precedent. The law on this subject has been made clearer than it was by the judgment delivered by my Brother Williams in Behn v. Burness (1), and the principles as to what would be a condition precedent, and what an independent stipulation or representation, are there pointed out; and I am of opinion that the clause now in question is an independent stipulation for the benefit of the vendors, and that the vendees cannot insist on its being performed for their sake. Looking at the bought note, it appears that the stipulation, "cotton to be taken from the quay," comes in that part where there are provisions in favour of the vendors, namely, "customary allowance of tare and draft." I, moreover, do not see how it can possibly affect the vendees where they get their cotton, provided they are not put to any additional expense, and sustain no damage from delay. I do not think that this stipulation is a stipulation as to place, namely, that the cotton is to be delivered from the quay, nor is it a stipulation as to time; that is to say, that the vendees are to have the cotton the moment the ship arrives. There is nothing to shew which 500 bales out of the cargo are to be delivered to the vendees; and the defendants were at liberty to have delivered under this contract either the first or the last 500 bales which were landed. I see nothing, therefore, in this stipulation as to any particular time or place; and I am of opinion that it is not a condition precedent, and there has been no breach of the contract by the defendants, and that, therefore, this action does not lie.

WILLIAMS, J. concurred.

WILLES, J.—I also am of the same opinion. It struck me at first that the expression "to be taken from the quay," must be construed literally as a stipulation by the vendors that the delivery should be at the quay, and that unless the vendors were ready to deliver at that place to the buyers, the vendors must be taken to have broken their contract; but I am now satisfied that such literal construction of the contract is not correct. Then, in order to determine whether there be any stipulation as to time for the delivery of the cotton in these words, "to be taken from the quay," let us see how it would be if these words were left out. It would be a contract for a delivery within a reasonable time. I think, then, that the stipulation is to be construed in favour of the vendors, and that it means to fix the time after which the cotton is to be at the expense of the buyers. The cotton is to be delivered within a reasonable time, and if not delivered or taken on the quay the expenses of the warehousing are to be paid by the party who was not ready to deliver or take the cotton at the quay. The defendants, in fact, offered to take the goods back to the quay, so that to support the plaintiffs' contention and to enable them to maintain this action, the contract would have to be read as stipulating that the goods were to be taken as soon as the vessel arrived.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the stipulation in question was introduced solely for the benefit of the vendors. It means this, that the vendees are to take delivery from the quay if the vendors are there, and have given notice that they are ready to deliver there. The stipulation was probably introduced to get rid of the warehouse charges.

Rule absolute to enter a verdict for the defendants.

Gaming—Betting Houses Act, 16 & 17
Vict. c. 119.—Place—Recovering Deposit.

The defendant was in the habit of resorting to a certain tree in Hyde Park for the purpose of making bets on horse races. He there received deposits on such bets from many persons, and from the plaintiff among others. It was held by the Court of Exchequer Chamber, reversing the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, that the defendant was not a person from whom the plaintiff could recover his deposit under section 5. of the statute 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119, since the spot in Hyde Park which the defendant frequented was not a "place" within the meaning of the act.

This was an appeal from the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas (1) making absolute a rule to set aside the verdict entered for the plaintiff, and to enter a verdict for the defendant in an action brought by the plaintiff to recover a sum of money deposited with the defendant by the plaintiff as his stake for a bet made by him with the defendant.

The defendant, it appeared on the evidence, was in the habit of resorting daily to a certain tree in Hyde Park, and there making bets on horse races. From 150 to 200 persons frequently collected round him. It was usual for those who betted with the defendant to deposit their stakes with him. The plaintiff having betted with the defendant and deposited his stake with the defendant, now sought to recover it back under section 5. of the statute 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119. The Judge of the Sheriffs' Court, before whom the case was tried, decided in favour of the defendant; but the Court of Common Pleas overruled his decision, and held that the statute entitled the plaintiff to recover.

Hayes, Serj., for the appellant, the defendant, contended that the statute did not apply; that the defendant was not the owner or occupier, or a person acting on behalf of any owner or occupier, or a person having the care of any place used for betting purposes, on whom alone a penalty is imposed by section 4. of the statute 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119; that section 5, giving the right of action to recover back the amount deposited by a person in pari delicto, was confined in its application to the persons mentioned in section 4; and that the statute did not mean to include the shadow of a tree in a public park under the term "place," since there could be no occupier of such a spot, and certainly the defendant was not the occupier, or acting on behalf of any occupier.

Yeatman, for the respondent, the plaintiff, urged that section 5. was not limited in its application to the persons mentioned in section 4, but extended to all persons mentioned in sections 1, 2, 3, and that it applied in plain language to persons using, as well as occupying, any place for the purposes of betting, whether public or private, and that betting in Hyde Park was as mischievous as betting in a house.

POLLOCK, C.B.—We are of opinion that the judgment of the Court below must be reversed. I observe that nothing is stated in the judgment below, except a decision that the locus in quo was a "place" within the meaning of the act. I quite agree with the Court of Common Pleas that the circumstance of the spot where the defendant was being open land, without any house or room on it, would not prevent its being a place within the meaning of the act, if in any other respects it came within the provisions of the statute. But it is necessary, in my view of the act, that the place should be one which has an owner or occupier, or the possibility of an owner or occupier, which this spot had not.

CROMPTON, J.—I am of the same opinion. The judgment below turns almost entirely on the meaning of the word "place" in the statute referred to. I think that the judgment of the under-sheriff, who tried the cause, was the correct one. The spot where the defendant transacted the business does not, in my opinion, come within the meaning of the expression "place" in the statute. Section 5. enacts that "any money received by any such person aforesaid" as a deposit on a bet may be recovered back. This refers us to section 4. for a definition of "any such person," and section 4. provides that "any person, being the owner or occupier of any house, office, room, or place, opened, kept, or used for the purposes aforesaid, or either of them, or any person acting for or on behalf of any such owner or occupier, or any person having the care or management or in any manner assisting in conducting the business thereof," whosoever shall receive a deposit on a bet, shall be liable to a penalty. It cannot, in my opinion, fairly be said that the defendant was the owner or occupier of the spot where he met his associates, or that he was acting on behalf of the owner or occupier, or had the care or management thereof. Any one else might go to that part of the park at his pleasure.

* Coram Pollock, C.B., Crompton, J., Bramwell, B., Channell, B., Blackburn, J., Mellor, J. and Pigott, B.

(1) Reported, ante, p. 46.

BRAMWELL, B.—I agree that the judgment ought to be reversed; but I should be very unwilling to reverse it on the ground that section 5. applies to section 4. only. The first three sections of the act speak of houses and places kept or used for the purposes of betting. A person might be the owner or occupier of a house which was used for the purposes of betting by some other person. The owner or occupier not so using it could not be liable under the act. But the person using the house for betting purposes, though not the owner or occupier, would, in my opinion, be liable under the act to repay a deposit received by him on a bet. However, in this case I do not think that the defendant can be said in any sense to have owned, occupied, or used a place within the meaning of the act. What place can he be said to have used? Was it the whole park or the very spot on which he stood, or the plot of ground taken up by those who stood round him? In my view, there was no place here capable of being used within the meaning of the act. A man standing under a tree in the park, and shifting his standing ground, sometimes a yard on one side and sometimes a yard on the other, does not occupy or use a place. If another man had been sitting on the other side of the tree betting in the same way, it would be difficult to say that these were two places being used within the act. The preamble of the act shews that it was intended for the purpose of putting down the use of certain fixed, ascertained betting houses or offices. Here the mischief could be obviated by the police making the men move on. Again, by section 1, any place used for betting is a common nuisance, and an indictment will lie against persons liable in respect of such a nuisance. The defendant could hardly be indicted for keeping Hyde Park as a common nuisance, or for keeping Westminster Hall as such if he had made his bets there. These observations would not apply to the case of a man whom the owner or occupier of a house allowed to use it for the purposes forbidden by the act. The man so using a house by the permission of the occupier would be within the act, and would be indictable for keeping the house which he would be using for the purpose of a common gaming house. I therefore rest my decision in favour of the defendant on the general ground, that there is not in this case any place, capable of being occupied or used within the meaning of the act, used or occupied by the defendant, rather than on the ground that to be within the statute the defendant, if he be liable, must be the owner and occupier of the place, or acting on behalf of the owner or occupier, or engaged in the care or management of the place.

CHANNELL, B.—I am of opinion that the judgment must be reversed, on the ground stated by the Chief Baron and by my Brother Crompton. I do not think that the liability to a penalty, or the remedy for recovering the money paid as a deposit on a bet, is limited to the case of the person who is the owner or occupier of the house or place, but it extends to every person who acts for the owner or occupier to receive the money. But, in my opinion, the place must be a place to which there can be an owner or occupier.

BLACKBURN, J.—I think that the judgment ought to be reversed and given for the plaintiff below. The 5th section, on which the case arises, refers us back to section 4, in which we find that the penalty for receiving a deposit on a bet is imposed upon any person who is owner or occupier, and on any person acting on behalf of such owner or occupier, or having the care or management of the house, office, room or place, and is confined to persons who come within that description. I do not say that an open field is not a place which may come within the description of the term "place" in the statute; but it is necessary to shew that the person against whom the action is brought is either owner or occupier of the place, or acting on behalf of the owner or occupier, or having the care or management thereof. The evidence here shews that the defendant and several other persons were in the habit of meeting under a tree in the park. The defendant was, in my opinion, not more owner or occupier of the place in question than the plaintiff himself.

MELLOR, J.—I am rather inclined to adopt the view taken by my Brother Bramwell; but I think it is impossible for us to say that this was a place within the act under the circumstances of the case. I think, therefore, that the judgment should be reversed.

PICOTT, B.—I also think that the judgment ought to be reversed. I prefer to base my judgment upon the grounds put forward by my Brother Bramwell.

SEMENZA AND OTHERS v.
BRINSLEY AND ANOTHER.

Principal and Agent—Set-off—Pleading.

If a person buys goods of another whom he knows to be acting as agent, though he does not know who the principal is, he cannot set off a debt due to him from such agent in an action by the principal for the price of the goods.

To a count for goods sold and delivered, the defendants pleaded that the goods were sold and delivered by M, then being the agent of the plaintiffs in that behalf, and intrusted by the plaintiffs with the possession of the said goods as apparent owner thereof, and that M, having possession of the said goods, sold and delivered the same to the defendants in his own name, and as his own goods, with the consent of the plaintiffs; and that at the time of the said sale the defendants did not know, and had not the means of knowing, that the plaintiffs were the owners of the said goods, or were interested therein, or that M. was the agent of the plaintiffs in that behalf; and that at the time of the said sale, and before the defendants knew that the plaintiffs were the owners of the said goods or interested therein, or that M. was the agent of the plaintiffs in the sale thereof, the said M. became and was indebted to the defendants in an amount equal to the plaintiffs' claim, which amount the defendants were willing to set off against the plaintiffs' claim:—Held, on demurrer, a bad plea, as it was consistent with what was therein averred that the defendants bought the goods knowing that M. was a mere agent, though not knowing who was his principal.

The third count of the declaration was for goods sold and delivered.

Plea thereto—That the goods were sold and delivered to the defendants by one John Peter Moll, then being the agent of the plaintiffs in that behalf, and intrusted by the plaintiffs with the possession of the said goods as apparent owner thereof; and the said J. P. Moll, having possession of the said goods as aforesaid, sold and delivered the same to the defendants, in his own name and as his own goods, with the consent of the plaintiffs; and at the time of the said sale and delivery of the said goods, the defendants did not know, and had not the means of knowing, that the plaintiffs were the owners of the said goods, or were interested therein, or in the said sale thereof, or that the said J. P. Moll was the agent of the plaintiffs in that behalf; and at the time of the said sale and delivery of the said goods, and before the defendants knew that the plaintiffs were the owners of the said goods, or any of them, or interested therein, or that the said J. P. Moll was the agent of the plaintiffs in the sale thereof, the said J. P. Moll became and was at the commencement of this suit, and still is, indebted to the defendants in an amount equal to the plaintiffs' claim for money payable by the said J. P. Moll to the defendants for goods sold and delivered by the defendants to the said J. P. Moll, and for money found to be due from the said J. P. Moll to the defendants, on accounts stated between them, which amount the defendants are willing to set off against the plaintiffs' claim.

Demurrer and joinder in demurrer.

Sir G. Honyman, in support of the demurrer.—The plea is bad; it does not allege that the defendants did not know that Moll was only an agent, but only alleges that the defendants did not know that the plaintiffs were owners of the goods, and that Moll was the agent of the plaintiffs. No doubt, the plea follows the form given in Bullen's Precedents of Pleading, 2nd edit. p. 580; but in this respect it departs from the forms in Chitty on Pleading, 7th edit. pp. 122, 123, and the other authorities. In Purchell v. Salter (1) it was averred in the plea that the defendant bought the goods of Mason as his, and did not know that Mason was only an agent in that behalf; and in Carr v. Hinchliff (2) the plea denied that the defendant knew that the plaintiff was interested in the goods, and alleged that the defendant bought them as the goods of the agent. In fact, in all the precedents of such a plea of set-off, there is an averment either that the defendant bought the goods as the goods of the agent, or else in ignorance that the agent was an agent in the matter. The case of Maans v. Henderson (3) shews that telling a broker, with whom a party effected an insurance on a vessel in time of war with this country, that the vessel was neutral, was sufficient indication to the broker that such party was not a principal, but agent only, and therefore that the broker had no right of set-off as between him and the principal. The case of Dresser v. Norwood (4) turned on how far the knowledge of the agent of the purchaser is the knowledge of his principal. There the purchaser, who bought through his agent goods of a factor, did not know that they were not the factor's own goods, but his agent did; and in this Court it was held, that he was not affected with such knowledge, and might set off, therefore, a debt due to him from the factor against a claim by the owner of the goods. This decision was, however, reversed by the Court of Exchequer Chamber, which held that the purchaser was affected by such knowledge of his agent. It is admitted, that knowing a man is a factor is not sufficient to deprive one who buys of such factor of his right of set-off; for, as said by Lord Ellenborough in Moore v. Clementson (5), "A man who is in the habit of selling the goods of others may likewise sell goods of his own, and where he sells goods as a principal, with the sanction of the real owner, the purchaser who is thus led to give him credit shall on no account afterwards be deprived of his set-off by the intervention of any third person." Here it is consistent with this plea that at the time the debt sought to be set off was incurred, the defendants knew that the goods were not Moll's; and in that case the authorities shew the defendants would not be allowed their set-off.

Watkin Williams, contra.—The plea avers, that at the time of the said sale Moll was indebted to the defendants; what is afterwards averred about Moll being indebted to the defendants before the defendants knew the plaintiffs were owners, or that Moll was the agent of the plaintiffs, is superfluous; for the plea could not be proved without shewing that Moll's debt was incurred either before or at the time of the sale.

[WILLES, J.—The plea would be better if it were much shorter. ERLE, C.J.—You had better amend and strike out the averment of want of knowledge by the defendants that Moll was the agent of the plaintiffs. WILLES, J.—It would be better to aver that Moll sold the goods as principal. What is averred about having possession of the goods he sold as his own, is only evidence that he sold them as principal.]

It is submitted that the plea is good in its present form and without amendment. The rule is laid down broadly in George v. Clagett (6), that if the owner of goods empowers an agent to sell the goods as the goods of the agent, and the purchaser so purchased them, he has a right to set off against the claim by the principal a debt due to him from the agent. In Fish v. Kempton (7), Wilde, C.J. says, "Where goods are placed in the hands of a factor for sale, and are sold by him under circumstances that are calculated to induce and do induce a purchaser to believe that he is dealing with his own goods, the principal is not permitted afterwards to turn round and tell the vendee that the character he himself has allowed the factor to assume did not really belong to him." The present case is within the principle of that case, and also of Moore v. Clementson (5), but distinguishable from the facts in both of those cases, as the purchaser in each of them had notice at the time of his purchase that the seller was acting as agent for another. The objection taken to this plea is really only matter of special demurrer, and the plea is substantially the same as in Carr v. Hinchliff (2). The plaintiffs ought to have raised the point they are now making, not by way of objection to the plea, but by replying that the defendants knew that Moll was a mere agent when he sold the goods.

Sir G. Honyman replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

WILLES, J. (Feb. 27) delivered the judgment of the Court (8).—This was an action for goods sold and delivered. The sixth plea, the validity of which is in question, alleged a set-off against a person named Moll, who is stated to have been the factor of the plaintiffs. To that plea the plaintiffs have demurred and the defendants joined in demurrer. The case was argued before the Lord Chief Justice, my Brother Keating and myself, and we took time to consider. The question is, whether the plea sufficiently identifies Moll with the plaintiffs so as to shew that a set-off against him is available in an action by them; and there was an attempt to sustain that by reference to a series of authorities beginning with that of George v. Clagett (6). The plea alleges that Moll was intrusted by the plaintiffs with the possession of the goods, and that he sold them as his own goods with the consent of the plaintiffs; and then it goes on to state that at the time of the sale and delivery the defendants knew not and had no means of knowing that the plaintiffs were the owners of the goods or were interested therein, or in the sale, or that Moll was the plaintiffs' agent, and that at the time of the sale and delivery of the goods, and before the defendants knew that the plaintiffs were the owners of the goods or in any manner interested therein, or that Moll was the agent of the plaintiffs in the sale thereof, Moll became indebted to them (the defendants) in the amount which they seek to set-off. It is necessary to consider whether the averments in the plea satisfy the conditions under which a debt due by a factor can be set off against the principal. The rule of law is well and clearly stated in the marginal note to George v. Clagett (6), that "if a factor sells goods as his own, and the buyer knows nothing of any principal, the buyer may set off any demand he may have on the factor, against the demand for the goods made by the principal." We may observe, as has often been pointed out, and clearly so by Holroyd, J. in the case of Carr v. Hinchliff (2), that the setting up as a defence against the principal that which would be a defence against the factor, with the view of extinguishing the debt by payment in that way, was a right which the defendant had; but that the difficulty was in applying the Statute of Set-off, and in saying that the terms of the statute were satisfied, so that the debt of the factor should, for the purpose of the action, be considered as the debt of the principal, who was the plaintiff. That difficulty, however, was got over, and the factor and the principal were identified by that decision for the purpose of the statute; and it was held, that the existence of a set-off, without the knowledge of the agency, enabled the debtor to set up against the principal the defence of set-off as a quasi extinguishment, notwithstanding the literal words of the Statute of Set-off. In order to make the defence a valid defence within the rule stated, it seems obvious that the plea must shew that the contract was made by a person whom the plaintiff intrusted with the possession and ownership of the goods; that he sold them as his own, in his own name as principal, with the authority of the plaintiff; and that the defendant then believed him to be the principal in the transaction. Upon the true construction of this plea, however, taking all the averments together, it is, we think, consistent with the statements in it that the seller Moll was a factor, and so sold the goods, as it is usual for a factor to do, as his own, and yet, that the defendants may have bought the goods knowing that the seller was not the true owner, and that he had a principal, but not knowing who that principal was; and so the averments in the plea would be proved. Indeed, the plea studiously avoids stating that which is the gist of such a defence, namely, that the defendant knew nothing of any principal. We think the principle that is laid down in George v. Clagett (6) should not be extended to a case in which a buyer dealing with an agent knew that he was an agent, though he did not know what principal he represented. We regret that we are obliged to decide this case on the construction of the plea, but Mr. Watkin Williams refused to assent to the suggestion which was thrown out by the Court, that he should amend the plea. We are obliged, therefore, to put a construction upon the plea, and having done so, it is what we have stated, that it does not amount in point of law to a defence. The plaintiffs at the trial will do well to have the facts specially found. Upon the construction of the plea the plaintiffs, if they are entitled to succeed upon the facts, will be in a condition to obtain the judgment of the Court, at least upon demurrer.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

Feb. 11. } BOURNE v. FOSBROOKE.

Trover—Possession against a Wrong-doer—Jus Tertii—Married Woman—Husband's Right to Property.

Plaintiff when a young child resided with her aunt in the house of the defendant's testator, where the aunt lived as house-keeper, and the plaintiff was almost adopted into the testator's family. The aunt was a married woman living apart from her husband who had deserted her, and previously to her death she gave the plaintiff some articles of jewelry and apparel; part of these the plaintiff gave the testator to keep for her, and the rest she placed in her own boxes in the testator's house. Upon the aunt's death her husband once called and claimed her effects, but the testator repudiated the husband's right, and the husband never afterwards claimed them or interfered further in the matter. When the testator died, which happened whilst the plaintiff was away at school, the defendant as executor took possession of the articles which had been so given to the plaintiff, and refused to restore them to her:—Held, that the plaintiff was in possession so as to be entitled to maintain an action against the defendant for these articles; and that it was not competent to the defendant to set up the right of the aunt's husband as an answer to the action.

Detinue and trover, for jewelry and wearing apparel.

Pleas to the count in detinue, non detinet, and to the other count not guilty, and to the whole declaration not possessed.

The cause was tried, at the last Summer Assizes, at Leicester, before Channell, B.

The plaintiff was an infant of seventeen years of age and sued by her father as her next friend.

The defendant was the executor of the Rev. Philip Fosbrooke, the vicar of Lockington, near Derby. For a long time previous to 1853 one Susan Philips had been in the service of the testator as house-keeper; and in 1853 the plaintiff, who was the niece of Susan Philips and then a child of five or six years old, went to visit her aunt at the house of the testator, who became much attached to the plaintiff, and ultimately had her to reside permanently with her aunt at his house. She was placed at school by the testator at his expense, and she spent her holidays at the testator's house, which, in fact, became her home.

The aunt, Susan Philips, died at the testator's house in February 1853, but the plaintiff continued in the same position there as before the aunt's death.

It appeared that the aunt had in her lifetime given her watch and various other articles, consisting of jewelry and wearing apparel, to the plaintiff, and that some of these the plaintiff had asked the testator to take care of for her, and that others she had put in her boxes in his house.

Susan Philips had married in 1851, but her husband deserted her shortly after her marriage, and they never afterwards lived together; but upon her death he came once to the testator's residence, at Lockington, and claimed the effects left by his wife, when the testator refused to give them up to him, saying that there were expenses, which must be paid before he could have them, and that he had no claim upon them because he was living in adultery. The husband never made any further claim in respect of these articles.

The plaintiff having spent her holidays as usual at the testator's residence returned to school on the 9th of January 1864, and the testator died on the 13th of that month, having before his death labelled some of the plaintiff's things with her name.

The defendant took possession, as executor, of the house and effects, giving up to the plaintiff the things labelled with her name, but refusing to give her some of the articles alleged to have been given to her by her aunt, and also some others which she said had been given her by the testator in his lifetime.

The jury found, that as to the articles given to the plaintiff by her aunt there had been a transfer of possession of them to the plaintiff; and that they were of the value of 25*l*. As to the other goods claimed by gift from the testator the jury found that there had been no transfer of possession of them to the plaintiff, though there was a verbal gift; consequently no further question arose as to those goods. Under the direction of the learned Judge, a verdict was entered generally for the defendant, leave being reserved to move to set it aside and enter a verdict for the plaintiff for 25*l*., on the ground that the plaintiff was entitled to maintain this action, notwithstanding that Susan Philips was a married woman.

O'Malley having accordingly obtained a rule—

Keane and Merewether shewed cause.—Susan Philips, the plaintiff's aunt, being a married woman, the articles in question belonged to her husband and she had no power of disposing of them. It is true, that where a married woman takes personal property to her separate use she has in equity a right to dispose of it—Fettiplace v. Gorges (1); but even in equity, unless property has been settled to the separate use of the wife, not only such property but the produce of it belongs to the husband—Lamphir v. Creed (2). The case of Carne v. Brice (3) is a strong authority to shew that what is claimed here by the plaintiff belonged to the husband of her aunt. In that case the property in wearing apparel bought for herself by a wife living with her husband, out of money settled to her separate use before marriage, was held to vest in the husband, and to be liable to be taken in execution for his debts. To the same effect is Messenger v. Clarke (4). That, too, meets the argument which may be made on the other side, that the husband and wife in the present case were not living together; for in Messenger v. Clarke (4) the wife was living separately from her husband, and yet where she had invested some savings out of the allowance she received from her husband in the funds, and had afterwards shortly before her death sold it out and given it to the defendant, it was held that the husband was entitled to recover it back. In Bird v. Pegrum (5) Williams, J., in the course of the argument, says, "Can it be contended that a Court of law recognizes a married woman's right to have money of her own in her possession? Where goods and chattels, furniture for instance, are settled on a married woman, without the intervention of a trustee, it cannot be doubted that, in the eye of the law, they belong to the husband; although in a Court of equity he would be considered as a trustee for his wife." Tugman v. Hopkins (6) also supports the husband's right, and shews that the wife had here no jus disponendi. If a married woman die when living apart from her husband, and a stranger in the absence of her husband pay no more than is suitable to her rank for her funeral, the husband is liable to repay the funeral expenses, although he has never been asked to bury his wife, if he has not been prevented from discharging that duty by any fraud or misconduct of the person who is at the expense of such funeral—Bradshaw v. Beard (7). The doctrine of paraphernalia does not apply here. Jewelry is not suitable to the station in life of a housekeeper, and even if these articles were paraphernalia she had no right to part with them as against the husband or his creditors—Graham v. Londonderry (8). Strong evidence is required to shew that a husband divested himself of his property and engaged to hold it as trustee for the separate use of his wife—Waller v. Hodge (9). Here, however, the husband interfered and claimed the property, and the defendant has a right therefore to set up the husband's title.

O'Malley and Markby, in support of the rule.—All the cases cited in favour of the defendant are cases in which there were either claims of the execution creditor, executor or the husband himself. These goods were taken out of the plaintiff's possession by a wrong-doer, and she has a right to say, "You do not claim under the husband of the deceased woman," for the defendant's testator had repudiated the husband's right. The husband had no right to claim the goods from the donee of the wife, because under the present circumstances his consent to the gift will be presumed—Ringham v. Clements (10).

[SMITH, J.—There she was handing them over for his benefit.]

The evidence in the present case was sufficient to have justified the jury in finding that the wife had been authorized by her husband to make these dispositions. Moreover, there are cases where a person with no legal title, but in possession, may maintain trover against a wrong-doer—Sutton v. Buck (11), Wilbraham v. Snow (12). Here, at all events, the plaintiff had a good right to these goods as against all but her aunt's husband. The defendant is a mere wrong-doer, and cannot set up the husband's title. The case of Fyson v. Chambers (13) shews that a mere wrong-doer cannot in trover, by the administrator of a deceased bankrupt, set up the title of the assignees, unless they have interfered; and this is approved of by Herbert v. Sayer (14). The difference between the present case and that of Buckley v. Gross (15) is, that there it was obvious that the possession was against the consent of the true owner.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be made absolute. The plaintiff claims to have a right to recover from the defendant the value of certain articles of which the defendant had taken possession. The defendant was the executor of Philip Fosbrooke, and disposed of the things in the house, as he thought, in the performance of his duty as executor. The plaintiff's aunt had lived with the testator as housekeeper, and the present plaintiff was invited to stay in the house and was almost adopted into the family. The claim made by the plaintiff was of a great many articles appertaining to women's dress and ornaments, which she alleged had become hers in the testator's lifetime, and a great contest was made at the trial whether the property in them passed to the plaintiff; and the jury, as to many of them said that it did not, and therefore the executor had a right as to them; but as to a class of articles, of the value of 25*l.*, the jury found that they had been given to the plaintiff by the aunt, and that the aunt had transferred the possession of them to her. It is a rule of law that personal property cannot pass by parol gift without a transfer of possession, and hence arose the contest at the trial, whether these things were given and so transferred; and the jury found that they were. Then an objection was taken, for the defendant, that the housekeeper was at the time a married woman, and that, therefore, the articles were the property of the husband, and the gift operated naught. Now, in point of law, the learned Judge was right in holding that such was the law of England; and I do not contravene it, nor do I decide the point as to an authority being presumed in the wife to give away these things, by reason of her having been deserted by her husband for nearly twelve years, and allowed to receive them as gifts. When that point is before the Court, it will be disposed of. But I am of opinion that, here, the plaintiff did not derive any property as against the husband of her aunt, and it is very material to understand who the party was against whom the plaintiff was claiming the articles. If the husband had taken them from the plaintiff, she would have acquired nothing as against the husband; but I think she can maintain this action against the defendant, because the rule of law is, that a person in lawful possession of an article has a right to recover, if a wrongdoer takes it away. A person taking an article with the authority of the owner is not a wrong-doer, but a person taking it without colour of title is a wrong-doer, and as against him a person who has had lawful possession of it may maintain an action for it. That is the result of the well-known case of the chimney-sweeper—Armory v. Delamirie (16), where a chimney-sweeper's boy found a jewel, and took it to a goldsmith's shop, and the goldsmith kept the stones; and it was held that the boy had a right to recover the value in an action of trover. Now it seems to me, that although the plaintiff was a school-girl going backwards and forwards, visiting the testator from time to time and receiving these presents, and leaving them at his house, she was in law in possession of these articles. Possession is a very ambiguous term. A person has possession of an article although he has not the article about him. Now these presents were placed, some in boxes in the testator's house, and others of them she handed over to the testator to keep for her, and they were in her possession. Handing them to him to keep for her, and he agreeing to keep them for her, they remained in her possession in the drawer in which he placed them. Therefore they were lawfully in her possession as much as the property, in the case of Fyson v. Chambers (13), was in the possession of Mr. Fyson. Now, we should have had great difficulty in this case if the husband had come forward and demanded the goods, and the defendant had agreed to hold them on the husband's account, so as to have enabled the defendant to have come in under the husband. But considering what the testator said when the husband came and claimed the articles, which though the testator was wrong in his law is important as shewing the terms on which he held such articles, I see nothing to authorize the defendant in refusing to give them up to the plaintiff. He is not justified in setting up the right of the husband.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. If the defendant had been in a position to avail himself of the title of the husband, he would have had a good answer to this action; and that in truth was the only question on which the learned Judge gave his opinion. But here the defendant cannot avail himself of the title of the husband, because his testator repudiated the title of the husband. The jury have found, that in point of fact possession was transferred by the wife to the niece. Therefore, the possession was in the plaintiff, and there is nothing to shew that the defendant obtained a position which can prevail against that possession which the jury have so found in the plaintiff.

SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is clear that the defendant had no right to these goods. Neither he nor the testator had any title to them, and on the only occasion when the husband claimed them the testator elected to keep them. The only question is, had the plaintiff a sufficient possession of the articles? It is impossible to say that she had not, except as against the husband. They were in the possession of her aunt, and the husband never interfered with them. She handed them to her niece, and the husband might perhaps have confirmed the gift. Then it was not shewn that that possession once vested in her was ever divested. The goods remained in the house of the testator by his permission, and she had a right to them against all the world but the real owner, and he has not come in to claim them. The case of Buckley v. Gross (15) does not interfere with our judgment; Crompton, J. says, in that case, "No doubt, bare possession is sufficient to maintain trover or trespass as against a wrongdoer, who takes the article from the person having possession. It does not, however, appear to me that the plaintiff was 'the finder,' within the case of Armory v. Delamirie (16); he rather became possessed of the tallowfeloniously or fraudulently (whichever his dealing with it may be called), and he was not a mere innocent finder." Here it seems to me that the plaintiff was a perfectly innocent holder. I think that she is entitled to maintain the action for these articles, notwithstanding that her aunt was a married woman, and that therefore the rule should be made absolute.

Rule absolute.

1864. } CAPEL v. POWELL AND
Nov. 26.* } ANOTHER.

Husband and Wife—Divorce à vinculo—Liability of Husband.

After a divorce à vinculo matrimonii, a man is not liable to be sued, jointly with his former wife, for a tort committed by her during the coverture.

This was an action, tried before Martin, B., at the last Surrey Assizes.

The action was brought against one Powell and a person named Caroline Nickel, and the declaration alleged that the defendant Caroline Nickel at and during the time she was the wife of the defendant Powell unlawfully imprisoned the plaintiff.

The defendant Caroline Nickel pleaded not guilty, and a justification. The defendant Powell denied the coverture at the time the trespass was committed.

It appeared at the trial that at the time of the alleged false imprisonment the two defendants were married, but were living apart by mutual consent. Subsequently the husband obtained a divorce à vinculo matrimonii, and after the divorce the plaintiff brought this action.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, whereupon the learned Judge ordered the verdict to be entered against the defendant Caroline Nickel only, reserving leave to the plaintiff to move to enter the verdict against Powell, if the Court should think that he was also liable.

Daly having obtained a rule accordingly, Hawkins and Sir G. Honyman shewed cause.—They contended that all liability of the husband for the tort of the wife ceased with the termination of the coverture, in exactly the same way as if the husband had died. They referred to 1 Chit. Pl. 104; Head v. Briscoe (1).

Daly and Houston, contra, referred to Marshall v. Rutton (2), and 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85. ss. 25, 26.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. I think a husband after he has been divorced from his wife is not liable for a tort committed by her during the coverture. The whole question turns upon the point whether he is so liable, and I think it is apparent that he is not. During the coverture the wife has, in law, no separate existence, and she can neither sue nor be sued in any court. For any wrong committed by her she is liable; but, because she has no separate existence, she cannot be sued alone, and her husband must be joined with her. If the wife dies after an action has been commenced against her and her husband, the action abates, but if the husband dies, then the action goes on against her. It is clear, therefore, to my mind that the only reason why the husband is joined at all in such an action is from the disability of the wife to sue or be sued alone. But as soon as there has been a divorce à vinculo matrimonii that disability ceases; she is in the same position as if she had never been married, and the husband ought no longer to be joined. Where the marriage is not dissolved, but the parties are judicially separated, then it is necessary to make some provision for a state of things not recognized by the common law; for Head v. Briscoe (1) is an authority that for wrongs committed by the wife during the coverture the husband is jointly liable, even though they might be living entirely separate. This was done by the provisions of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, which have been referred to. But there was no necessity to make any analogous provision for a dissolution of marriage, for which the common law is sufficient. I, therefore, think that this rule ought to be discharged.

KEATING, J. concurred.

Rule discharged.

 v. HUTCHINSON.

Damages, Measure of—Sale of Goods—Damages for Delay where no Market—Sub-Sales.

Plaintiffs bought caustic soda of the defendant, part to be shipped in June, part in July, and the rest in August. The defendant knew at the time of the sale that the plaintiffs bought to sell again on the Continent, and that it was to be shipped from Hull, but not that it was for Russia, although he learned this also before the end of August. The defendant neglected to deliver any such soda during the time contracted for, but he delivered a portion in September and October. There was no market for caustic soda, and the plaintiffs, who had contracted for the re-sale of the soda to H, a merchant in Russia, lost the profit on such re-sale in respect of the soda which was not delivered at all, and, by reason of the approach of winter in the Baltic, were obliged to pay an increased rate of freight and insurance on the shipment of the soda which was delivered in September and October:—Held, that the damages which the plaintiffs were entitled to recover for the defendant's breach of contract were the loss of profit on the sale to H, and also the cost of such increased rate of freight and insurance, but not the damages the plaintiffs paid H. in respect of a sub-sale made by him to a consumer of the article.

Declaration, that the plaintiffs bargained and agreed with the defendant to buy of him 75 tons of his best caustic soda, strength guaranteed not to be less than 70 per cent., in 5 cwt. iron casks or 3 cwt. wooden casks, at the plaintiffs' option, at the price of 16l. 5s. per ton, free, on rails, at Widness dock, less 2½ per cent. discount and 1 per cent. commission; payment, cash fourteen days after delivery; shipment to be 25 tons in June, 25 tons in July, and 25 tons in August; and all conditions were fulfilled, and all things happened, and all times elapsed necessary to entitle the plaintiffs to the delivery of the said caustic soda, yet the defendant did not deliver the same to the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs, by reason of the premises, have been hindered and prevented from performing a certain other contract made by them with one Heitmann, of St. Petersburg, for the sale to him of the said caustic soda at greatly increased prices, which last-mentioned contract was made on the faith of the agreement by the defendant, and by reason of the premises the plaintiffs have been obliged to pay a much larger sum for freight and insurance than they otherwise would have done if the defendant had performed his said contract, and have incurred other losses, and are liable for other damages.

Plea, payment into court of 52l. 5s. 4d., and averment that the same was sufficient to satisfy the plaintiffs' claim.

Replication, that the said sum so brought into court was not enough to satisfy the claim of the plaintiffs. Issue thereon.

The cause was tried, before Willes, J., at the London Sittings, in Michaelmas Term last, when the following facts were given in evidence. The defendant was a soda-manufacturer, at Liverpool, and in May 1863 he contracted with the plaintiffs, who were merchants, at Newcastle-on-Tyne, to sell to them 75 tons of caustic soda, to be shipped 25 tons in June, 25 tons in July, and 25 tons in August, as stated in the declaration. The correspondence between the parties shewed that, at the time of entering into the contract, the defendant knew that the soda was bought for sale to connexions of the plaintiffs on the Continent, and that it was to be shipped from Hull; and before the end of August the defendant also knew that the soda was to be sent to Russia, but there was no evidence that the defendant knew this at the time of making the contract. Contemporaneous with making this contract with the defendant, the plaintiffs contracted with a Mr. Heitmann, a merchant at St. Petersburg, for the sale of the soda to him at the price of 17l. 10s. per ton, free on board at Hull, and shipment in June, July and August. Heitmann then contracted with a Mr. Heinburger (a soap and candle manufacturer in Russia) for the re-sale of the soda to him, at a profit. None of the soda was delivered in June, July, or August; but on the 16th of September, and on other days between then and the 26th of October, various portions of the soda, amounting altogether to about 26 tons, were delivered by the defendant at Hull, and afterwards shipped by the plaintiffs for St. Petersburg. The season for shipment at St. Petersburg is closed at the end of October; and after August, as the season draws nearer to its close, the rates of freight and insurance on shipments for the Baltic increase. The difference between the rate of freight which the plaintiffs were obliged to pay on the shipment of the soda delivered in September and October, and what it would have been had the soda been delivered at the times contracted for, amounted altogether to 35*l.* 15*s.*, and the difference in the insurance which the plaintiffs paid came to 5*l.* 2*s.*, the whole together being 40*l.* 17*s.* At the time the soda was to have been delivered, the demand for caustic soda exceeded the supply (its makers being very limited), and there was no market where the plaintiffs could have purchased the article necessary for performing their contract with Heitmann. The plaintiffs claimed, therefore, the loss of the profit they would have made on the remaining 49 tons, had they been delivered, and which profit amounted to 52*l.* 5*s.* 4*d.* This sum the defendant paid into court. In addition to this sum, the plaintiffs also claimed the said sum of 40*l.* 17*s.* for the difference in freight and insurance, and a further sum of 159*l.*, which the plaintiffs had paid in respect of the loss of Heitmann's profit on his sub-sale to Heinburger, and for compensation to the latter on the non-delivery of the soda. A verdict having been entered for the plaintiffs for 199*l.* 17*s.* beyond the sum paid into court, with leave to the defendant to move to enter a verdict for him or to reduce the damages, a rule nisi to that effect was afterwards obtained, pursuant to such leave, on the ground that the damages claimed beyond the amount paid into court were too remote.

Temple and Udall now shewed cause.—The plaintiffs are entitled to keep their verdict for the full amount. It is manifest that the defendant was sufficiently aware at the time of making the contract of the object for which the caustic soda was bought by the plaintiffs, to make him know that if he failed to carry out the contract the damages now claimed would be the natural result of such breach. The defendant knew that the soda was for sale on the Continent, and he also knew that it was to be shipped from Hull. He must have known, therefore, that it was most probably going to a northern port, and, consequently, that the rates of freightage and insurance would be affected by the approach of the winter months. Then, before the end of the time within which the defendant was bound to complete his contract, he distinctly knew the soda was sold by the plaintiffs to Heitmann, in Russia; the claim therefore to these damages, especially with respect to the loss of profit on the sale to Heitmann, and the increased cost of freight and insurance, is within the principle laid down in Hodley v. Baxendale (1) for ascertaining the measure of damages. The plaintiffs, as the defendant knew, were only merchants, and until the article had got to its natural termination, that is, into the hands of a manufacturer, as Heinburger was, the defendant, it is submitted, must be liable for the damages—Randall v. Roper (2). There the plaintiffs, who were corn-factors, bought of the defendant barley warranted to be seed barley of a particular quality, and re-sold it with a like warranty to persons who sowed it, and the crop being of an inferior kind of barley, and claims having been made on the plaintiffs by such sub-purchasers for compensation, it was held that the plaintiffs might recover of the defendant the amount of damage these sub-purchasers had sustained. The rule in that case was adopted by Martin, B., in Josling v. Irvine (3). They also referred to Smead v. Foord (4), Barrow v. Arnaud (5), Dunlop v. Higgins (6) and Mayne on Damages, 16.

Brett and Littler, in support of the rule.—There being no market for the soda, it is admitted the doctrine respecting the purchaser going into the market and purchasing the article does not apply; and as it is not reasonable to suppose that the plaintiffs would give an order to another manufacturer to supply him with the soda he required, it is admitted that they are entitled to recover the amount of their loss of profit on the sale to Heitmann, and that amount has been paid into court. What the defendant disputes is his liability for the difference of freight and insurance, and the loss on the sale from Heitmann to Heinburger. Both these are too remote; and it is on that ground the defendant is not liable. What the plaintiffs are entitled to recover is not all the damage they may have suffered, but only such damage as the defendant may be said to have contracted to make good in the event of his not performing his contract to deliver the soda. That is the principle of Hadley v. Baxendale (1). The rule is thus stated in Mayne on Damages, 15: "The first and in fact the only inquiry in all these cases is, whether the damage complained of is the natural and reasonable result of the defendant's act; it will assume this character if it can be shewn to be such a consequence as in the ordinary course of things would flow from the act, or in cases of contract, if it appears to have been contemplated by both parties." That obviously means contemplated at the time of making the contract. Now, neither of the claims of the plaintiffs, which the defendant now disputes, comes within that rule. All that the defendant knew at the time of this contract was, that the soda was wanted to supply a customer of the plaintiffs on the Continent. The natural consequence of the breach of contract in such case cannot be the loss on any other contract the purchaser may have made. The increased cost of freight and insurance cannot be the result of a breach of contract to deliver goods at Hull. It must only be with reference to some other contract, and the defendant clearly had no knowledge of such other contract as would make him know that the breach of his contract to deliver at Hull would probably occasion this damage. If this be so as to the plaintiff's claim for extra freight and insurance, still more so must it be as to the claim of loss on the sub-contract made by Heitmann—Portman v. Middleton (7).

ERLE, C.J.—This was an action for breach of a contract to deliver certain soda. The general rule is, that a vendor failing to deliver according to his contract pays the damages the purchaser has sustained thereby as compared with the market price of the article at the time it ought to have been delivered; that is to say, where the purchaser has been obliged to go into the market to get the article, the vendor must reimburse him the difference between what he has so paid for the article and the contract price. But if, however, the article is one for which there is no market, another principle for estimating the damages must be resorted to; and according to the rule laid down in Hadley v. Baxendale (1), the vendor is to pay such damages as at the time of the contract he may fairly and reasonably be considered to have had notice that he would be liable for in case of breach of such contract. In the present case the defendant had notice that the soda was bought for the purpose of being sent on the Continent, and I think the defendant had knowledge also that the plaintiffs bought to sell again. Heitmann was the person to whom the plaintiffs had agreed to sell the soda, and if they had been able to have sold and delivered it to him, there would have been a profit to the plaintiffs of 52*l.* 5*s.* 4*d.* That sum the defendant has paid into court, and it is agreed on all sides that the plaintiffs are entitled to as much as that sum. Then the contract was for delivery of twenty-five tons in June, July and August, and a portion of the goods was not delivered at all, and as to the rest the defendant broke his contract in not delivering it until after August. The question is, whether he is liable for damages in respect of such late delivery. The plaintiffs' purchaser was in Russia, and if the plaintiffs had had the soda at Hull in July or August, they could then have delivered it to their purchaser in Russia at a less cost of freight and insurance, and they in fact lost 40*l.* 17*s.* in consequence; that being the difference in freight and insurance between what they were at that time and during the months of July and August, when the defendant ought to have delivered pursuant to the contract, and that sum is what the plaintiffs had to pay. Mr. Brett contended, that notice to the defendant being that the goods were for a purchaser on the Continent, and that they were to be shipped from Hull, was not a notice from which the defendant had any reason to infer that the goods were for a port in the Baltic, and I think Mr. Brett made good that ground. But then the contract has been broken by the defendant not delivering the goods in time, and the plaintiffs have a right to damages for such breach, and the question is, what are the damages they are so entitled to? I think they are such as might in one sense be reasonably expected to arise from such breach. At the time the goods were sent by the defendant to Hull, they were not so available for the Baltic market as they would have been if sent earlier, and I think the plaintiffs receiving the goods as they did in September turned them to the best account they could, and I do not see how they could have diminished the loss by sending them elsewhere. Then 40*l.* 17*s.* (the extra cost of freight and insurance) was the amount of deterioration of the article by reason of the defendant's breach of contract in delivering it in September instead of July and August, and this amount I think therefore the plaintiffs are entitled to recover. The plaintiffs have also claimed damages by reason of the sub-sale from Heitmann to Heinburger. If the goods had been delivered to Heitmann, and he had delivered them to Heinburger, there would have been a profit to Heitmann of 159*l.*, which he has claimed from the plaintiffs, and this the plaintiffs now claim from the defendant. I think this is too remote. The defendant had no notice of this at the time of his contract, and without such notice his liability is not to go on for any number of sub-sales. The defendant is therefore not answerable for this loss, as it is not the direct consequence of his breach of contract.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. As to the sub-contract between Heitmann and Heinburger, it is quite consistent with the state of things at the time of making the defendant's contract that such a contract might not have been entered into, therefore if the defendant knew of an intent to sell, he would not be liable for such remote consequences. This case is different from that of Randall v. Roper (2), where the defendant sold barley as seed barley of a particular quality, and it was sold again by the purchaser with the same description, and on being sown an insufficient and inferior crop came up. It was therefore a matter of indifference there whether the damages which so resulted were incurred by the first or the sub-purchasers; they were the natural consequences of the breach of contract. In the present case, I think the damages arising from the second sale might be too remote, even if notice of such sale had been given the defendant; but, at all events, he entered into no bargain to be answerable for such consequences. With respect to the damages arising from the delivery at a later period than was contracted for, it appears to me that such can be recovered on the ground stated by my Lord. It is not suggested that the plaintiffs could have done anything more than they did, by which they could have made the soda more valuable to them. Indeed, what they did then appears to me to have been not only the most reasonable thing, but the only reasonable thing which they could have done. In ordinary cases, the measure of damages is the difference between the contract price and the market price; and I can quite understand a case in which, where notice is given to deliver goods in respect of a particular contract, when the price under the same would be different from the market price, the amount of damages would be influenced thereby. This was not the case, however, of such notice; and there was here no market for this soda. What, then, must we do? We must see what was the difference between the value of the soda when it was to have been delivered, and when it was, in fact, delivered. Now, if the soda had been delivered at the time contracted for, it might have been easily transferred to Russia; when it was delivered it was also capable of being transferred to Russia, but at a greater cost for freight and insurance; therefore, as a mere question of what was the difference in value of the soda when delivered and when contracted to be delivered, the difference between what would have to be paid for freight and insurance at these periods constitutes the measure of damages; that difference amounts to the sum of 40*l.* 17*s.*, and that sum the plaintiffs are entitled to recover.

KEATING, J.—I also am of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover for the increased freight and insurance, on the ground that the same was occasioned by not delivering the soda at the time contracted for. The same principle was acted on by this Court in the case of Wilson v. the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company (8). That was an action against a carrier for loss, which the plaintiff, a cap-manufacturer, had sustained by the delay in the delivery of cloth which had been given to the carrier to carry. The plaintiff wanted the cloth to make into caps, and it was necessary for the sale of the caps to the best advantage that they should be made up at a certain season, and the delay in the delivery of the cloth caused the plaintiff to lose the season; and this Court was of opinion that the loss of the season might, for the purpose of estimating the damages, be considered as a deterioration in the market value of the cloth when delivered. As to the further damages which have been claimed, I agree with the rest of the Court that they are too remote.

Baron and Feme—Acknowledgment—3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 74. s. 85.—Affidavit.

Where the consideration-money for a married woman giving up her interest in the estate in respect of which the acknowledgment is taken, under 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 74, is to be paid into her own hands, the Commissioners should distinctly ascertain from her that she wishes to pass her property without any provision being made for her.

Quain moved that the proper officer of the Court might be directed to receive and file the certificate of acknowledgment of the execution of a deed by Harriet Dorning, a married woman, pursuant to 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 74. s. 85. The affidavit by the Commissioners verifying the certificate of acknowledgment contained the following statements: "That previous to the said Harriet making the said acknowledgment, I inquired of the said Harriet whether she intended to give up her interest in the estates in respect of which such acknowledgment was taken without having any provision made for her in lieu of, or in return for, or in consequence of, her so giving up her interest in such estates; and that in answer to such inquiry the said Harriet declared that the sum of 1,503*l.* 15*s.* was to be paid to her in lieu of her interest in the said estates." "That before the said acknowledgment was so taken the said sum of 1,503*l.* 15*s.* was paid to her in the presence of me and the said James Street." The officer objected to register this acknowledgment without the direction of the Court, on the ground that the sum which Mrs. Dorning received in respect of her interest in the estate ought to have been properly settled upon her. It is submitted that the affidavit is sufficient. It appears from the recitals in the deed of conveyance that her interest, which was a moiety in the land thereby conveyed, had been held for her sole and separate use. She joins with the owner of the other moiety in the conveyance to a purchaser, and the deed recites a payment to her of the moiety of the purchase-money. Then the affidavit states this sum was paid to her in the presence of the Commissioners.

[WILLES, J.—That is no security to her, because her husband can take it out of her hands directly afterwards.]

Rule 3. of Hilary Term 1834 states the inquiry to be made by the Commissioners making the affidavit, and then says, "and where any such married woman in answer to such inquiry shall declare that she intends to give up her interest without any provision, the deponent shall state that he has no reason to doubt the truth of such declaration." Here the married woman does not claim any provision; she may therefore give up the property without any provision being made for her benefit. All that is required by the rule and statute is, that the Commissioners shall first ascertain by inquiry that she intends to do so.

ERLE, C.J.—We think the officer may receive the acknowledgment on an affidavit by the Commissioner that he is satisfied it was the intention of Mrs. Dorning to convey the estate without any provision being made for her out of the proceeds. On the examination of a married woman by the Commissioners, before they receive the acknowledgment in a case where a sum of money is to be paid to her for her interest in the property, they should always explain to her that payment to her is a payment to her husband, and then they should ascertain from her whether that is what she desires or not.

The rest of the COURT concurred.

Rule refused (1).

EASTER TERM, 28 VICTORIÆ.

1865. } BULLEN AND ANOTHER v.
April 26. } SHARP THE ELDER.

Partners—Marine Insurance—Policy—Underwriters.

S. entered into an arrangement with F., whereby F. was to manage an underwriting business in the name of S., S. finding the funds. The defendant guaranteed S. to a certain amount; and in consideration thereof S. agreed to pay him an annuity, which, on a given state of the profits, was to be increased to a yearly sum equal to one-fourth of the profits; the defendant, however, not to be considered as a partner. S. afterwards married, and by the marriage settlement all the profits were assigned to the defendant and D. on certain trusts, the first trust being to pay out of the profits the said annuity:—Held, that the defendant was liable as partner on a policy underwritten in the name of S.

This was an action to recover 100*l.* for a loss on a marine policy of assurance effected by the plaintiffs and underwritten in the name of Sharp the younger, a son of the defendant, with whom the defendant was contended to have been partner.

At the trial, a verdict was taken for the plaintiffs by consent, subject to the following

CASE.

In the beginning of 1857 the defendant applied to a Mr. Fenn, an underwriter at Lloyd's, to introduce his son to Lloyd's, with a view to his becoming a member of that body. Fenn shortly afterwards told the defendant that he had been before the committee at Lloyd's, and they had suggested that the defendant should give a guarantee for the liabilities to be incurred by his son. This the defendant objected to do, but stated that he might not be unwilling to give his guarantee for a limited amount. Fenn thereupon sent the committee a letter of the 17th of March (set out in the case), informing them of the defendant's objection to guarantees, but that he was willing to put 5,000*l.* at his (Fenn's) disposal, and that he had assured him (Fenn) that he would never let his son stand in want of further aid. The committee, on receipt of this letter, elected Sharp the younger; and at the same time, viz. the 17th of March 1857, Sharp the younger and Fenn entered into an agreement (set out in the case) that an underwriting account should be opened at Lloyd's, and carried on in the name of Sharp the younger, under the management of Fenn, upon the following terms. That as far as practicable all risks taken on account of Sharp the younger, should be identical with those taken by Fenn on his own account, and that exceptions and single lines should be taken as far as practicable alternately, if Sharp the younger required it; that the underwriting business should commence on the 10th of March 1857, and be carried on and the subscription made in the name of Sharp the younger, but the policies, losses and averages be adjusted by Fenn on his account; that Sharp the younger should apply so much of his time to the business as might be essential to him, and Fenn so much as might be required for conducting it, but that Fenn was not to be precluded from carrying on business on his own account; that the business should be carried on for three years, from the 1st of March 1857, after which it might be determined by a three months' notice; that Fenn should keep proper books, &c.; that all premiums and other monies arising or payable in respect of the business should be received by Fenn and paid to the account of Sharp the younger, at his bankers, and all payments and advances in respect thereof be made by Fenn exclusively, Sharp the younger finding the money; that Fenn should be allowed a salary of 300*l.* per annum; that Fenn was to give his best attention to the business; that on the expiration of the agreement Fenn should attend the winding up, but his salary cease at the end of the term; and that no risk should be taken by Sharp the younger personally without the consent of Fenn. Under this agreement the business was carried on by Fenn until the agreement was altered in November 1858, and Fenn subscribed all policies in the name of Sharp the younger. On the 20th of May 1857, Fenn received a letter (set out in the case) from the committee, asking him whether the 5,000*l.* would be placed at his disposal by the defendant on his son's account, and on communicating this to the defendant, Fenn received from him next day a letter (set out in the case) informing him (Fenn) that he the defendant held the sum for his son, and engaged it should be available; whereupon Fenn, without the defendant's knowledge, next day wrote a letter (set out in the case) to the committee, to say he had the 5,000*l.*

for the son's use, and which for his own interest he would take care to secure. The business having proved profitable, by an agreement of November 1858 (set out in the case), Fenn and Sharp the younger, with the defendant's assent, agreed that Fenn should write double or increase the lines on account of Sharp the younger in all practicable cases, and should receive an additional 50*l.* per quarter, as long as Sharp the younger required him to write double or increased lines, and that the agreement should be extended to the 31st of December 1864. Shortly afterwards, and in consequence of this arrangement, Sharp the younger wrote to the defendant the following letter—

“To William Sharp, Esq.,

“In consideration of your guaranteeing me to the extent of 5,000*l.* in my business of an underwriter, until by such business I shall make or acquire from the profits thereof the full and clear sum of 5,000*l.*, after providing for all known losses, I hereby promise and agree to pay to you during your life, in case I shall so long live, but not otherwise, an annuity of 500*l.*, being equal to 10*l.* per cent. per annum, on the sum of 5,000*l.*, this annuity to be paid without any deduction, except on account of the income-tax, by equal half-yearly payments on the 1st of July and the 1st of January in each year, and the first half-yearly payment thereof to be made on the 1st of July next ensuing the date hereof, together with a proportionate part of the said annuity in respect of the time which may elapse between the last pending half-yearly payment of the said annuity and the determination of the same; and, further, that if at the end of three years from the date hereof it shall appear that one-fourth of the net average annual profits during that period made by me in the said business shall amount to more than 500*l.*, then and in that case the said annuity shall thenceforth be increased to a yearly sum equal to one-fourth of such net average annual profits made by me in the said business during the said three years, the said increased annuity to be paid without deduction, except as aforesaid, by equal half-yearly payments on the days above named, and the first half-yearly payment to be made on the 1st of July 1862, together with a proportionate part of the said increased annuity, in respect of the time which may elapse between the last pending half-yearly payment of the said annuity and the determination thereof; and, moreover, in no case are you to be considered as a partner with me in the said business of an underwriter.

“Witness, T. Donnison, 71, Cornhill, London.”

On the 2nd of July 1859, by a further agreement (set out in the case), Sharp the younger and Fenn extended the time to the 31st of December 1870, subject to six months' notice by Sharp the younger after the 31st of December 1864. Under these agreements Fenn carried on the business for Sharp the younger, until and at the time of the making of the policy on which the action was brought. In August 1859 Sharp the younger married, and a marriage settlement was made by and executed between him, his intended wife, the defendant, and one Donnison. This settlement recited the several agreements between Fenn and Sharp the younger, the letters of the defendant to Fenn of the 21st of May 1857, and of Sharp the younger to the defendant of the 1st of January 1859, and the intended marriage, and that in contemplation thereof it had been agreed that Sharp the younger should assign to the defendant and Donnison all monies then in the hands and thereafter to come into the hands of Fenn, in respect of the business on behalf and for the benefit of Sharp the younger, and should also transfer to them certain railway stock, being of the nominal value of 1,500*l.*, and assign to them a policy of assurance on his life for 3,000*l.*, to be held by them upon the trusts and for the purposes and intents thereafter expressed; and that in pursuance of the said agreement Sharp the younger did previously to the execution of the deed transfer all the said railway stock into the names of the defendant and Donnison, to be held in trust for him till the marriage and afterwards on the said trusts. The settlement then witnessed that for the considerations therein mentioned Sharp the younger assigned to the defendant and Donnison all and singular the sums of money, earnings, profits and emoluments which were then in the hands of Fenn, and all such as should come into Fenn's hands on account or in respect of the business, and which, according to the agreements of the 17th of March 1857, 1st of November 1858 and 2nd of July 1859 or otherwise, were, would or might become payable to Sharp the younger, together with full power and authority to and for the defendant and Donnison, and the survivor of them, and the executors and administrators of such survivor, in the name and as attorneys of Sharp the younger, to ask, demand, sue for, recover and receive and give effectual receipts and discharges for the monies, proceeds and premises expressed and intended to be assigned. And Sharp the younger thereby ordered and directed Fenn and other the agent, deputy or attorney for the time being of him in the business, to pay the said monies, profits and premises to the defendant and Donnison, their executors, administrators and assigns, to have and to hold the said monies, profits and other the premises thereinbefore mentioned, and thereby granted and assigned unto the said defendant and Donnison, their executors, administrators and assigns, in trust nevertheless for Sharp the younger till the marriage, and afterwards upon the following trusts: upon trust with and out of the monies and profits arising from the said business, in the first place to pay to the defendant by half-yearly payments, on the 1st of January and the 1st of July in every year (the first payment to be made on the 1st of January after the marriage), the annuity or yearly sum agreed to be paid by Sharp the younger to the defendant by the thereinbefore recited memorandum of the 1st of January 1859; and subject and without prejudice to the payment of the said annuity or yearly sum to the defendant, upon trust in the next place, out of the said monies, profits and premises, to pay to Sharp the younger by equal half-yearly payments, on the said days (the first payment to be on the 1st of January after the marriage) an annuity or yearly sum of 500*l.*, free from all deductions; and also upon trust to pay him when due the dividends of the railway shares, and also the resulting income of the surplus monies, profits and premises to be accumulated and invested as thereafter directed; and upon further trust to accumulate and invest in manner thereafter expressed the residue or surplus after the payments aforesaid of the said monies, profits and premises thereinbefore assigned, until the same should amount to 3,500*l.* and should remain of that amount or value, without reduction on account of losses in the business, and for the term of two years, and from and after the time when the said accumulations amounted to and remained for two years of the amount or value of 3,500*l.* without such reduction, then upon trust with and out of the proceeds of the business to pay to Sharp the younger, by similar half-yearly payments, an annuity or yearly sum of 750*l.*, free from all deductions, in addition to the income of the said accumulations and of the dividends and annual proceeds of the railway shares, and to accumulate and invest in manner thereafter expressed the residue or surplus of the payments thereinbefore mentioned of the profits of the business until the same should amount to 8,500*l.*, and should remain of that amount or value without reduction on account of losses for two years, and from and after the time when the said accumulations should amount to and remain for two years of the amount of 8,500*l.* without such reduction, then upon trust to re-assign the said monies and profits arising from the business to Sharp the younger, his executors, administrators and assigns.

The deed, which was not further recited, but was appended to the case, also contained other provisions, to which it is not necessary to allude.

After the marriage, the said deed of settlement was acted on by the defendant and Donnison; considerable losses were made in the business, and the defendant being called on by Fenn, under the letter of the 21st of May 1857, made advances to a considerable amount to meet the losses sustained. Fenn carried on the business in the name of Sharp the younger till the 19th of February 1860; on that day Sharp the younger stopped payment, and on the 29th of March 1860 he was made bankrupt. Sharp the younger did not keep any banking account. Fenn received and paid all monies for him in respect of the business, and gave him cheques from time to time for such sums as he drew out of the business. These cheques Sharp the younger paid into the defendant's banking account with Hankey & Co., on whom the defendant allowed him to draw cheques till November 1859, when the defendant put a stop to it. Fenn drew his salary out of the funds of the business. The first payment secured to the defendant became due on the 1st of January 1860, and was paid to him by Sharp the younger on the 7th of March 1860, but was afterwards claimed by the assignees under Sharp the younger's bankruptcy as an undue preference, and was repaid. Sharp the younger, between the dates of the settlement and the bankruptcy, drew out of the business various sums on account of the annuity of 500*l.* secured to him.

On the 22nd of December 1859 the plaintiffs effected a marine policy of insurance at Lloyd's in the usual way, which was subscribed by several underwriters, and, amongst others, by a clerk for Sharp the younger for 100*l.* before he stopped payment. A loss afterwards accrued, which rendered the underwriters liable to the full amount subscribed. The plaintiffs were wholly ignorant of the aforesaid arrangements between the defendant, his son, Fenn and the committee of Lloyd's, and also of the settlement, and in such ignorance proved under the bankruptcy of Sharp the younger.

The plaintiffs contended that the defendant, by the effect of the instruments and facts above-mentioned, became a partner or principal in the underwriting business carried on in his son's name, and as such a party to the said policy and liable to pay them the sum of 100*l.* underwritten in the son's name. The defendant contended the contrary. It was agreed that the Court might draw any reasonable inferences of fact.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether the defendant was or was not liable on the said policy as a partner with his son.

J. Brown (Bovill with him), for the plaintiffs. — The defendant was a secret partner. Under the agreement of January 1859 he was to have an annuity out of the business, and under certain circumstances this was to be increased by a sum equal to one-fourth of the profits. No doubt, a distinction has been taken between a payment in proportion to profits, and one of part of the profits, but we need not trouble ourselves with this as the matter is carried much further by the settlement, which assigns all the "money earnings and profit," of the business to the trustees; so that, in fact, every sum paid for premiums went immediately to them. And, therefore, first, even if all the trusts were for the son, the defendant, as a bare trustee, would be liable—Whiteman v. Watson (1) and Ex parte Garland (2), and, secondly, he is clearly so, as there is a trust for his benefit payable by the settlement out of "profits"; and, indeed, a trust which, from being the first, may swallow up all the profits. An annuity payable out of business in this way makes the annuitant a partner—Re Colbeck (3) and Ex parte Hamper (4).

(He was then stopped.)

Lush (Mellish and Sir G. Honyman with him), for the defendant. — As to the agreement, the debt accrued before the end of three years, and, consequently, before there was any calculation on the profits; this is enough to dispose of the agreement, for it is admitted that the provision respecting the first three years does not constitute a partnership. But, further, even as to the increase in the annuity after three years, this is no part of the profits but merely a sum measured by those made in previous years. As to the settlement, the father is already a creditor for an annuity; the deed transfers, not the business, but such "money," &c. as may be in Fenn's hands; it becomes then necessary to provide for the annuity debt, and therefore the first trust is to pay the annuity.

[ERLE, C.J.—Suppose a grocer wants to marry, and assigns by his settlement his business and stock.]

That would be different, because the business would be assigned. Here this is not so, for Fenn's position under the agreement is not altered by the settlement, and the father has no control over him. The settlement still preserves the business as the son's. An assignment of profits to a person to pay himself his debt does not constitute a partnership—Cox v. Hickman (5), in which Lord Cranworth points out that the test is not who is interested in the profits, but who carries on the business.

[BYLES, J.—The question is not merely whether in terms this is a mortgage of profits; but, further, even if so, can the Court see on the facts that, in truth, it is a scheme by which the father really carries on the business?]

There is no fraud in this case; the business begins in 1857, and is so profitable that in 1859 there is an extension of it and the guarantie given, and then afterwards the settlement secures the debt. If this be a partnership, a mortgage of a railway contract to a banker would constitute one. As to Whiteman v. Watson (1), that case is explained in Labouchere v. Tupper (6); the executors took the business, but we do not. And as to the annuity cases, the facts are not clear. The late case of Kelshaw v. Jukes (7) is also in our favour.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that our judgment should be for the plaintiffs. The question turns on the operation of the marriage settlement, and I think that it made the defendant a partner by giving him an interest in the business; indeed, if a losing business, the principal interest. The nature of the business must be considered; there was no place of business, no stock, nothing but a contract with Fenn as to underwriting, and a guarantie by the defendant for 5,000*l.* The defendant was also to have an annuity of 500*l.* for the guarantie. By the marriage settlement Sharp the younger assigns "all and singular the sums of money, earnings, profits and emoluments which were then in the hands of Fenn, and all such as should come into the hands of Fenn, on account of the underwriting business," to the defendant and Donnison. The result of this, together with the power of attorney, was to hand over the entirety of the business to them. With the first 500*l.* they were to pay the annuity, and if only 500*l.* accrued from the business, every halfpenny would have been paid to the father, and there would have been nothing to pay a creditor if a loss happened. The matter may have been without fraud, and all may have originated in a mistaken notion of the defendant that the business would be profitable, and there would be plenty of residue (though if Sharp the younger were to employ Fenn to conduct the business, and were to hand over to me all the profits to pay myself an annuity of 500*l.*, I should think it would look very suspicious), still the entire proceeds went to the defendant till he was paid. He was a principal man. And it may also be observed that the payments were made into his banking account. I, however, rely on the nature of the deed. If this were the case of a manufacturing business, and the whole stock were handed over, it would be beyond argument. The defendant here takes the profits eo nomine, and before any one takes anything. This distinguishes the case from the annuity cases. Cox v. Hickman (5) is a rational decision, and, no doubt, sound. The present case is one against one of the trustees; and in Cox v. Hickman (5) it was admitted that the trustees would have been liable. The business here is also peculiar, and all the proceeds go to the trustees to pay the defendant first. There may have been no notion of overreaching, and the defendant may have thought that the business would be profitable; but the question is, whether the creditors may come on the defendant in respect of the profits, and I think they may.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. We need not decide the question whether a mortgagee of profits is necessarily a partner: we are to draw inferences of fact; and the question is, whether we see an intention to evade the laws of partnership, which a man has a right to do if he can. That this was present to the defendant's mind is clear. The clause in the agreement as to the fourth share of the profits is cautiously worded: "If at the end of three years from the date hereof it shall appear that one-fourth of the net average annual profits during that period made by me in the said business shall amount to more than 500*l.*, then and in that case the said annuity shall thenceforth be increased to a yearly sum, equal to one-fourth of such net average profits." The person who drew this agreement was evidently desirous not to make a partnership, and this is clear from the concluding words: "in no case are you to be considered as a partner with me." Then, by the settlement there is an express assignment of all "money earnings, profits and emoluments," and a provision for the re-assignment of "the said monies and profits." It seems to me that it was intended that the defendant indirectly should have the profits, and these profits were to go into his pocket, not for money advanced, but because of a guarantee. I, as a jury, should be disposed to say that, although in form it may not be so, yet, in substance, the father was to have the profits.

SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The marriage settlement gives power to take the whole of the profits. It is not a mere mortgage; and I think it gave the defendant the rights of a partner; for instance, the right to have an account. I think if it had been provided that he should have half the profits, he would have been a partner; and he is not the less a partner because he is to have the whole. I think it was an arrangement, by which he was to have the profits, as profits eo nomine, and that he is liable as a partner.

LYNE v. WYATT.

Debtor and Creditor—Composition Deed—Bankruptcy Act, 1861, s. 192.

A composition-deed, made between the defendant, a debtor, of the first part, certain trustees of the second part, and the creditors whose names were thereunto subscribed in the schedule of the third part, contained a clause, whereby the parties of the third part covenanted with the defendant that they would not sue, &c. him, and that if they did, the defendant should be discharged from all actions, suits, debts and demands of those by whom he was so sued, &c., and the deed be pleaded in bar:—Held, that if, on the true construction of the deed, this clause applied to non-assenting creditors, it was unreasonable, and that if it did not, there was no release by non-assenting creditors; and that in either view it was not pleadable in bar of an action by a non-assenting creditor.

In this case there were cross-demurrers to a plea and replication.

The declaration was on three bills of exchange and on accounts stated.

The third plea averred that after the accruing of the cause of action, and after the 11th of October 1861 and the commencement of the suit, and before the plaintiff declared, the defendant, being a debtor unable to meet his engagements, within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, a certain deed (set out in the plea) was, on the 29th of February 1864, made and entered into between the defendant of the first part, certain trustees of the second part, and certain persons whose names and seals were thereunto subscribed in the schedule thereunder written, being creditors of the defendant, of the third part. The deed recited that the defendant was indebted to his creditors in divers sums of money, and particularly to the said several parties thereto of the third part, in the several sums of money set opposite their names, and conveyed all the defendant's property to the trustees, upon trust to realize the same, and, after payment of expenses, to divide the residue among all the creditors in a rateable proportion, without any preference; and it provided that the trustees might require any person claiming to be a creditor to prove his debt, by statutory declaration or otherwise, in such manner as is required by the law of bankruptcy; and that any creditor having, at the time of executing or assenting, for his demand, or any part thereof, any specific lien, security or suretyship, might assent and execute without prejudice thereto. The several parties thereto of the third part then covenanted with the defendant that they, the parties thereto of the third part, would not sue, arrest, attach, take in execution, or otherwise impede or incumber the defendant in any manner on account of their debts; and if they should do so, the defendant should be clearly acquitted, exonerated and for ever discharged from all actions, suits, debts and demands of the creditors by whom he should be so sued, arrested, attached, taken in execution, or otherwise impeded or incumbered, and the deed might be pleaded in bar, as effectually as a release under the hands and seals of such creditors might. It further provided that if the defendant concealed his property, or neglected to deliver a declaration or statement thereof, the said covenant not to sue should cease, and the creditors might sue for the full amount of their debts, or such part as they had not received. The other provisions of the deed were immaterial for the present case. The plea then averred that everything had been done to make the deed as effectual on the plaintiff as if he had executed it; that it was duly registered, notice duly given, and a certificate duly obtained; and that the plaintiff was a creditor for his claim, within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act.

The plaintiff demurred to this plea, and also replied that the amounts of the debts due to the creditors, parties of the third part, were by the deed admitted by being in the deed set opposite their names, without being proved by statutory declaration or otherwise, as required by the Bankruptcy Law, while the amount of the plaintiff's debt was not so admitted, and he therefore was not on an equal footing with the other creditors.

To this replication there was a demurrer.

J. Brown, for the plaintiff.—The covenant not to sue is limited to those executing the deed, the parties of the third part. Legg v. Cheesebrough (1) is in point; in that case Macnaught v. Russell (2) is explained in the judgment. The point has been decided on this very deed in the Bankruptcy Courts—Ex parte Smith, re Wyatt (3). If the covenant extended to dissenting creditors, it would be unreasonable; for a debtor has no right to subject his creditor to the loss of his debt on his suing—Dell v. King (4).

[ERLE, C.J.—Suppose the clause struck out, and an action by an assenting creditor, would the deed be pleadable?]

No—Eyre v. Archer (5) and The Ipswich Park Iron Ore Company (6). Either the covenant applies only to signing creditors, or it is unreasonable. In Hidson v. Barclay (7), in the Exchequer Chamber, it is said in the judgment, "We are not to be understood as in any way overruling the decision in Dell v. King (4). . . . We decide the present point in favour of the defendant, because we construe the eighth covenant in this deed as amounting to a simple covenant not to sue, except so far as is necessary to prevent the discharge of third parties, and no more." Secondly, there is an inequality, for whilst the debts of the scheduled creditors are admitted, the other creditors are called on to prove theirs by statutory declaration.

[The COURT, however, intimating that they did not think that the schedule created an estoppel, this point was dropped.]

Sykes, for the defendant.—Clapham v. Atkinson (8) and many other cases shew that such a deed is a defence against non-executing creditors, if it is not unreasonable. The case of Legg v. Cheesebrough (1) has been remarked on in Wells v. Hacon (9), where it was pointed out that the word "actually" was there used. The question is, what is the intention of the deed? and the intention is to prevent actions, not to forfeit debts. In Macnought v. Russell (2) the covenant was more extensive than it is here; all benefit was to be lost under the deed. So also in Gardner v. Chapman (10). In Dell v. King (4) the debt was to be lost; here it may go to the trustees.

[ERLE, C.J.—If the creditors sue, the defendant is to be exonerated from all "debts and demands."]

But the clause as to the covenant being no longer binding if the debtor conceals his property, shews the debt is not gone, and so does the keeping up the remedies against sureties. Com. Dig., tit. 'Release' (E.), the cases collected in 2 Smith's Lead. Cas. (5th edit.), 451, and the recent case of Lyall v. Edwards (11), shew the release is restrained by the intention. The clause is, in fact, a covenant not to sue. He also referred to Dingwell v. Edwards (12), Garrod v. Simpson (13), Walker v. Nevill (14) and Spitzer v. Chaffers (15).

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that our judgment must be for the plaintiff. The question is, whether this is a valid plea, under the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. It is clear that a deed may be valid under the act without a release, and give protection; but it cannot be pleaded in bar as a release—Eyre v. Archer (5). There is a clause of release in this case; and if it had been only a covenant not to sue, the deed would have been a valid bar, as appears from the judgments of Blackburn, J. in Hideon v. Barclay (7), and of this Court in Spitzer v. Chaffers (15). If, however, the clause of release goes further, and entails a forfeiture of debts if actions be brought, that clause is void against non-executing creditors. And I am of opinion that this deed is open to this objection. The words are, "if they should sue, &c. the defendant on account of their debts, the defendant should be clearly acquitted, exonerated and for ever discharged from all actions, suits, debts and demands"; so that if a creditor bound by the deed sued, he would forfeit his debt. I am desirous of construing the deed so as not to make it void. The case of Legg v. Cheesebrough (1) shews that a deed may be valid under section 192. and give protection, and contain a clause of release and forfeiture, provided the forfeiture be limited to the signing creditors; and in that case the Court held that the clause of forfeiture was so limited. The present deed is drawn with a marked distinction between executing and non-executing creditors; the parties are "the persons whose names and seals are hereunto subscribed in the schedule hereunder written," and the release is, that "they the said parties thereto of the third part would not sue," &c.; and if they should do so, the defendant should be acquitted from the actions of "all creditors by whom he should be so sued." The clause is not so clear as in Legg v. Cheesebrough (1). But, at all events, the defendant is in this dilemma: if the clause applies to non-executing creditors, it is unreasonable; if it does not, the present defendant has not executed any release, and therefore there is no defence to plead.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The plea sets out a deed, containing the following clause of release—[His Lordship read it].—Such a clause is unreasonable as to a non-executing creditor; for directly his writ issued his debt would be gone, even without notice of the deed. Dell v. King (4) shews such a clause is unreasonable; the only difference between that case and the present is, that in Dell v. King (4) the clause in terms applied to all creditors, here only to the parties to the deed, and without the act would be no bar. But then the act says, "the deed shall be as valid and effectual and binding on all the creditors of such debtor as if they were parties thereto"; and the case of Dell v. King (4) was distinctly upheld in the Exchequer Chamber as to the present point.

SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. If the clause be confined to those executing the deed, then, according to the case of Legg v. Cheesebrough (1), it has no operation on the non-assenting creditors. I wish to give no opinion on the construction of the deed. It is not necessary; for the defendant must contend that it binds non-executing creditors; and, if that be so, I think that the clause is unreasonable, and cannot operate on non-executing creditors.

Railway—Negligence—Level Crossing.

The defendants' railway crossed a carriage road on a level; there were locked carriage gates and swing gates for foot passengers; the trains were frequent, the crossing was on a curve, and a bridge near to it over the line obstructed the view in that direction. Two trains passed about the same time, and whilst the plaintiff's attention was directed to one the other knocked him down:—Held, that, although there might be no statutory provisions for the safety of such a foot passenger, yet under the circumstances there was evidence of negligence to go to the jury, and the Judge was not bound to nonsuit.

The declaration in this action contained two counts, the first alleging that the defendants' railroad crossed a highway for carts and carriages, yet they did not employ a guard to open and shut the gates next the highway, so that persons passing on the highway should not be exposed to danger, and did not take proper care of the crossing for protecting persons using it, whereby the plaintiff whilst lawfully using the crossing was knocked down by an engine and hurt; the second alleged that the defendants negligently drove an engine so as to knock him down.

There was a plea of not guilty.

It appeared at the trial that the number of trains which passed the crossing was very considerable; that the crossing was on a curve, and that about 150 yards from it there was a bridge over the line which obstructed the view of trains from that direction till they were partly under it. The gates at the crossing consisted of carriage gates, which were locked, and swing gates for foot passengers. The plaintiff, who was deaf of one ear, had partly got on the line, when his attention was attracted by an engine which ran by on the up-line, and whilst his attention was thus diverted, a down train, which passed about the same time, knocked him down.

At the trial, before Erle, C.J., the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, and the learned Judge (who thought there was no liability on the defendants), giving leave to the defendants to move to set aside such verdict and enter the verdict for themselves, if the Court should be of opinion that there was no evidence of negligence.

A rule nisi having been granted pursuant to such leave,

Parry, Serj. and Joyce now shewed cause.—Independently of any obligation by statute, there is a common law liability, and there should be proper care taken and proper notice of the danger given. And according to Scott v. the London Dock Company (1), it lies on the other side to shew that there has been no negligence. As to the statutory obligation, it is true that there is no provision as to footpaths in the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, and that section 47. only refers to carriage roads, but section 46. shews that the road generally must be over or under the railway, and 2 & 3 Vict. c. 45. s. 1. and 5 & 6 Vict. c. 55. s. 9. are still in force, and though they also relate to carriage roads, yet the one provides that steps shall be taken that the "persons, carts or carriages" shall not be exposed to danger, and the other provides for interference of the Board of Trade "for the public safety." It must further be borne in mind that a carriage road includes a footway. This was a peculiarly dangerous place; trains were perpetually passing, there was a curve, and there was a bridge obstructing the view. Some notice, or some man, should have been placed there, and a swing gate was improper.

Bovill and Hannem, in support of the rule.—There is no power in or duty on the railway company to obstruct a footpath. The 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20. now regulates level crossings, and that only refers to the safety of carriages and cattle, and even if the other statutes are in force, the word "person" in 2 & 3 Vict. c. 45. means those attending to the carriages or cattle, and the "public safety" in 5 & 6 Vict. c. 55. refers to the same object. Again, the distinct provision in 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20. s. 48. as to level crossings near stations is in favour of the defendants. What negligence there has been it is difficult to see. The only things suggested that we should have done are that we should have had a notice or a man there, or a different gate. As to a notice, there could be none except that trains were perpetually passing, and that it was dangerous to cross, which was no more than would strike any one, and certainly a person living near the spot; as to putting a man there, the consequence of a decision that we should have done so would be that we must put one wherever a footpath crosses the line; and as to the gate, it is difficult to see how a swing gate is improper.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the rule should be discharged. I am fully impressed with the necessity of not imposing duties on railway companies beyond what the statutes intended. I do not intend to lay down a rule as to footpaths elsewhere, or to interfere with the statute law. The ground of my decision is the great degree of risk in this place; there were many trains, it was on a curve, and near a bridge. The noises of the different trains would interfere with each other, and the bridge would obstruct the sight, and I am therefore unable to say that the Judge was bound to nonsuit.

BYLES, J., KEATING, J. and SMITH, J. concurred.

} LANGLEY v. HEADLAND.

Attorney—Compromise of Action.

The plaintiff recovered judgment and took the defendant on a ca. sa.; W, attorney of the plaintiff's father, agreed with the defendant, that on delivery of certain documents he would discharge the defendant; the documents were delivered, and W. gave defendant an order of discharge, directed by the plaintiff to his attorney; the sheriff refused to discharge, as the order was not directed to him:—Held, that the defendant was entitled to his discharge on condition that no actions were brought against the sheriff or any one else, and that the plaintiff's attorney's remedies on the judgment should not be prejudiced.

This was a rule calling on the plaintiff (upon notice of the rule being given to him and his attorney) to shew cause why the defendant should not be discharged out of custody.

The plaintiff, a minor, having obtained judgment, the defendant was taken in execution at his suit. The affairs of the plaintiff requiring arrangement, his father interfered through a Mr. Wren, his own solicitor, and negotiations took place between Wren and the defendant and his attorney, which ended in an agreement that if the defendant would hand to Wren a certain duplicate and a certain bill of exchange, Wren would discharge the defendant out of custody. The duplicate and bill of exchange were handed to Wren, and Wren gave to the defendant's attorney the following document signed by the plaintiff:

"In the Common Pleas.

H. W. Langley, plaintiff.

H. Headland, defendant.

I hereby consent that the above defendant be discharged from the custody of the sheriffs of London, and request you to take the necessary steps to effect his discharge.

Yours, &c. H. W. Langley,
Witness The above-named plaintiff.
W. W. Wren, attorney, &c.
To Mr. Wallinger,
Plaintiff's attorney."

The defendant's attorney took this document to the plaintiff's attorney, but he refused to act on it as he should lose his costs, and detained the document. An application was then made to Keating, J. for an order to discharge the defendant, who referred the matter to the Court, which made no order on condition that the document was delivered up to the defendant. This was done, and the document was then tendered to the sheriff, but he refused to discharge the defendant, as the document was not directed to the sheriff but to the plaintiff's attorney. Application was then made to Wren to give an order of discharge directed to the sheriff, but he refused to interfere further in the matter, being evidently unwilling to interfere in this question of costs, which had not occurred to him. Application was then made to the Court to grant the present rule, which they did, on condition that notice should be given to the plaintiff's attorney as well as the plaintiff.

No one appeared on behalf of the plaintiff.

Bridge appeared to shew cause on behalf of the plaintiff's attorney, and was decided to have a locus standi.—The same attorney is still attorney on the record, and has a lien on the judgment, and the Court will do nothing to deprive him of his rights. The case of Barker v. St. Quintin (1) was the case of an action against the sheriff and not of the interference of the Court. Here the Court is asked to interfere in exercise of its equitable jurisdiction to enforce an agreement which will damnify the attorney, and they will not do that in face of the doctrine that the Court will do all it equitably can to get the attorney his costs—Ex parte Games (2). The only case in which the Court has so interfered was when there was a new attorney and satisfaction entered up on the record—Marr v. Smith (3). He also cited 1 Chitty's Practice, 11th edit., 137.

Mellor, in support of the rule, cited 1 Chitty's Practice, 11th edit., 137, the judgment of Bayley, J., in Marr v. Smith (3) and Jordan v. Hunt (4).

BYLES, J.—This is a rule calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why the defendant should not be discharged out of custody, and the plaintiff does not appear, but the Court ordered that his attorney should have notice lest injustice should be done, and he has appeared. On this rule we must assume that the plaintiff consents, and indeed I cannot see how he can do otherwise. He signed a discharge directed to his own attorney, and the full consideration has been paid by the defendant. The sheriff sees that the authority is not directed to him, and refuses to release the defendant without the authority of the plaintiff's attorney. This the attorney refuses to give, and the Court on a previous occasion said that they would not call upon him to do so, but ordered that the document should be given to the defendant to be shewn to the sheriff, who says that he will act if he has the authority of the Court. It is true that the lien of the plaintiff's attorney did not occur to Wren, but this ought not to prejudice the defendant, and he is entitled to be discharged. The simple question is, whether it is an answer to this application that the attorney's lien remains, and the cases shew that this is no answer. The rule will be made absolute on the terms that no action be brought against the sheriff or any one else, and further that it shall be without prejudice to the attorney's remedy on the judgment.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. For some time I doubted how far the equitable jurisdiction of the Court could be invoked on these facts. But the Court on a previous occasion ordered that the plaintiff's attorney should restore the document to the defendant, and thereby the Court at least sanctioned his having possession of the document, which he used with the object of getting out of custody. Therefore, as the plaintiff consented to the discharge, and has not appeared to-day, we must conclude that this agreement, though originally obtained by Wren, has been ratified by him, and we must give effect to it; but on the conditions mentioned by my Brother Byles.

May 2. } RAWLINGS v. MORGAN.

Landlord and Tenant—Covenant to Repair—Damages.

The defendant was lessee of a house, and the plaintiff one of the reversioners and lessors. Before the end of the lease the lessors agreed verbally with M. that he should have a lease, to commence at the end of that of the defendant, the house to be pulled down by M. and new premises built by him. The defendant left the house out of repair at the end of the lease. M. afterwards entered, and some time after that the verbal agreement was put into writing, and the house pulled down. The plaintiff brought an action against the defendant on a covenant in his lease for not keeping and yielding up the house in good repair:—Held, that the jury were not compelled to give only nominal damages.

This was an action brought to recover damages for breach of covenant to repair and yield up in repair certain premises, and also to yield up certain fixtures. The defendant paid money into court. The real question between the parties was, whether the plaintiff was entitled to more than nominal damages in respect of the non-repair of the premises; and at the trial the following were agreed to be the facts of the case: The defendant was tenant of a house under a lease for twenty-one years expiring on the 25th of December 1863, and containing the covenants on which the action was brought; and the plaintiff was owner of one-fifth of the reversion. For a considerable period before the expiration of the lease the premises were out of repair, and so remained up to its termination. In June 1863 the defendant made an offer for a new lease, but the offer was not accepted. Before the expiration of the lease the Messrs. Myers became the owners of a fifth of the reversion, and also before such expiration it was agreed between them and the reversioners (of whom the plaintiff was one) that the premises should be pulled down and a lease of the ground granted, at a greatly advanced rent from the 25th of December 1863, to the Messrs. Myers, who were to lay out a large sum in new buildings. The defendant left at the termination of his lease, and the Messrs. Myers entered on the 26th of December 1863, and in January 1864 commenced pulling down the old house, which was demolished by June. The agreement between Messrs. Myers and the reversioners was reduced into writing in March 1864. The condition of the premises at the termination of the lease formed no ingredient in the Messrs. Myers' calculations in making their bargain. The sum paid into court was sufficient to cover the plaintiff's share of the fixtures and nominal damages for not repairing the premises and yielding them up in repair, and a certain sum was fixed on as the additional damage if the plaintiff was entitled to more than nominal damages for such non-repair and not yielding up in repair.

The learned Judge directed a verdict for the plaintiff for the agreed sum, with leave to the defendant to move to set it aside and enter a verdict for the defendant if on the above agreed facts the plaintiff was only entitled to nominal damages.

A rule nisi was obtained pursuant to such leave.

O'Malley and Holl now shewed cause.—The legal title was in the plaintiff at the end of the tenancy. Even if there had been a written agreement at law, there would only have been an action for the breach; but here it was only oral, and did not bind even in equity. Even if nominal damages were only recoverable during the tenancy, the right of action for substantial damages accrued at the end of the tenancy, and cannot be affected by what took place subsequently. It does not lie in the defendant's mouth to say that his breach of covenant did not cause damage—Clow v. Brogden (1), Smith v. Peat (2), Nickson v. Denham (3), Doe v. Rowlands (4), Turner v. Lamb (5), Dalby v. the India and London Life Assurance Company (6).

Huddleston and Beasley, in support of the rule.—In all breaches of contract the damages ought to be in proportion to the benefit which would have accrued from its performance—Marzetti v. Williams (7). Here there was an offer in June by the defendant to repair and to give a higher rent. The offer was not accepted; but during the tenancy an agreement was made with the Messrs. Myers which involved the necessity of pulling down the house. The plaintiff, therefore, never intended that the house should be repaired; its non-repair became immaterial, and he sustained no damage. The decisions in Davis v. Underwood (8) and in Clow v. Brogden (1) were based on the liability to the superior landlord. They also cited Marriott v. Cotton (9).

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. The action is brought against the defendant as tenant for breach of a covenant to keep and leave the premises in repair. In general when an agreement is broken the plaintiff is entitled to recover such a sum of money as would enable him to have what he contracted for. Why in this case should he not recover that sum, or at least more than nominal damages? The defendant says that there was an advantageous agreement with the Messrs. Myers. I think there is nothing in that. The Myers's agree to pull down the premises; but the agreement was only oral, and it was a proposal not binding on either party. Such a proposal is not a matter I should put to the jury as worth much consideration, though I should not exclude it. The question is, whether in law the Judge would be bound to direct the jury to find only nominal damages, and I think that he would clearly not be so bound. We are not called on to say what the amount should be; that is agreed on. If before the cause of action accrued, and during the term, there had been a binding agreement to assign, that would have been more material; but I do not say that even then the jury would be compelled to give only nominal damages.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. There being only a parol agreement by the plaintiff during the term, there was no legal obligation on either party in equity or law; and at the end of the tenancy the plaintiff was entitled to sue for non-repair. It is true that he afterwards parted with the reversion; yet he may have been damaged. He may have got less from the Myers's, or had a smaller market from the state of the premises. It seems to me that even if there had been a binding agreement these observations would apply. I think in such cases the proper direction is, not "You can only give nominal damages," but "You are not bound to give more than nominal damages."

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. The term ended, and the agreement with the Myers's was not in an enforceable form till after. If an action had been brought during the intervening period the plaintiff would clearly have been entitled to recover. Subsequent circumstances cannot deprive the plaintiff of that right. Even if there had been a binding agreement before the end of the term, I should doubt whether there would be any difference; but it is not necessary to decide this.

SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The premises being out of repair at the end of the term, a right to sue accrued; but it is said that there was an agreement with the Myers's which shews that there was no damage. This agreement, however, was not binding; and even if it had been, I should doubt if it could be taken into consideration, though it is not necessary to decide this. How an agreement between the plaintiff and the Myers's can be an estoppel I cannot see; it does not seem to be one either in law or good sense: but I should be sorry to say that a binding agreement would not affect the question of damages without further consideration.

Rule discharged.

May 9. } HARTLEY AND OTHERS v. MARE.

Bankruptcy Act, 1861 — Deed of Inspectorship — Fieri Facias.

After action commenced and before judgment a deed of inspectorship, executed by the defendant, was duly filed and registered, and a certificate thereof obtained; judgment was signed and the defendant's goods taken under a fi. fa. On an interpleader summons the sheriff was ordered to withdraw on the payment into court by the inspectors of a certain sum of money. The plaintiffs obtained a rule to shew cause why part of this money should not be paid to them in satisfaction of their judgment, on the ground that the deed ought to have been pleaded:— Held, that without leave of the Court of Bankruptcy they could not make their execution available, and that the inspectors were entitled to the money.

Whitmore v. Wakerley (1) distinguished.

This was a rule calling on the defendant to shew cause why the sum of 159*l.* 3*s.* 11*d.* and the costs of the application should not be paid out of court to the plaintiffs out of the sum of 165*l.* paid into court in the cause by the sheriff of Kent under a Judge's order.

The action was brought by the plaintiffs as drawers against the defendant as acceptor of a bill of exchange. A writ was issued on the 29th of December 1864 under the Bills of Exchange Act. On the 2nd of February 1865 a Judge's order was obtained giving the plaintiffs liberty to proceed, three days after service of a copy of the order at the defendant's office, as if personal service of the writ had been effected. The copy was so served on the 3rd of February; judgment, for want of appearance, was signed on the 7th of February; costs were taxed on the 8th of February, and a writ of fi. fa. lodged with the sheriff on the 9th of February. On the 3rd of January 1865 the defendant had executed a deed of inspectorship, which was registered on the 2nd of February, the day on which the Judge's order giving leave to proceed was obtained. The sheriff having levied, notice of this deed was given to him, and, on the 11th of February, he served a summons, under the Interpleader Act, on the plaintiffs and the inspectors. The summons came on for hearing, before Byles, J. on the 14th of February, who decided on referring the whole matter to the Court, and made an order directing the sheriff to withdraw, referring the validity of the deed to the Court, and ordering that unless 165*l.* was paid into court, the inspectors were to give security.

After various proceedings (which are immaterial) such money was paid into court, and the present rule obtained.

It is unnecessary to set out the deed, which was admitted to be a good deed of inspectorship, binding on all the creditors; it need only be stated that it contained no assignment of the debtor's property, provided for his carrying on his business under inspection, and contained a clause making the deed pleadable in bar.

J. Brown and Lanyon shewed cause.— The inspectors are entitled to this money. The argument on the other side is that we could have pleaded this deed, and that as we have not done so, we cannot now avail ourselves of it. But, first, the twelve days for appearing to defend under 18 & 19 Vict. c. 67. s. 2. elapsed before the registry of the deed, and it therefore could not be pleaded. But, secondly, whether that be so or not, the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134. ss. 197, 198, are conclusive in our favour. By section 198, after notice of the filing and registration of this deed, no execution against the debtor's property could be available without leave of the Court, which, according to Skelton v. Symonds (2), means the Court of Bankruptcy; and there has been no leave of any Court in this case. This protection is for the benefit of the creditors, as appears from section 197, and therefore no laches of the debtor can be of any effect here; he cannot prejudice their rights by neglecting to plead a deed which may or may not be good. Whitmore v. Wakerley (1) will be relied on by the other side, but in so far as it may bear on the present case, it is contrary to Skelton v. Symonds (2) in this Court. Under the old Bankrupt Act it was held that if an execution was levied on a trader's goods after he had obtained a protection order, the assignees, and not the execution creditor, were entitled to the proceeds—Backhouse (or Bellhouse) v. Mellor (3) and Williams v. Dray (4).

Lush and R. E. Turner, in support of the rule.—This deed could have been pleaded. The deed provides that in any action by a creditor the deed “shall operate . . . as an order of discharge, . . . and may be pleaded . . . in bar.” This would have constituted a good plea in bar—Walker v. Nevill (5), and should therefore have been pleaded, and as it has not been pleaded, cannot now be made available. An audita querela, which is an application to the equitable jurisdiction of the Court, “does not lie where there is any other remedy at law, either by plea or otherwise, and therefore, where the party had time to take advantage of the matter which he has in discharge of himself and neglected it, he cannot afterwards be relieved by audita querela”—Turner v. Davies (6). Whitmore v. Wakerley (1) is in point, and Skelton v. Symonds (2) is not contradictory to it; and as to Backhouse v. Mellor (3), that was an application to set aside process: here the process stands, and as there is no assignment in the deed, the goods are still the defendant's. Section 198. is limited to those cases where, but for the interference of the Court of Bankruptcy, the deed could not be made available, and there is no discretion in this Court.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. The action is by one of several creditors against a debtor. After action a deed of inspectorship was executed, which is valid under the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. After the execution of the deed, its registration and the granting of a certificate of its registration, a fi. fa. issued and the property of the debtor was taken. The inspectors interfered, and an interpleader summons was applied for. The money was paid into court, and we are to say whether the inspectors are entitled to it. The deed of inspectorship gives Mare the privileges of bankruptcy, and section 198. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, says, that after notice of the filing and registration of such deed no execution, sequestration or other process against the debtor's property shall be available to any creditor or claimant without leave of the Court. There has been no leave of the Court in this case, but the plaintiff here seeks to make the execution available. We are to carry out the intention of the legislature. It is said that this section applies only to deeds executed after it is too late to plead them; but it is a universal enactment. I am of opinion that the money must be handed over to the inspectors. We were much pressed in argument with the case of Whitmore v. Wakerley (1). The application there was to set aside the execution, and I cannot exactly see from the report whether or not the argument was, that the defendant was to lose the benefit of the release; our judgment does not conflict with that case, if the judgment of the Court of Exchequer meant that the defendant was trying to get the benefit of a release which he might have pleaded. Again, it may well not be right to set aside the execution; the plaintiff may go through all the regular process up to judgment and execution; but directly he acts and attempts to levy by a fi. fa. section 198. comes into operation, and the Court has power to say you must not make it available. The argument as to laches does not apply, for the sections of the Bankruptcy Act are in the interest of the body of creditors.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. I rely on section 198, which says that if three requisites be fulfilled, viz., the execution of the deed, its registration and the proper statutory notice, the execution is not to be available. All these requisites are fulfilled in this case. There is no conflict with the decision of the Court of Exchequer. The writ of execution is in force till execution is attempted to be levied. It may be prejudicial to set it aside, and we are not here asked to do so, but merely to enforce section 198. so far as is necessary.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. If we decided otherwise, we should be doing what section 198. says we shall not do, i. e. give over to one creditor money which belongs to all.

SMITH, J.—I am also of the same opinion. Section 198. is general in its terms, but if it were read as is contended on behalf of the plaintiff, it would then apply only where the deed is not pleadable. Sections 197. and 198, when read together, shew that this was not the intention of the legislature. If we made this rule absolute, we should, as my Brother Keating says, be making the proceeds available to one creditor.

Rule discharged, the money to be paid to the inspectors.

1865. } PRISTWICK (OR PRESTWICH)
May 9. } AND ANOTHER v. POLEY.

Attorney and Client—Authority of Attorney to compromise Action.

An action was brought to recover the price of a piano. The plaintiff's attorney agreed to settle the action by the return of the piano and payment of costs.—Held, that, in the absence of a distinct prohibition from his client, he had authority to do so; and the defendant was entitled to have all further proceedings stayed.

This was a rule calling on the plaintiffs to shew cause why all further proceedings in the cause should not be stayed, the action having been settled.

The action was brought to recover the price of a piano sold and delivered by the plaintiffs to the defendant. After action brought, the defendant's attorney called at the office of the plaintiffs' attorney with a view to the settlement of the action, and saw the plaintiffs' attorney and his managing clerk.

The accounts given of this interview differed. According to the attorney for the plaintiffs and his clerk, the defendant's attorney having proposed a settlement by the return of the piano and the payment of costs, the attorney for the plaintiffs said it would be better, under the circumstances, to take back the piano, and partly agreed as to the amount of the costs, but objected to a Judge's order and letter containing the terms, as, although he should say the terms would be accepted, he must first advise with his clients. According to the defendant's attorney, the plaintiffs' attorney would not agree to a Judge's order, but himself proposed that there should be a letter containing the terms (viz. the return of the piano and payment of costs), arranged that the defendant's attorney should call next day, and told his clerk to then carry out the arrangement by letter, and never said anything about advising with his clients. The next day the defendant's attorney again called, and saw the clerk, and they signed an agreement or letter, which stated that the matter had been settled, upon the terms that the piano was to be given up in full discharge of the debt, and that the costs should be paid by the instalments therein mentioned. The defendant's attorney proceeded to fulfil this arrangement; but the plaintiffs' attorney refused to receive either the piano or the costs, on the ground that his clients would not agree to the settlement.

An application was made to Keating, J. at chambers to stop the action. The learned Judge thought the agreement binding; but in consequence of the case of Swinfen v. Swinfen (1), declined to make an order, without prejudice, however, to an application to the Court.

Prentice shewed cause.—The case of Swinfen v. Swinfen (1), in Chancery, shews that an attorney has no authority to make such a compromise; and the observations of Pollock, C.B., in delivering judgment in Swinfen v. Lord Chelmsford (2), with respect to counsel, are in point. He says, that although counsel has complete authority over the suit, the mode of conducting it, and all that is incident to it, he has not power over matters collateral to it; and that however desirable it might be, in order to stop litigation, to compromise an action for nuisance by a sale of the property, he would have no authority to agree that it should be done. The compromise here was not a matter incident to the suit; instead of being a step to recover the money, it was an annulling of the sale on which the action was brought. (He also argued that the compromise, being by the attorney's clerk, was not binding; and cited Bingham v. Allport (3) and Pennell v. Stephens (4); but, on reference to the affidavits, the point was dropped.)

Needham, in support of the rule.—There is a distinction as to the effect of the agreement between party and party, and between attorney and client. It may bind between party and party, and yet the client may have an action against his attorney. Swinfen v. Swinfen (1) is not in point. There the attorney had no authority, and said so; yet counsel compromised. In Thomas v. Harris (5) Pollock, C.B. decided that counsel had authority to agree to reduce the damages in the absence of his client. In Fray v. Vowles (6) the attorney compromised the action against the wishes of the client; and Lord Campbell said that he would have been authorized in reasonably, skilfully and bona fide compromising if he had not had express instructions not to do so. The case of Chown v. Parrott (7), in this court, shews also that the attorney may conduct the cause in such manner as appears to him most beneficial to his client.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be made absolute. The action was to recover the price of a piano; and the plaintiffs' attorney agreed to settle the action by the return of the piano, and the payment of the costs by instalments. The plaintiffs repudiate this agreement, and say it was made without authority. The defendant says that the attorney had authority. The question is here between third parties; but I do not limit my judgment to that. It is clear that there was no express prohibition in this case; and the question is, whether his employment gave the plaintiffs' attorney a general authority to compromise as he did. It is admitted that he has a general authority over the common procedure of the suit. It is admitted that he might agree to take a lesser amount after verdict; and, in my mind, there is no distinction in the present case. If the whole process was gone regularly through up to execution, the sheriff might have taken this very piano; and I think the attorney might compromise for goods as well as for money. The case of Chown v. Parrott (7) lays down principles sufficiently wide to authorize us in this judgment. In Fray v. Vowles (6) the compromise was made in spite of the express prohibition of the client. Swinfen v. Swinfen (1) was a case remarkable in all its circumstances. I look on it as a singular case. The judgments of the Master of the Rolls and the Lords Justices are given on the ground that in an issue directed by the Courts of Chancery, it is extraordinary to give up the claim to an estate.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. No authority has been cited to shew that an attorney has no power bona fide, and with the exercise of reasonable skill and care, to compromise an action. In the case of Swinfen v. Swinfen (1) in this court, the first discussion was as to the authority of counsel. Cresswell, J. there says—"It is said that the compromise entered into by the counsel for the parties was made without the authority of the plaintiff. I think the Court cannot listen to such an objection." Williams, J. says: "With respect to the objection that the plaintiff's counsel agreed to the compromise without authority from his client, it is perfectly clear, without pretending to define the limits of counsel's authority, that the plaintiff was bound by her counsel's consent;" and Willes, J. says: "I entirely agree with my Brother Cresswell as to the authority of counsel." Afterwards the question was, whether an attachment should issue, and the Judges agreed that it should not; but Crowder, J. says: "I have the misfortune to differ from the opinion expressed by my learned Brothers when the former rule was discharged, and to which opinion they still adhere." The rule, therefore, in the Common Law Courts is laid down in wide terms, and the adverse opinions which have been expressed in the Courts of Equity must have been given on the peculiarity of the case before them.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. If this were not the rule, great inconvenience and protracted litigation would ensue. Here the attorney compromises.

by taking the piano (though any goods perhaps might do)—taking the very subject-matter of the action. This seems to me within the most limited extent of his authority. I would remark that I believe the case of Swinfen v. Swinfen (1), so far as decided in this Court, has not been fully understood. The learned Judges adhered to their former opinion; but the motion being one for an attachment, the opinion of the majority did not prevail because of the peculiar nature of the motion. The case of Swinfen v. Swinfen (1) is a peculiar one.

SMITH, J.—I am of opinion that an attorney has authority in all matters which may reasonably be expected to arise in a cause. It often must happen that a cause may not come to its usual conclusion, but to a compromise. The cases shew that an attorney may compromise a suit; and the question is, whether this compromise is one within his authority in the suit. It seems to me that none could be more so than this. If the action had been successful, the plaintiffs might have had execution, and the sheriff might have taken this very piano or other goods; and the attorney, as it were by anticipation, takes it. It would be most unfortunate for clients if attorneys could not compromise. Moments occur in a case when a fortunate compromise may be made, moments which may never occur again, and on the loss of which moments protracted litigation ensues. I think, on principle and authority, the attorney might make this compromise.

Rule absolute.

1865. } BARKER AND ANOTHER v.
May 16. } M'ANDREW.

Charter-Party—Commencement of Voyage.

A charter-party stipulated that a certain steamer then at N, being tight, staunch, and in every way fitted for the voyage, should proceed to the usual place of loading at N, or as near thereunto as she could safely get (guaranteed for cargo in a certain month), there load and then proceed to A. It contained the usual exception of dangers and accidents of seas, rivers and navigation during the voyage:—Held, that the voyage commenced from her starting from her then berth for the loading place, and that the exception applied to that portion of the voyage.

This was a demurrer to a plea.

The declaration contained two counts, which were as follows: The first count stated, that by a charter-party, made the 3rd of October 1863, it was mutually agreed between the plaintiffs and the defendant, that the defendant's steamer called the Smyrna, then at Newcastle, should with all convenient speed sail and proceed to the usual place there, or so near thereunto as she might safely get [the defendant guaranteeing the said steamer for cargo in all the said month of October], and there load for the factors of the plaintiffs in the customary manner a full and complete cargo of about 1,500 tons of coal, and that being so loaded the said steamer should therewith proceed to Alexandria, Egypt, and there deliver the same on payment of freight, the act of God, the Queen's enemies, restraints of rulers and princes, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatever nature and kind soever during the said voyage always excepted; and the plaintiffs say that they did all things on their part to be done, and all things happened to entitle them to have the said charter-party performed by the defendant on his part, yet the said steamer did not with all convenient speed sail and proceed to such usual place of loading, at Newcastle, as before mentioned, nor was the said steamer ready to receive and load on board the said agreed cargo during any time in the said month of October; and the plaintiffs, in fact, say, that the said steamer was not ready to receive and load on board, and did not in fact receive and load on board the said agreed cargo until long after the said month of October, and after long and unreasonable delay.

The second count was similar, except that the words in brackets were changed to ["being ready there for cargo in the month of October, or the early part of the month of November 1863,"] and the breach altered to meet this change; and following the two counts was an averment of damage accruing from the breaches.
